Vhilft thefe gallies were fetting forward, those foure gallies whereof we have before spoken, wherein were imbarked 80 Knights and 600 other foldiers, having at fea fuffered many troubles by the space of twenty daies, could not as yet arrive at Malta: and because the Viceroy had commanded that they should not land, except they first knew whether the Castle S. Elmo were ftill holden by the Christians, they sent out a frigor to land, promising that day and the next to tarry in the fea for her returne. In the meane time a great tempest suddenly arifing, it fell out, that the frigot could not at the appointed time returne: wherefore the gallies which expected her comming, fearing left the had been either by tempest lost, or by the enemy intercented retired vnto Pozalo a port vpon the coast of Sicilia, neerest to Malta, there D to expect forme good newes: where as foone as they had put in, they understood that S. Elmo was yet defended a whereupon they put to sea againe, with purpose to have arrived at Malta. But when they were within two leagues of the place where they thought to have landed, they faw a fire there, which caused them to mistrust that the place was possessed of the enemy, and that he lay thereabout to intercept them : wherefore they returned against to Pozalo; where now understanding of the French knight come from Malta, that that fire was made by his commandatent, as a figure that they might without feare come forward; they with all speed made again for the same place, and at the length the 29 day of Iune about midnight landed at the Blackerockes on the South fide of the Island toward Affricke, and vnseene of any, got in hafte to the city Males, where they were joyfully received, and there staid to expect what the B Great Master should command. In the mean time it fortuned a great foggy mist (which seldome times there chanceth) to arise so thicke, that a man could hardly see for it:at which time a boy of about twelve yeares old looking by chance out of a window in the castle of Melita, fuddenly as one afraid cried out, that he faw a Turke going from the city to the castle of Saint Michael. Which thing some of the Knights hearing, ran presently out that way, and found a Greeke of the city Melica, who brought backe and examined (for that without the Gouernors passe it was not lawfull for any man to go out of the city) confessed, That his purpolewas to have advertised the Turks of the comming of those fouldiers, that so they might Avaioriate have intercepted them as they (hould have come from Melita to the Grand mafter: for which and executed a trea fon he was, as he had well deferued, cut in four pieces. These new come souldiers requested of the Great Master, as a reward of their paines, That they might be put in garrison into the Towne S. Michael, a place now most laid vnto by the Turks: which thing (he commending their forwardnesse) easily granted, yet for all that remo. ued not his old garrison. These fresh and couragious soldiers desirous of nothing more than to fight with the enemy, the next day fallied out, and having flain 2000f the Turks, and wounded as many more, without loffe of a man returned, euery mans fword imbrued in the bloud of his enemy. Which thing Mustapha the Turks Generall hearing, knew it was they which late. H ly came into the towne; and thereupon fell in rage with his captains, as that they had by their negligence entred. But the suspition grew most vpon them which were appointed for the kee. ping of the vttermost part of the Island : which was the more increased, for that three galliots of Algiers had withdrawne themselues away; so that he neither trusted them nor the renegat Christians, who as occasion served fled daily from him. For which cause he gave out proclamation, That none of them should lie by night out of the gallies, and that such as did other. wife, should therefore be burnt, or impailed upon sharpe stakes : and changing his warders, appointed Salee with his galliots, whom he thought to be more faithfull, for the keeping of the Island. And that neither they nor the Christians should be able to attempt any thing, he chained together divers gallies in the entrance of the haven Marza Moxer, & caused the rest of the tleet to ride neerer together than before, But beçause exceeding many were at that time sicke in the Turks camp, of the flix and other diseases; three places were assigned for them; one for the wounded men neere vnto Aqua Martia, garded with 2000 Turks; another in the poups of their ships and gallies for the Turks voluntaries; and the third amongst the bulwarkes, where the inforced Christians were cured. At the same time, Mustapha appointed Ochiall Bassa Go. uernor of Tripolis, in flead of Dragus before flaine : who going thither with five gallies, and having fet all things in order there, returned againe vnto the campe. With him the Baffa had fent two ships loaded with come to Tripolis, there to make bread, whereof they began to feele some want in the campe. He also sent Zaloch one of his Colonels to Solyman, to certifie him of the winning of the castle S, Elmo, and to deliuer vnto him the description of the Island of Mali R ta as they found it at their arrivall; and further to declare vnto him, That he found the Maltafes stronger and better provided, than was at his fetting forth supposed where fore if it were his pleasure longer to continue the siege, he should send a new supply of men, victuall, and other warlike prouision: which if he did, he would then be in hope to take the other strong places of the Island also, though not so soone as was at the first supposed : and that in the meane time whileft he expected answer, he would not faile to do what he possibly maight. And because he would not seeme to hauewritten an vntruth, he began his battery in sourcteene places with 70 great pieces of artillery, amongst which was three most huge basilisks: for from the Gallows promontory to Aqua Martia, and from thence to the castile S. Bloo, wherein he had plai ced 300 Ianizaries, the Turks had inclosed all that compasse with fundry bulwarks, trenches, 1 and mounts, from whence they with their thundring thot day and night inceffanely battered the townes and castles of S. Michael and S. Angelo, ouerthrew the walls, beat down the bulwarks, and brake down the houses in such terrible manner, that scarce any could be safe therein : which of all others most troubled the fearfull women and children. But the Turks in their trenches rested in far more safety : yet so, as they durst not stray far out of the campe, but trufting vpon their multitude, and not that many times without their loffe, being enross by the horsemen of the garrison of Malea, who were ever ready at their heeles.

When the loffe of the castle S. Elmowas knowne at Rome, the city was filled with mourning and heaviness some were forry for the dishonour, other some feared left the calamities of the Maltæses should redound unto themselves. There was also among stothers, a certainenui- M ous and foule mouth'd kinde of men, altogether ignorant and vnacquainted with martiall affaires, who shamed not to lay the blame of the losse of S. Elmo vpon the Grand Master whom both his owne valour, with the worthy testimony of so many samous and valiant men as were there present with him, as also this history gathered out of the true light of things then done; shall both for the time present and for all posterity sufficiently acquite of so salse a slander. But he will easily blemish another mans name, that spareth not his owne : neither can Ignorance rightly judge of the counsels of the skilfull; or cowardife, of valiant deeds.

But to returne againe to our purpose: we faid before, that three gallies were made ready at Three gallies Messana; in setting forth whereof, they which had the charge vsed such diligence, that the se. Missana with uenth of July they departed out of harbour. In them (besides the Knights of the Order) was and towerds imbarked 600 Spaniards, and 300 of the Great Bishops souldiers, conducted by Pompeius Malta. Columba: the mariners were part hired, part flaues, to whom liberty was promifed, if they would lustily do their endeuour to get into the hauen, and to be accounted of as the rest of the souldiers were. And because they would relieue the besieged not with men only, but with victu-

B all alfo, they put into the same gallies fiue hundred buthels of wheat, beside gunpouder, saltneeter, and lead for thot. And although it was thought a most hard matter, by the hauen it felfe to enter into the Island, the Turks possessing it and all the places therabouts, neuertheleffethere was in the Knights fuch an earnest desire to relieue their Brethren, that they promiled both to themselues and others, al things easie and safe. But when they began to approch the Island, they sent a scout before, to understand by signes from the castle S. Angelo, whether they were to proceed forward or not who comming to far that they might discover the signe. The gallier upperceiued thereby that they should retire. Which things the Turks perceiuing also, presently on a siene given with the smoake of their great ordnance and other things, they so obscured the aire as with a thicke cloud, in such fort as that those signes were no more to be discerned : but all in vaine :

C for why, our men had already discried them: so those three gallies returned agains into Sicilia. For Valetta that good Prince thought it not meet to bring fo many of the facred Knights. so many noble gentlemen and valiant soldiers, into a most manifest danger: for he saw certaine of the Turks gallies to lie by night in the mouth of the hauen Marza Moxet, at a place called the Little fands, to impeach the going in or out of the hauen Major. About the fame time, they which lay in garrison in the city Melita, hearing of the notable sally made by the souldiers lately come, and taking heart thereupon, at such time as the Turks were fetching in a certaine booty of cattell, the horsemen pursued them, and having slaine divers of them, recovered the prey; and yet not so contented, chased them even to their campe. But the other Turks seeing their fellowes flying in such haste towards them, raised an alarum, ran to their Generals tent,

The Great Master probably conjecturing, that the Turks would in short time assault both the towne and castle of S. Michael, thought good by his presence to encourage and strengthen the garrison; and therefore was about to have gone thither by a bridge made of boats from the one point of the land to the other, betweene S. Michaels and S. Angelo: but quickly understanding the certainty thereof, returned againe into his castle. Some there be that think, For him to haue so done, had been a venturous part, and full of danger, and therefore to haue been distcommended: for that great things are performed, not so much by strength of body as of mind, by politique counsell and direction, wherwith a Generall (although absent) may yet with his forces be alwaies present; but the Generall once lost (which may easily happen if he will pre-B fenthis person to the danger) we see most commonly all fall together with him, no otherwise than doth all parts of the body when the foule departeth. But other fome are of contrary opinion, That the Generals presence, especially in great dangers, is both praise worthy and most necessary; for that he, as the soule, cannot pronide for or rule the body, except it be present, year placed therin and that Valetta in so doing had followed the examples of the greatest kings & most famous Generals; as of Alexander the Great, Julius Cafar, Themistocles, Mariu, and others: whose words vnto their fouldiers were these, I my selfe will be your conductor in the field, in the bat tell partaker of the danger with you, you shall be in all things as my selfe. Besides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, so most of all in martiall affaires, all things are better, more orderly, and more easily done when the Master is present neither was the learned Poet his meaning F any thing els, when in the wars betwixt the Latines and the Rutilians, he faith, Vrget prasenta Turni? whereupon they concluded, That the Great Master in going had done both valiantly, wifely, and according to his duty. But this we leave for martiall men to determine.

At the same time the king of Algiers came to aid the Turks with 7 gallies and tengalliots, The king of Alg and in them 2200 fouldiers: who forry that he was not there at the beginning, and defirous the identification that he was not there at the beginning, and defirous the identification that he was not there at the beginning, and defirous the identification that he was not there at the beginning, and defirous the identification that he was not there at the beginning, and defirous that he was not there at the beginning, and defirous that he was not there at the beginning that he was not the beginning the beginning that he was not the beginning the beginning that he was not the beginning the beginning that he was not the beginning that he was not the beginning the beginning that he was not the beginning the beginning the beginning that he was not the beginning that he was not the b to do some notable act, and withall to make proofe of the valor of his soldiers, requested the G great Bassa to bestow vpon him the first place in the besieging the castle S. Michael which he be not only granted, but joyned to his forces 2000 of his own best soldiers. These things obtained, he commanded ninety small vessels by deuises to be carried ouer land out of the pore Marza Moxet to Aqua Martia, for that he purposed on that side to besiege the cassle by water, But Valetta perceiving the enemies purpose, both by seeing that was done, and also advertised thereof before by a Christian fugitiue; presently called vnto him two faithfull and skillull thipmasters of Malta, and imparting the matter vnto them, demanded what they thought best to be done to keep the Turks from landing, as it feemed they purposed at the walls foot. They quickly perceiving the matter, answered, That in their opinion, if a chaine were made of masts and faile-yards as spars joined together with yron rings, and so drawn all along it from the cor. H ner of the castle S. Angelo, to that place where the enemy thought to land, their purpose might be so deseated. This deuise so pleased the Great master, that the night following such a chain was made, and fast mored in the appointed place. The Turks so soon as it was day perceiuing this bar, flood as men doubtfull, not knowing how by any means to land their men, as they had before purposed. Whilest they stood so abashed, a Christian fugitive a most desperat villaine (in which kind of men foolish hardinesse is accounted a vertue, and desperation, constancy) came to the King, and promised him to breake the chaine, and so with a hatchet in his hand cast himselse into the sea; after whom followed two or three more to help him who fwimming to the chaine, got vp vpon it, and began to hew apace with their hatchets. Which the Christians beholding, suddenly fiue or six of the Maltæses swamthither with their drawn fwords in their hands, and having flaine two of them, caused the other to fly:after which time none of the Turks was so hardy as to attempt the same. The barbarous king for all that gaue The line of Ale not ouer his purpose so, but with wonderfull diligence prepared for the siege, which the sifteenth day of July began both by sea and land. But the defendants turning their great ord. before and land, nauce upon that place from whence the galliots came, with the fury thereof (in the space of three houres, which the affault endured) flew two thousand Turks, and sunke twelucof the Galliots: the rest comming as far as the chaine, when they could get no further, nor land their men, turned their prows wpon the corner of the castle, but were glad at last to retire and leave that they came for vndone. The affault at land also endured flue houres, wherein many of the Turks were flaine: and of the defendants 200, amongst whom was Fredericas the Viceroy of K Sicilia his son, strucke in sunder with a great shot, Gordisu a Frenchman, Franciscau Sanoghera and his nephew John, Spaniards, all Knights of the Order: Medina was also wounded, whereof Aband first he afterward died. But Valetta considering into what danger the state of Maltawas like to fall, if he should be constrained to fight many such fights, where his foldiers wearied day & night without reft, were still to encounter with fresh men, and heard nothing of any aid or new supply; the 17 day of July he fent a meffenger into Sicilia, who fwam from the caffle to the farthest part of the bay to Aqua Martia, and from thence escaped vnknown thorow the midst of the enemies, vnto the city of Melita, and so in a little frigot came to Messana. By him the Great master sent letters to the Viceroy, requesting him to send him his owne two gallies with those Knights which were at Messana, and such other souldiers as might in them be 1 transported:willing them, that as soon as they came to the Island, they should houer off aloof before the hauen, ready vpon a figne giuen to thrust in. The same time that this messenger arriued at Messana, came thither also the fleet from Spaine, wherein were many of the Knights on the Order from divers nations. The Viceroy desirous to fend these two gallies to Valenta, fent letters before vnto him in fecret characters by two frigots, wherin he certified him that he would fend the gallies, requiring to have from him some signe whereby they might at their comming know whether they should enter or retire : which frigots taking divers courses, one of them laded with medicines, as was afterwards knowne, was intercepted by the enemy : the other although the came in fafety to Melita, yet for as much as all the passages betwirt thecafile of S. Michael and the city Melita, were certained aies before by the diligence of the ene- M my flut vp, and three which had vied to paffe too and fro, intercepted and most cruelly executed; and besides that, the hauen streightly kept; the the Knights of Messan could have no further direction from the Great Master, for the safe sending of the two Gallies: yet neuerthelesse because he had requested them, and they themselues were of the same opinion (as

A he had before written) that where all is in question, the aduenture of a little part is lesse to be feated, they thought it good to adventure them, yet with this regard, not to expose all those knights to fo great a danger, but of them all to fend only forty, with a convenient number of other fouldiers, and with them Salazer a Spanish captaine was sent by the Viceroy to be landed in the Island Gaulos, who should afterwards from thence in a boat (for that purpose towed along by the gallies) passe over into the Island of Malta as a Spie, to take view both of the city and enemies campe.

In the meane time the Turks mindfull of the loffe received in the affault of the caffle S.Michael and defirous of reuenge, did so violently batter the castle with their great ordnance, that what the defendants repaired by night, that they still beat downe againe by day : and in time B of battery made a bridge, which the 20 day of July before the Sun rifing they laied ouer the Abridge made ditch, shat they might as if it had bin vpon even ground, come to fight hand to hand with the ditch by the Christians, Which seen, and quickly perceiving what danger it might bring by and by Parifet Turber the Great masters nephew, and Agleria, both Knights, with certaine mercinary soldiers sallied our to have burnt the bridge, but were fo received of the Turks, that they were almost all slain together with Parifor and Acteria, and yet the exploit unperformed. The Turks without ceafing continued their furious battery vitill the eight and twentieth of July, which day in the afternoone they in divers places affaulted the caltle, thrice they with fresh and new supplies relieved their repulsed and wearied souldiers and so fiercely maintained the affault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the Castle. But the defendants with no lesse resolution The Turks C. withflood them repulfing them with their weapons, with thot, fire, and force, and at length in repuled. forced them with no small losse of their men to retire from the wals. This victory so incouraged the befieged, that now they made fmall reckoning of the enemy: but forafmuch as our men alwaies spared their great ordnance but in time of fight, and sallied not out as they were wont, the Turks thought that the garrison was but weake, and that shot and pouder grew scarce in the Castle. Yet deceived in both, for that it was rather of purpose, than for want, so commanded by the Great Master; who hearing nothing of the comming of any aid, and seeing the enemy to give daily more fierce affaults, would not vainly found his most necessary helps. The Turks perceiving what little good they had done with their often affaults determined now to proue what might be done by undermining the castle: and had almost brought one of their A mine of the D mines to perfection before it was of the Christians discouered and to the intent they should Turks distant. the leffe marke it; they caused two gallies to come as neere as they could to the wals, & to batter that place in hope that whilest our men gazed you that was done openly, they should the lesse regard what they were working in secret, that so they might in the mean time more casily get into the castle. But the besieged carefull of all that was to be cared for, perceiuing their purpole, with a countermine defeated their mine, & by the couragious nesse of certain of their

his hand, forced him out. For which good feruice he was by the Great Master rewarded with a chaine of gold of fine pound weight. And because of vertue springerh vertue, which still refleth upon difficulties, the next day, which was the first of August, the bridge which we said The bridge the enemy had made ouer the ditch, was by a fally made by the defendants burnt downe with Tark burnt. fire and gunpouder cast upon it: which was in good time done, for the next day, the Sun now declining, the Turks again affailing that part of the castle where Carolus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly reputled. This affault endured 3 houres, in which time 300 of the Turks were there flain; and of the knights, Rufus him felfe and Barefus, with certaine mercinary foldiers. At this time the Christians were by the enemy so shut in with the multitude of great ordnance; that they could not fo much as looke into the ditch or them felues, much leffe fally our, but they were presently fet off. Whereupon an hundred, part Knights, part other fouldiers, fallying forth, caused the enemy to forsake the ditch and betake themselves to slight, of whom they flew about fourescore, and lost of their owne, ten men: amongst whom were loss. nes and Manierinus two Knights, whole heads the Turks the next day let vpon two spears vpon their trenches, that they might be seene by the Christians,

The same day, they of the city of Melita at night made at one inflant a number of fires, and as it were in triumph discharged great vollies of small shot, with many other tokens of joy: which as well the belieged as the Turks thought verily to have beene done vpon discoursy of the Christian fleet, or els the landing of such forces as were come to remove the siegewhens indeed it was neither, but done only to shew their cheerefulnesse, and to keep the Turks in the spence with the nouelty of the matter : who for all that were not slacke in their businesse, but with earth filled up the ditch at the cafile bulwarke; wherby it came to paffe that they could not be hurt by the flankers made in that place to fcoure the direh, bur might thereby, as you plaine ground, without flay paffe vnto the wall, now opened and ouesthrowne with their continuall battery, and with two great pieces (which they had planted upon a high mount which they had newly cast up on the right hand the bulwarke. Sauoire) they began to play spon the caftle, and at the first shot, thet into the loupe where Franciscus Castilia commanded. Isames Bernar dus Bedinctim a Spanish knight was there slaine with a smal shot. The same day Francisens Aquilates a Spaniard, one of the garrison soldiers, persuaded by searcand hope (in dangers two enill counsellors) fled out of the town S. Michael to the enemy sperfueding the Turks Co. lonels to give a fresh assault, assuing them that they should without doubt win the towne because there was but 400 soldiers lest aline in it, and they (as he seid) elmost spent with labour and wounds, all the reft being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and feeing faire breaches both in the wals of the new city and of the castle S. Michael, wide enough for carts to go through, they determined with all their forces to affault both places at once, and to prove if there were The Yarte at yet fo much strength left in those holds as again to repulse them; fo the 7 day of August stone instant they assaulted the new city at the castle bulwark, & the castle S. Michael at the breach, city and the size with such a multitude, that all the earth second to be covered with men round about. The fic s. Mubacl. thundring of the great ordnance, the noise of the small shot, with the clattering of armour, and noise of trumpets, drums, and other warlike instruments, with the cry of men on both sides was K fo confused and great, as if heaven and earth should have been confounded together. Which when the Knights in the city Melita heard, and faw the heavens obscured with smoake, searing that the Turks (as at the castile S. Elmo) would never give over the assault wntill they had won both the towne and the castle, presently all the garrison horsemen issued out of the city, and to auert the Turks from the assault, set upon those Turks which lay at Aqua Martia swho all furprised with a sudden seare, fled, the Christian horsemen hardly pursuing them with bloudy folders of Me.

This fight endured about fine houres. Valetta delinered of lo great a danger, that day and certaine others caused publike praiers to be made, and went himselse with the multitude of the citifens to the Church, to give thanks to Almighty God for that victory.

Whilst these things were in doing, Garzias the Viceroy was advertised from Calabria, that certaine ships laded with men, victuall, and other provision necessary for the wars, were consming from Constantinople to Malta: wherefore he forthwith fent Altamira and Gildandrado two noblemen, with fine gallies to meet them : who being come within thirty miles of Malta, met with no such ships, but only one frigot and a galliot; the frigot they took, but the galliot M escaped to the enemies fleet at Malta.

Mustapha the Turks General now thinking no man so strong which might not with continuall labour and watching be wearied and ouercome, refolued not to give vinto the belieged any time of rest, but commanded his souldiers againe to assault the breach at the Castle of Saint

A Michael; where they were by the valour of the defendants, with no small flaughter quickly repulsed:neither did the Bassa give so many assaults, for the hope he had to win those places, but rather to perform the duty of a valiant Generall, and to fatisfie Solymans pleasure, who had expreffely commanded, either to win that Island, or there all to lose their lives. He also fent a Mustapha lengalliot in haste with letters to Solyman, wherein he shewed him the state of the fleet, with what deth a migradifficulties the army was diffreffed, what small hope there was of winning the places be fieged. how well the Christians were prouided, with many other such things.

In the meane time those two gallies of Malra (which we have before spoken of) departing from Messana came to Syracusa, where they staired a day. The next day after, in going out of the hauen, they met with one of Malta in a small boat comming from Pozalo fore wounded . B hebeing demanded how he was fo hurt; told them, That landing by night with his boat and one companion hewas requested by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to rest there that night which they doing, about midnight five Turks brake into the house voon them, killed his companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was, hardly escaped by the benefit of the night moreover, he said, That the Sicilians had told the Turks, that two gallies were come into that port with fouldiers and other warlike provision bound for Malta. Whereby the knights perceived, that their comming would be discoursed unto the enemy, and that it was a most dangerous thing, or rather impossible to get into the hauen of Malta, as they had before purposed ineverthelesse, to conduct Sala ar with his little boat, they kept on their course. But as they were failing, they descried two gallies and one galliot going before them, who seeing C the gallies comming after them, made with all speed to Malta: and were no doubt those gallies, from whence those fine Turks came, which had done those things which the wounded Malter or reported. For all that, these gallies kept on their course as far as Pozalo, from whence they certified the Viceroy by letters of all that had happed; and not daring to put to sea, the South wind blowing with a ftiffe gale against them, they returned backe against o Syracusa. expecting their farther direction from the Viceroy. For which cause, they forthwith sent one of the Knights to him to Messana; by whom they received answere, that they should goe no. farther, but to stay for the comming of the whole fleet, ready in short time to passe ouer to Malta. But Salazar brought by the gallies to Pozalo, refolued with his little boat to go on and although the day he departed thence, the aire was troubled with great wind, thunder and rain, D yet the daies following prouing more calme, he in short time arrived in the Island of Malta, Salazar a She. and came in fafety to the city Melita; and there difguiled himfelfe in Turkish apparell, and ta. nish Captaine king with him one companion who could speake the Turkish language, by night got into the Turkiscamp. the enemies camp: where diligently marking all things, they perceived that there was in al the Turks army of land foldiers scarce 14000, and of them many wounded and sieke, and that the refl was but an unferuiceable and feeble multitude, for that the course of warres had (as commonly it doth) confumed their best fouldiers. When they had thus viewed the camp, they returned again to the city, from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccion a Spaniard, a venturous and valiant man, went to a certaine place neere vnto the watch tower of Maleca: which when they had curioufly viewed, Paccina was there left, that obserning the fignes from the Island of Gaulos and the city of Melita, he might give knowledge of all things to the Viceroy at his approch, as he was by Salaz ir instructed. As for Salazar himselfe, he in his little boat (which at his comming into the Isle he had there left) happily returned to Messana, and there declared vnto the Viceroy all that he had seene : constantly affirming among st other things, That the Turks fleet was but weake, lame, and disfurnished both of men and munition, far vnable to encounter with 10000 Christians. About which time also, one of the two frigots which were before fent to Malta, returned with another Spaniard, and a fugitive from the Turks campe: and foure gallies before gone from Messana, were also come in with sourceene Turks taken about the Island of Malta, who all confirmed the same that was by Salazar reported: Which was, That the Turks army was with often affaults wonderfully weakened, both in P number and frength; fo that they could not with stripes be enforced to the affault, for which the Bassa had with his owne hands slaine divers of them; and that which more encreased their feare, they faw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof: Besides that, they faw the Christians with inuincible courage to defend their strong places, and not to spend one that in vaine: Wherefore they were forry, and repented that they had ever tooke in hand that expedition; they detefted fuch a war, fhrinking as much as they could from the affault, and as G they might steale quite away, which many of them did, specially such as had before abjured the Christian Faith. For which cause diligent watch and ward was kept, and commandement given by the great Bassa, that they should resolve with themselves either to win the towne, of there all to lay vp their bones, for that the great Sultan Selyman had fo commanded, whom to gainefay, was in it felfe death. These and such other like persuasions, caused the Viceroy some what the fooner to thinke the bringing forth of the fleetrof his befreged in the mean time did what men might for defence of the place and themselues. There was in the castile one Francis cus Gauara captain of the vauntgard, a noble and valiant gentleman, of a great conceit, he about ten foot from the towne wall, which the enemy had with their great ordnance beaten downe caused a curtain to be drawn 50 foot long, & five foot thicke, with flankers at both ends, which in two nights was brought to perfection, and was afterwards a great help to the besieged. The enemy in the mean time began a mine under the corner of the towne ditch, where Boning ferna a Spaniard and a most valiant Knight had the charge : which the besseged perceiuing, by a countermine descated the same. It happed in the mean time, that as a sugitive was swimming to the towne he was taken by the enemy, which much grieued the befieged, defirous to have understood something of the state of the enemies camp, and of their purposes. Now when the former mine had taken fo euill successe, part of the Turks assailed the cassle S. Michael, & part with gunpouder thought to have blowne up the castle bulwarke; but by the carefulnesse and courage of the defendants, all their attempts were disappointed; for many of the Turks were in both places flaine, and certaine bags of pouder taken from them in the mine. With these and other such difficulties, Mustapha and Piall the Turks Generals disappointed of their hope, confulted with the other great captains of the army, Whether they should their still continue that desperat siege, or depart? Where most were electe of opinion, That it were best betime to depart. Yet for all that, the old Baffa faid, He would there flay, untill the galliot which he had before sent to Constantinople, were returned with answer from Solyman, and in the mean time both by force and policy to feeke after victory : which thing he oftner did, than stood with the broken estate of his army, or of the besieged neither resting himselfe, nor suffering others to take rest: for one while he battered the wals, another while he wrought mines or els made bridges, fomtime he cast vp mounts, and then again filled the ditches; and ever and anon gave one assault or another. In all which doing he vied such industry, that what societ he tooke in hand, was in short time brought to such perfection as might have carried a stronger place, had not the valour of the defendants far exceeded all his strong and politicke deuises.

It fortuned, that as Robles the Camp master, and Gouernour of the castle S. Michael, was by night viewing the ruins of the wall, he was strucke in the head with a small shot, and slain, leauing behind him to his fellowes, the great defire of himfelfe; for why, he was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times flood the defendants in great flead) worthily beloued. In whose stead the Great master sent one of the Colonels that was with himselfe, a most expert and resolute captaine, to take charge of S. Michaels castle; who by his valiant care and providence so well discharged the charge committed vnto him, that as often as the Turks attempted the place, so often they were with losse repulsed.

The two gallies with the galliots, descried by the gallies of Malta (as we have before said) told Piall Baffathe Admirall, that the Christian fleet was ready to come forth: wherefore he fearing the sudden comming therof, caused seventy gallies to be in readinesses which, forty others lay in the hauen Marza Moxet unferuiceable, as wanting both men & other equipage; for that was spent in making bridges, mines, & other such things necessary for the siege: as for the men, they were part with sickenesse, and part with often assaults consumed. Wherefore Piall for certaine daies kept himselse by day in the port Major neere the shore, and by night put forth to sea, expecting the comming of the fleet. But after long looking, when he saw no man appeare, he againe landed his fouldiers; and because at land the Bassa began towant pouder, of every thirty barrels of pouder in every gally, he tooke out twenty, and of some M twenty fine, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turks began with greater fury than at any time before, to batter the wals of both townes, especially with those great pieces which they call Basiliskes, whose shorof two hundred pound weight was seuen hands about; whereby the wals of the castle of S. Michael were beaten flat. And at the same time, the Bassa at the castle S. Angelo, had with continual battery so shaken the castle bulwarke. The Turker at the Balla at the cattle S. Angero, insulvini continuant outcory to maken the Cartie bulwarke, and that it was almost fallen quite downe. These breaches thus made, when the Turks saw both some affaile the that it was almost fallen quite downe. townes bared of wals and other defendants, and laid foopen, that nothing feemed now to let and S. Michael. them to look vpon their enemies, they made no longer stay, but the 18 day of August (the Sun and are at both being now at the highest) with all their power fiercely assaulted both the towns. Thrice they were repulfed, and still came on afresh; yet at length beaten downe on every side with greater flaughter, they were glad shamefully to give over the affault, and againe to retire to their trenches. In this most cruell fight (which endured fine houres) the innincible courage of the Great Master notably appeared, who armed with a pike in his hand, and dreadfull to behold. was still valiantly fighting in the face of the breach, whose presence encouraged not the soul-B diers only, but even boies and women to fight: for fo it is, that men are more moved with example, than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turks, part stood still in the towne dirch and to faue themselves from the shot of the castle bulwarke, had with wonderfull celeritv cast vp a desence of earth, sagots, and other like matter, which they did of purpose to approch and to vindermine the walls, and had therefore inclosed the space of fifteen elnes: which when the belieged perceived, they bent certaine pieces of artillery vpon it, and flew many of them, and with fire confumed what was left. The next day the affault was at the same places by the enemy renewed, who by reason of his number of souldiers might easily fend siesh men in flead of them which were wounded or weary : and first, after their wonted manner they battered both the townes all that day untill night; afterwards the Moone arifing, about midnight C with a horrible cry they began a most terrible affault, which at the first much troubled the Christians, who yet still mindfull of their wonted valor, did so much with their weapons and fire-workes, that the enemy cuill intreated, was glad after three houres fight to retire to iffs trenches. The same day a mine was by the defendants perceived, at the castle bulwarke, wherein a hundred Turks there found, were almost all slaine, and the mine destroied. Yet for all this Another establishment did not the enemy rest at all, but the next day seven times assaulted the same breaches, vsing now not weapons only, but fire workes also, wherewith Bosningega had his face so burnt, that he lostone of his eies. At the same time also, the Turks at a place called the Spurre, laboured mightily to have gotten into the castle: where Centius a knight of an invincible courage, got vovpon therampier, and with a pike couragiously thrust them down that were climing vo, and D thrusting thorow one discouraged the test; but was himself wounded in the arme with a small shot: yet when he had a little withdrawn himselfe to have his wound bound up, he came again to the rampier, and neuer departed from the fight, vntill he had (as a valiant conqueror) preferued the place. So the Turks with great flaughter on enery fide repulsed, left the victory to the Christians, of whom were slaine almost an hundred, and most of them (as at other times) with shot:amongst whom were these most valiant Knights; at the castle Angelo, Prague; at the castle of S. Michael, Scipio Piatus, leh. Baptista Sederinus, Paulus Bomportus, Marius Fagianus, Ruffinus, and certaine others, men worthy of longer life. The Turks had also at the same time wrought a mine at the castle S. Michael, which was at once both discouered and destroicd.

With these so many & so great assaults, certain of the knights (and those not of the meanest E fort) fearing lest that which was so often attempted by the enemy, should at length be effected; told the Great Master, That they thought it convenient and necessary, to remove all the records, al the pictures and reliques of the Saints, and other their religious things into the castle S. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more strength and affurance. The Great Master, although he well knew that they which thus faid, spake it of a good mind, was for all that with that speech exceedingly moued : wherefore he shortly answered them, That so to dowere no- Therefoliate answered thing els but to appale and discourage the minds, not of the Maltæles only, who had hitherto forer of the valiantly behaued themselues, & don more than any man could have hoped for but also of the mercinary fouldiers, if they should perceive it : wherefore he was resolved, either together to keep all, or lose all: and because none should from henceforth repose any hope in the strength of the castle S. Angelo, he said he would bring all the garrison out of the castle into the towne, that there they might together with others with stand the enemy; & that he would leave in the casse none but gunners, who should as need required shoot at the enemy: an answer truly well besceming a man of his place, and to be to all posterity commended: for how can the soldier hope, which feeth his captain despaire? or adventure, where the chieftain seemes to be strucke with scare ? Whilest the Grand Master with this answer doth both ashame them and also en- G. courage their quailing minds; the Turks (that this day as the other three before should not passe without assault) with the dawning of the day assailed the very same places with the greek test fury possible, especially at the ruines of the castle: where San Romann an Auergnois, which had the charge of that place, loft this short and transitory life, winning thereby immortall fame: and at S. Michaels, Adurnius one of the knights, and Fagio with certain others, were grieuously wounded : for the enemy suddenly retiring from the assault, presently so thundred in to the breaches with their great and small shot, that all the Island seemed to tremble, the hear uens to burne, and the aire to be darkned with smoke. In the mean time Valetta thorowly weath ried with the mornings fight, had withdrawne himselse a little to breath himselse: when sid. ing out, That all was lost and forlorne, and that three or four enfignes of the enemies were by the castle breach broken into the towne. Which the Great Master hearing, suddenly clapt his The comforta- helmet upon his head, and with a pike in his hand, faid unto them that were about him, Let fellow soldiers, the houre is come wherein you may shew your selues the most valiant Champions of the Chriwhen the Turks stian religion, if it be so, that you now also retaine the same valour which you have in other battels showed There is no cause wherefore you should doubt of this last, for the enemy is the same ; and the same God which hath hitherto preserved us, will not now for sake us . Wherefore follow me, valiant hearts. This faid he hasted to the place where most danger was, and with him all the fouldiers, all the cititens men & women,old and yong, yea, the very children, all against the common enemy. There was fought a most dreadfull and dangerous battell: some kept the enemy from entring, some 1 fet voon those that were already entred, whom they wounded, chased, and slew, although they notably relifted. Within, without, all was coucred with weapons, darts, dead bodies, and bloud. The Great master was carefull of all, and in enery place present, commending, exhorting, dire-Ring, as occasion required, performing at once all the duties of a most valiant soldier and work thy Generall. At length the Turks with the fetting of the Sun retired, and fo the affault cea-The Turks with sed. Thus was the Great Master the vindoubted victor, but not without much bloud of his great flaughter people, confidering his small number: for in this fight he lost about 200 men, whereas of the enemies, beside them which were entred, whereof not one escaped, were slaine about 2000.

These are those source terrible assaults, presently given one after another vnto the besieged. GarZias the Viceroy in the mean time tarried for nothing els to transport his army to Malta, K but for the comming of Io, Cardona, who with twelve gallies was gone to Panormo, to conduct thence foure ships laded with provision: but when he saw him stay long, he sent to him in post, That if he could not with such speed as was required tow forth those ships, he should spend no longer time, but take out the prouision into his gallies, and with speed to come away. So the Viceroy with a fleet of 72 gallies the twentieth day of August set forward from Messana to Syracufa, wherein he carried ten thousand select soldiers, amongst whom were about two hundred Kuights of the Order of S. lohn, and aboue forty of the Order of S. Stephen, which is an Order of Knights instituted by Cosmos Medices, Duke of Florence, to the imitation of the Knights of Malta, in the yeare 1561, and have their residence at Cosmopolis, a new built city in the Island of Elba in the Tuscane sea, over against Piombino, Besides these Knights, in this L fleet were divers noble and valiant gentlemen of Italy, Sicily, and other countries. The fleet being arrived at Syracufa, the Viceroy fent Auria with one gally and a boat to Malta, to land a man, to know of Paccias (left, as we have before faid, for a watch in the Island of Maleca) what newes, or what he had seene. By whom it was understood, That no ship was seen at sea, but one galliot, which the one and twentieth day of August in the morning made towards Gaulos, and the same day towards night as he was informed by the watchmen of Maleca, sixteene gallies came to water at Saline, but what became of them afterwards, by reason of the comming on of the night could not be descried.

In this while the besieged had notably repaired the breach at the castle buswarke, and had in fundry places aprly placed certain great pieces to flanker the ditches, &to beat the mount cast M vp by the enemy at the bulwarke of Boninfegna, that they might from thence annoy all the plain of the castle with their smal shot. But the Turks having determined with all their sorces at once to affault both the townes as before, brought an engine made of spars and boords, able to couer thirty men, under the breach at S. Michaels; whereby it came to passe, that none of the defendants could without danger thew themselves in the breach; which when they could by no means endure, they fuddenly fallied out, and putting them to flight which were there coue. red fet fire on the engine and burnt it. In like manner, they which befreged the new city, were repulsed at the castle breach, & another like engine burnt. The next night certain of the watch of the castle issued out, and having destroied the Turks engines prepared for the assailing of that place, and flaine them that were fet for the keeping thereof, returned in fafety into the cafile. But when the enemies both that day and others following rested not, but repairing their mines, mounts, and engines, laboured in both places to have beaten the Christians from the wals: all their endeuour and labour was by the industry and valor of the defendants made frustrate. The besieged had at the castle breach made a mine, & laid in it eight barrels of pouder, A mire of the B that if the enemy should againe assault that place, he might there be blowne vp: but whilst the byte livet,

Turks were for like purpose working a mine in the same place, they chanced upon the mine before made, which they spoiled, and carried away all the pouder. Thus whilest they labour both on the one side and the other, Mustapha the Generall, a most expert and famous commander considering that Summer now so far spent, he was not to vie longer delay; and withal, that resolute perseuerance oftentimes in war findeth out a way to victory; determined with all his nower once againe to affault the castle S. Michael, Wherefore displaying the stately standard The Turke de. of the Turkish Emperor, vpon the point whereof was fastened a globe of Gold, he comman. Beratly faste ded his fouldiers to enter the breach; who now like desperat men attempted to have perfor- s. s. s. stichael, med his command, and were by the Christians valiantly encountred: so that in the breach was C made a most terrible & doubtful fight. But when the Turks had now bin twice rejected & beaten downe, Mustapha perceiuing his foldiers as men halfe discouraged, but faintly to maintain the affault, came himfelf to the places, praying and exhorting them not to be discouraged, but that day to confirme their former labors and victories; and not to suffer their vanquished enemies to triumph ouer them: he told them that the enemy had now no defence left wherewith to couer himselfe, that all was beaten down flat, and that there remained only a few weary and maimed bodies, which were not able long to indure the edge of their fwords; that with fuch resolution they had before won the castle S. Elmo. last of all, he by promising to some mony, to some honor and preferment, threatning some, and requesting others, incouraged some one way, some another, enery one according to his quality and disposition: who moved either with D their Generals presence, promises, or threats, gaue a fresh and sierce assault. The fight was on both fides retrible, yet at length the Turks were againe inforced to retire : for the defendants the Turks enhad cast up a rampier, wherein they had fitly placed two field pieces, wherwith they fore trou. forced to retire, bled the enemy, and at the first shor struck in funder one of those woodden engines, which the enemy had made stronger than the rest, couered with raw hides to keep it from burning, and rent in pieces forty fouldiers which were under it; and the same night they which were in the other towngand the castle bulwarke, sallying couragiously out, destroied all the enemies defences, and drawe them from a mount which they had made upon the fortifications of the Christians whereby they perceived plainly, what small courage the Turks had to fight, for vpon that mount they were almost 200, wheras of our men were but 25, with which small num-E ber for all that they had no mind to deale. The defendants had for like purpose as before, made another mine at the castle bulwarke, but perceiving that it was in danger to be found by the enemy in repairing his fortifications without, they fuddenly put fire vnto it, by force whereof threefcore Turks which were within the danger of the place, were blowne up and flaine. Garzias the Viceroy, in the mean while that these things were in doing, departing with his fleet from Syracula, with a prosperous wind kept on his course toward Pachynum, where they descried a tall thip at sea, driven thither (as was afterward knowne) by tempest: shee out of the Island Mening was carrying a great supply of thot and pouder vino the Turks campe at Malta; but now ouertaken by the Christian sleet, casily yeelded, and was by the Viceroy sent by other mariners to Syracufa. And now the Christian fleet carried with a faire gale towards F Malta, fuddenly arose such a tempest from the East, that they were driven to the Island Ægu. The Christian

The same day also a Christian fled out of the Turks gallies, wherein he was captine, to the city S. Angele; who reported, That in the Turks camp were few men able to fight, most of the army being with wounds, famine, siekenesse, and other G mileries brought to extreame weakenesse: and besides that, that infinit numbers of them died daily: yet for all that he faid moreouer, that they were determined to be fiege the city of Melita, and had already for that purpose mounted fine great pieces of artillery for battery and that they had but a few daies before taken twelue, and the last day of all fourteene horimen of the garrifon fouldiers of that city. In the meane while the fleet which was driven (as we faid) to Ægusa, the rage of the sea being now well appeased, came to Drepanum, and from thence toward Gaulos, as was before intended: whereby the way the two gallies of Malta lightypon two galliots, and tooke them.

The fifth day of September the Christian fleet came to Gaulos, where the Viceroy perceiuing not the appointed fignes from Malta, whereby he might fafely land, returned forthwith H backe againe to Pozalo, whither Auria immediatly following him, told him, That he had feen the fignes, and affured him of fafe landing in the Island of Malta: wherewith the Viceroy encouraged, the next day towards night returned agains to Gaulos.

The same day a Christian captine fled from the Turks to S. Augelo, and told the Great master. That he was come to bring him good newes, how that the Turks had determined to proue for mile Great their last fortune in assaulting the castle S. Michael, which they would do the next day; where if the successe were answerable to their desire, they would then tarry; but if not, then forthwith to be gone : and that Mustapha the more to encourage his fouldiers, had promised fluetalents of gold to the enfigne bearers, that should first advance their enfignes upon the wals, and farther to promote them to greater places of honour; as for the reft, he would reward every one of them according to their deferts, either with mony or preferment. Valetta thinking all these things to be by Gods appointment discouered vnto him by such men, as they had from time to time bin : first gaue thanks unto Almighty God; and after that, with all diligence prepared such things as he thought most necessary for the repulsing of the enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great ordnance battered the new city, and the shipping in the hauen, in fuch fort that one of the great thips was there funke.

In the morning Garzias the Viceroy with his fleet arrived at the I fland of Malta, and there rivers at Mal- quickly and quietly landed his forces, and whileft his gallies watered at Gaulos, went forward ta, and landeth with the army about halfe a mile, instructing the Generals and Colonels, what he thought needfull to be done, commanding all proclamations and commands to be made in the name K of the King of Spaine, untill they came to the Great master, and then in all things to obey him as their Soueraigne : and charged Afcanius Cornia the Generall, in all his actions to follow the counsell of the greater part. So, in few words exhorting them to play the mentioneless them marching towards Melita. About noone he retired to his gallies, and failing Eastward, came with all his fleet within the fight of the city of Melita, about a miles distant from the South thore. They of the city upon fight of the fleet, in token of joy discharged all the great artillery, which was answered from the fleet, by discharging all their great ordnange swice. After that, he returned as he had before determined into Sicilia, to take into his galligethe Duke of Vibins companies, which were come to Meffana, and certain bands of Spaniards at Syracufa, and so forthwith to return to Malta, to attend the departing of the Turke fleet, being now cuil I appointed, and already as good as halfe oneithrownes and adversing of the adversariant and

The Turks, who (as is before faid) had purposed to prove their last fortune you, the towne of S. Michael, had now certaine dales before the comming of the fleet, begun to truffe up their baggage: but as foon as they heard that the fleet was come, and the army landed, there suddenly arose a wonderfull tumultuous confusion among it them; some cried, Arme, arme, and otherfome as fast to be gone : and being generally all afraid, every one according to his disposition, betook himselse to his weapons or to his heels, the greatest number thrust together into their trenches as neere as they could vnto the great ordnance; and fo burning the engines and fortifications, with all the speed they could imbarked their great ordnance and baggage. Which they in the town of S. Angelo perceiuing, not expecting the commandement of the Great ma- M fler in so sudden an opportunity, couragiously sallied out to Burmola, where certaine Turks kept a huge great piece of ordnance; who now having no mind to fight; betooke themselves to flight, and for fooke the piece, which they of the town prefently drew within their wals and if the new come forces had that day charged the enemy as they disorderly ran to their gallies, pily they had found an occasion of victory, or at leastwise taken from them the greatest part of their artillery. But it may be they followed the old military faying, That vnto the flying Enemy a that should make a bridge of filter. Besides that, they strinking it not contenient to depart from the prouision and things which they had brought for reliefe of the belieged. (which for the roughner of the way and want of horles were hardly earled) would not prouoke the enemy with any skirmish: wherby it came to passe that the Turks without let imbarqued their great ordnance, their baggage, and most part of their army. The 11 of September, whilst the Turks fleetwas brought out of the hauen Marza Moxet, a fugitive of Genoa came in haft to the Great Master and told him, that 10000 Turks were marching toward Melita, to meet with the Christians upon the way. Which thing the Great Master hearing, presently fent a They are ford B sufficient number of good soldiers to the castle S. Elmo, there to set up one of the ensignes of sate the fire. the facred Order who comming thither, found 24 great pieces, some for battery, some for the field, which they could not in fo great hast remoue thence.

The Turks fleet departing out of the haven Marza Moxet to the port of S. Paul there landed 7000 men, with Muftapha their General, who was fallly informed, that the Christians were not about 3000 ftrong; and from thence incouraged with the small number of the enemy (as they supposed) they marched directly toward Melita. The Christians also marching orderly and ready to give battel, held on their way to meet them, and at the rifing of a hilboth armies meeting together they gave a great shout, and withall the formost began the battell. where some few were at the first slain on both sides. But the Christians stil growing vpon TheTarksoner-C them both in number and ftrength, the Turks finding themselves ouercharged, fled, the Chri- thrown by the filans pursuing an 1 killing them til they came to their gallies, where in striuing who should part fil Malta get first in, about 400 of them were drowned in the sea, besides 1800 flain in the battel at land. And had the Christian souldiers welknown the Country, they had slain them enery mothers son. The Turks thus driven to their gallies, lay there in the haven all the next day, and most part of the night following; but a little before day, vpon the shooting off of a great piece, the figne of their departure, they all hoifed fail for Grecia, leaving the Island of Malta fore impouerished and wasted. In this siege the Turks lost about four and twenty thousand, wherof most part were of their best soldiers. And of the Christians were slain about 5000 besides two hundred and forty Knights of the Order, men of divers Nations, but all worthy of eternal fame, whose dead bodies the great Master caused to be honourably buried. The Turkes in their battery during the fiege, spent as is truly accounted, threescore and eighteene thousand great shot.

If a man do wel confider the difficulties and dangers the befreged passed thorow in these five months siege, the manifold labors and perils they indured in so many and so terrible Asfaults; the smal relief to them sent in so great distres, with the desperate obstinacy of so puisfant an enemy the shall hardly find any place these many years more mightily impugned, or with greater valor and resolution desended. The late besieged, but now victorious prince, honorably acquired of fo great an enemy, first commanded publique prayers with thanksgiving to be made unto the Giver of all victory. After that he rewarded the valiant, commended the E rest, and gaue thanks to all : he charitably relieved the fick and wounded, bewailed the spoyle Thegranicals. of the Island, & carefully prouided for the repairing of the breaches and places battered; and flers care. yet in all this doing diligently inquired after the Enemies course and purpose, and was not in any thing remisse and secure, as in victory most men are. But because so great harmes could not without great helps in short time be repaired, and the returne of the proud Enemy not without cause the next year seared; he by letters to divers great princes, and especially to the grand Priors of the Order in divers countries, requested help: amongst whom George Grand Prior of Germany, and founder of the Castle of S. Elmo, was one of the chiefest. The copy of which letters, because they briefly contain what wee haue before in this history at large written, I have thought good here to let down, that the same may in such order be read, as it was F by the Great Master himself reported.

Brother

Brother Valetta, Master of the Hospitall of Ierusalem, to the reverend and religious our welbeloued brother in Christ, George of Hohenheim, called Bombaft, Prior of our Priory in Almainie, greeting.

Ethough we doubt not but that by the letters and relation of many, you already understand of the A comming of the Turks to inuade these Islands, or rather viterly to subvert our Societie: And the or of Atmaine, happily and heavenly victory by vs obtained of it yet if the same things shal by our letters also be brought conserning the varie you, we have thought the same will be unto you at hing much more pleasing. For seeing that we are manner of the certainly persuaded, that you in this no lesse happy than wholsome successe will give most hearty thanks to diver in the Almightic God, and that the fruit of this good shall most of all redound unto you, for the honour which you beare in our Order, we have willingly determined to participate this our ion with you and plainely and on penly to protest. That we attribute this so notable and wonderfull a victorie to our Lord Christ Iesm, the greateft King of all Kings, and author of all good things. Which that you may the more worthily and willinely do, we will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an Hiftory) but briefly and in few words. Sultan Solyman the most mortall enemy of the Christian name, and especially of our Socisiety, not contented to have foiled us of the famous Island of the Rhodes, the castle of Tripolis, and almost what soener we hadel se commanded a great and strong fleet to be made ready against vs which departing from Constantinople the one and twentieth day of March, arrived here the eighteenth day of May Which fleet confifted of almost two hundred and sifty gallies, galliets, and other ships. The number of the enemy that bare armes, according to the truth, was about forty thousand more or lesse. Generall of the land forces, was Mustapha Bassa; and of the fleet, Piall Bassa was Admirall: who having spent a few daies in lan. ding their forces viewing the places pitching their tents, and letting things in order (as the maner of war is) they began first to affaile the castle of S. Elmo (scituat in the mouth of the hanen) with great force and a most furious battery Which when they had many dates don without intermission, and had opened a great Part of the wall, and with all kind of weapons affaulted the breach: yet was it by the valour and proweffe of our Knights and other worthy fouldiers, kept and defended by the space of thirty fine dates with the great loffe and flang beer of the enemy: although the cafile it felfe in the indeement of many, feemed not possible 20 be but a few daies defended against so great a force. At lings h the foure & swenties h day of Inne, when K our men could no longer endure the multitude and fury of the enemy, environed and fout up both by fea and land, and destitute of all help, the castle was taken by the Turks; those few of our men which were left, being all staine. Of which victorie they being proud, began to be siege the castle and towne of S. Michael. and this new city, especially at the castle and Portingall Bulwarke: and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great Artillery and warlike engines, they began in diners places at once to batter and beat downe the wals. Which siege, the dreadfull army of the Turks by sea and land made to be most fearfull and terrible, with (uch huge great Ordnance, as the like for bignes and force was in no place to be seene : day and night thundring out their gron and stone shot, five and seven hands about wherewith not the thickest wals but even the very mountains them selves might have bin beaten down and onerthrowne : by fury whereof, the wals in many places were so battered that a man might easily hancentred as on plain ground. Where when the barbarous enemies had with wonderfull force and hideous outcries oftentimes attempted to enter to often were they with great flaughter and diffenor repulsed and bea. ten back, many of their men flaine or wounded. Their Generals, as well at fea as land, after that they had in somany places, with all their forces in almost foure moneths sleepe and a sault with exceeding fury in vain attempted the breaches, and loft the greatest part of their old souldiers, especially Winter now comming on, wherein all warres by law of nations ought to cease thought of nothing else but of departure, or rather of flight: which the comming of Garzius of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admiral of the King of Spaine his fleet, with sen thousand select souldiers (among it whom was at the lest two hundred and fourteene of our Knights, and many other noble and valiant Gentlemen; which only with a Christia an zeale, voluntarily met together from diners parts of the World to help and reliene us) cansed them to M. baften. So have you summarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turks fleet, and the vi-Every by vi (by the power of God) theref obtained It shall be your part to consider and coniecture, in what

A state our Order and this I sland now standeth, into what poor estate we are brought, how many things wee want : wherin except we be relieved by the help and aid of our brethren, effecially such as you are, as wee well hope and affuredly believe we final, our State will quickly take end. Farewell.

From Maltathe ninth of October, 1565.

The great Master thus deliuered of so great a siege, and bountifully relieued by the Christian Princes, and the great Commanders of his Order, speedily repaired the breaches & places battered, and with new fortifications strengthned those places as he had by the late passed dangers perceived to be most subject to the enemies force.

After the return of the Turks fleet to Constantinople, Solyman being exceeding angry with 1566 the gouernor of the Island of Chios his tributary, as wel for that he had during the late siege of Malta had intelligence with the great Mafter, and reuealed vnto him many of the Turkes designes; as also for detaining of two years tribute, which was 20000 ducats; and had also neglected to fend his wonted presents to the great Bassa's, who therefore the more insenced the Tyrant, commanded Fial Baffahis Admiral to make ready his fleet, and by force or policy to take that fruitful & pleafant Island into his own hand. Who without delay with a fleet of 80 gallios the 15 of April, An. 1566, being then Easterday, arrived at Chios. The chiefe men of the Island upon fight of the fleet, forthwith sent Embassadors to the Bassa with Prefents, courtequily offering vnto him the hauen, and what foeuer elfe he should require. Piak C withkindnes accepted their offer, and prefently possessed himselfe of the hauen in three places: and afterwards landing, fent for the Gouernour of the City and twelue of the chiefe Citilens to come to him, as if he had some speciall matter to confer with them about from the great Sultanibefore his departure thence for Malta or Italy. Who having a little conferd together, went to him with great feare; and that not without cause; for as soone as they were come before him, he commanded them to be laid hold voon & cast fast into yrons: which don, the fouldiers forthwith took the towne hall, and without refiftance pulling down the townes The Island of enfigne (wherein was the picture of S. George with a red Croffe) in stead thereof fer up one of chioi rates by the Turks: the like whereof was done with great rejoyeing of the Turks, through the whole the Turks. Island. After that, they rifled the Churches, and again consecrated them after their Maho-D metan manner. The Gouernour of the City, and the Senators, with their families, the Baffa fent in fine thips to Constantinopleias for the vulgar people, they were at choice, either there to tarry stil, or depart, as best stood with their liking. And so the Bassa, when he had there plased a new Gouernour, one of the Turks, with a strong garrison, and set up the Mahometane supersition in that most fertile Island, departed thence for Italy : where failing along it the coast of Apulia, he did exceeding much harm in burning and destroying the country villages. and carrying away of the poore people into captivity; and fo returned.

At this time the kingdome of Hungary was most miserably rent in pieces by the seutenants and captains of Solyman and Maximilian the Emperour, and John the Vayuod of Transiluania Solymans vaffall i who grieued with the harmes done vnto him by the Emperours Cap-B. taines, whereof himselfe was the cause, and vainly hoping to have obtained at Solymans bands the greatest part of the kingdome of Hungary, as had somtime king tohn; ceased not continually to folicite him to come himselse in person to make a full conquest of the reliques of Hungary, yet holden by the Emperour and some of the Hungarian Nobility : and flattering himselse in that vain hope, called himselse the king of Hungary : and increasing his Arength by letters who the Nobility and Burgeffes of the city of Hungary, fummoned them, as if it had bin by the appointment of Solyman his great Patron, that they should all the ninth of March meet together at Thorda, to determine with him of matters concerning their commongood. Which thing as foon as Lazarus Saendi the Emperours lieutenant vaderstood, he forthwith by other letters countermined those of the Vayuods; persuading the Hungarians not to liften to the charmes of the Vayuod and Turk, tending to their destruction, but rather to yeeld their obedience to Maximilian the Christian emperor, whose purpose was by the ayd of the Christian princes to protect & preserve them in peace; and hereby it came to passe, that the remainders of this fore shaken kingdom, divided into factions, and diversly caried, according to their affection, some to one side, some to the other, began afresh to work one anothers confusion, which fitly served the Turks to incroach more and more upon them . Who at the G The Turk for- fame time surprised the towns of Ainatich (the captains whereof, with certain of the garrison foldiers being gon about their busines to Agria) & put to the sword all them that they found in the town. They thought also to have taken the strong town of Sigeth, but were by the valiant County Nicholam Serenm gouernor therof, couragiously encountred, and after foure bours hard fight ouerthrown and put to flight. Nor long after, they ranged vp and down the country, and fee in booties as far as Iula and Rab, and did the countrey people much harme. For which cause Maximilian the Emperorabout the later end of May brake up the affembly of the Empire then holden at Augusta, and began carefully to provide all things needfull for the war. appointing his captains for the raising of such forces in Germany, as were but a little before granted vnto him by the Princes and States of the Empire, in their late affembly, but went H himselse to Vienna. For it was told him (as the truth was) that Solyman now in his extreme age was with a mighty army fet forward from Constantinople, and marching through Bulgaria and Seruia was come directly to Belgrade, where tohn the Vayuod of Transiluania met him and kissing his hand, had commended himself and all his state vnto his protestion. At which time Suendi the Emperours lieutenant laid hard fiege to the towne of Husth in the borders of Transiluania. The Bassa of Buda at the same time on the other side, by commandment of sale. man, with 8000 Turks and 25 pieces of great Ordnance belieging Palotta (a ftrong towness. bout eight miles from Rab) had with continuall battery by the space of eight dayes brought the same into greatdanger, although it was valiantly desended by George Thuriger. Buthesring of the approch of George County of Helffenstein, fent by the Emperor with certain com-The road facces panies of Germans to relieve the same, he rose in such bast from the siege, that he lest certain of the emperors of his great Ordnanco and a great part of his baggage behind him, and retyred towards Alba Regalis. The County having relieved the towne, caused the breaches to be forthwith repayred, and with a new supply strengthned the old garrison. Thus was a most lamentable war at once begun in divers places of Hungary. After that the County of Helffenstein strengthned by the comming of the County Salma with cermin companies from Rab, departed from Palotta, and came to Vesprinium, a city about two miles off, then holden by the Turks : which city he tooke by force the last of June, and left not a Turke alive therein, because that they a few dayes before had cruelly flain certain Christians whom they had taken prisoners. So leauing strong garrisons both in Vesprinium and Palotta, they returned to Rab. Shortly after, x the County Salma laid fiege to Tatta a strong town, otherwise called Dotis, betwirt Raband Comara, which at length he took by affault the 28 of July, and flew, al the Turks except fifty, who flying into one of the towers of the castle, yeelded upon composition, among whom was the late gouernor of Vesprinium, and the gouernor of this place, with the Bassa of Buda his nigh kinfman, who were all presently sent prisoners to Vienna. So the County following the course of his victory (the terror of his former good fortune running before him into the Turks Arongest holds) was on his way to have belieged Gestes a town neer Palotta; when the Turks there in garrison, vpon the first sight of his army left all and fled out at the farther side of the town to Strigonium. After whole example other of the Turks Garrisons in With, Tichokiku, and Sambok, castles therabout, set fire on that they could not carry, and followed their I fellows to Strigonium alfo. The Emperor understanding of the good succes of his captaines, caused publique prayers with thankingining to almighty God to be made in all the churches

> County Serinus, Gouernour of the firong town of Sigeth and the countrey thereabout, certainly advertised of the comming of Solyman, sent Casharus Alapianus and Nicolas Cobach, two of his Captaines, with a thousand footmen and 500 horse, to lie in wait for the foremoners of the Turks Army, who drawing neer unto the place where these Turkes lay, not farre from Quinque Ecclesia, suddenly in the shutting in of the next day set upon them, when they doubted no fuch matter, and put them in fuch fear that they diforderly fied, some one way, some another, and were most of them slain or wounded by the Hungarians in their slight. Ha. M by Beg one of the Turks great Sanzacks, and leader of that Company, fore wounded, and feeking to faue himselse by slight in the marishes, there perished. His son and many other notable men amongst the Turkes, were taken and carried prisoners unto Sigeth. The spoyle the Hungarians there took was exceeding great, for besides plate and coyne, whereof they

A found good store, they took eight camels, five mules, fixty horses, and fix carts laden with all maner of spoil, and many garments of great price, wherin the gentlemen attyred, returned to Sigeth in great brauery, with two fair red enfignes of the enemy.

Maximilian the Emperour long before advertised of Solymans purpose for the conquest of the remainder of Hungary; to withfrand to mighty an enemy, had beside the forces raised in his own dominions, procured great aid both of the states of the empire and other Christian Princes, which about this time met together at Rab. First there repaired thither four legions of German footmen, and vpwards of 20000 horsemen, with 4000 Hungarians. The duke of Sauoy fent thither 400 Argoletiers, and many noble gentlemen out of divers parts of Europ reforted thither, to serve the Emperour in those Wars of their owne charge; especially the B Knights of Malta: and out of Italy Profer Columna and Angelus Casim. Out of France, Guise the grand Prior, Briffack, and Lanfack; who but a little before were going to Malta, of purpose to have served there, if the Turks seet had come thither again, as it was reported it would: but understanding that it came not, returned directly into Hungary, with certain Knights of the Order. Many also of the Princes and free Cities of Italy declared their good wil toward the Emperor in this War; some sending him men, as did Cosmus Medices Duke of Florence. who fent thither of his own charge three thouland footmen. Some mony as Mantua, Genoa, and Luca. Thithercame also Alphonian Duke of Ferrara with a gallant company of Noble Gentlemen and other his followers. Beside which land forces, the Emperour had also pronided upon the river of Danubius twelve Gallies, and thirty other thips for burthen, fo made, as C that the men could not be hurt by the Turks arrows. Wherin were imparqued three thoufand fouldiers; most part Italians, under the conduct of Philippus Flachius a Germane and one of the Kuights of Malta, who was afterwards received into the number of the Princes of the Empire.

Soleman comming to the river Dranus, commanded a bridge to be made over that great ri. The Turker tier, and the deep fens on the farther side of the river toward Sigeth, for the transporting of his with much sating, a work of such difficulty, that being thrice vnfortunars, begun, it was again given ouer bridge our the arathing almost impossible. Wherwith Solyman was so moduled, that in his rage he swore to view Drains. haug vo the great Baffa that had the charge of that work, if he did not with as much (peed as were possible bring it to perfection. Wherupon the work was again begun, all the boats that were to be found in the river taken vp, & timber for the purpose brought from far for the making of that bridge. In this work were imploied not the vulgar people only, in the Countrey which was tributary to the Turks, but the gentlemen themselves also were by the imperious Turk (now commanding for his life) inforced to lay their fingers to work day and night without cealing, until the bridge (which before was thought scarle possible to have bin made) was by the reftleffe industry and labor of such a multitude of men, in the space of ten daies perfe-Acd. Wherein the severity the barbarous Tyrant vseth toward his subjects is worth the noting, wherby he extorteth from them more than is almost possible for men to perform so that it is not to be maruelled that he hath to good fucces in whatfocuer he taketh in hand. Ouer this bridge (a mile in length) palfed Solyman, and incamped at a place called Mohatez, where he staied certain daies vitil his Army was all come ouer. The last of July, ninety thousand Turks (the vantgard of Solymans Army) came before Sigeth, and incamped within a mile of the Town. After whom thortly after followed an hundred thousand more out of Solymans The Turblis.

camp : of whom many approaching the town, were flain with great that out of the Caffle, The same before rest for all that quickly incamped rhemselves as neer vnto the town as they could, and began the fiege.

The town of Sigeth is firongly scituate in a marish on the North side of Dranus, upon the frontiers of Dalmatia commanding all the country round about, which of it takes name, and was at that time a strong bulwark against the Turks, for entring farther into the countrey that way toward Styria. In this town was gouernor Nicolaus Sering; commonly called the Coun-F ty, a valiant man and a mortal enemy of the Turk, with a garifon of 2300 good foldiers: who feeing the hugy army of the Turks, called together the Captaines of the Garrison with the chief of the Citisens into the Calife, where standing in the midstof them he spake to them as followeth:

Ton fee (faid he) how we are on enery fide befet with the multitude of our enemies, wher in refistheir G chief hope. But let not we be therof afraid or discouraged, for that wittory dependeth not of a confused multitude of heartlesse men, but of the power of God, who hath by a few at his pleasure of times autrome the mighty armies of the proud, and will not in the midst of these dangers now for sake us, if we putting our trust and considence in him, doe what beseemeth valiant and couragious men. Besides that our inst our trust anaconstants of the place we hold, our own valour, and the help of our friends, who I affare my felf will not fail us at our need, counternaileth their confused multitude, forced together by their imperious commanders out of far countries, and what socuer els the Tyrant hath brought with him into the field. Wherfore let vs all as becommeth valiant men, for the truth of our Religion, and the honor of our prince and country, line and die together : knowing what soener befall, that to a life so lost, beside neuer dying fame, belongeth a most assured hope of ion and felicity. As for my self, I am resolved (as I hope you are al. H 6) that as I am a Christian, and free born, so will I by the grace of God, in the same faith and freedome end end my daies. Neither fault the proud Turk, so long as I am able to hold up this hand, have ever power to command over me or the ground wheren I fland.

This faid, he first took himself a solemn oath to perform what he had promised, & persuaded the rest to take the like. Which don, every man returned to the place of his charge.

The fift of August Solyman incamped within a mile of the Town, and the next day after came himself into the camp; at whose comming the great Ordnance and small shot so thundred out of the Turks camp, as if heaven and earth should have gon together, the Turks after their wonted maner crying aloud, their Alla, Alla, and the Christians answering them with the name of Iesus. The seuenth of August the Turks cast up a great mount, and theron planted certain great pieces of ordnance. The next day following they began most terribly to batter the new town in three places, and with incredible labor caft vp a mount in the midft of the marth, as it were in the town dirchiftom whence they the next day with certain pieces of great artillery day & night battered the inner castle of the town without any intermission. and did great harm both to the castle and desendants. The County perceining the new City to be now so laid open with the tury of the Turks battery, as that it was not possible to be de-The defendants fended, caused his foldiers to set it all on fire, and to retyre into the old. The tenth of August the Turks furiously battered the old town in three places, and brought their ordnance into the new town, and with timber, earth and rubbish made a bridge, the more commodiously to go ouer the marish. For the speedier accomplishment wherefall the Turkes were compelled to lay to their hands, and to carry wood, fagots, earth, and fuch like things without ceasing. There might a man haue seen all the fields ful of camels, horses, and of the Turks themselves, like emmets, carrying wood, earth, stones, or one thing or other to fill up the marish. So was there with wonderful labor two plain waies made thorow the deepe fen, from the town to the castle:where the Ianizaries, defended from the great shot with sacks of Wooll and such like things, did with the multitude of their small shot so overwhelme the defendants, that they could not against those places without manifest danger shew themselves voon the wals. So that what by their vigilant industry, and the fury of their great artillery, the Turks (although The Terke win not without great loffe) by force entred the old town the 19 of August vling in their victory 1 fuch celerity, that they flew many of the most valiant defendants before they could recourt: the fafegard of the castle. Both the towns thus lost and so many worthy men flain, not without cause brought great heatines upon the rest which were in the castle with the county. The Turks possessed of the old Town, the next day planted their battery against the castle in four places, and with fagots, rubbish, and earth, made two plain ways to it, still filling up the marsh; and having with continual battery made it faultable, the 29 of August they began fiercely to affail the breaches:but when they had loft many of their men, and don what they could, they were inforced with shame to retyre. In this affault, among many other of their peft foldiers, was lost one of their great Bassa's also. Whilft these things were in doing, Solyman far spent with years, and distempered with his M Solyman dieth long trauel, fel fick of a loofnes of his belly, and the better to recougr his health, retyred himof ite blandy felf (the fiege yet continuing) to Quinque Ecolefie a City neer to Sigeth, where shortly after he died of the bloudy flix the fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord God 1566, when he had lived 76 years, and therof reigned fix and forty. He was of statute tall, of scatture

A slender, long necked, his colour pale and wan, his nose long and hooked, of nature ambitious and bountifull, more faithfull of his word and promise than were for most part the Mahometan Kings his progenitors; wanting nothing worthy of fo great an empire, but that wherin all happines is contained, Faith in Christ Ielus. Muhamet the Vizier Bassa (who all commaunded in Solymans absence) fearing the insolencie of the Ianizaries, and lest some tumult should arise in the camp, if his death should be known, conceased it by all meanes; and to be sure of shem that were of all others best able to make certaine report thereof, caused his Physitians and Apothecaries to be secretly strangled; and by a trusty messenger sent in post, certified Selamon (Solamans elders fon, and his father in law, then lying at Magnefia) of the death of his father; willing him in hast to repair to Constantinople, to take possession of the Empire; and B that don forthwith to come to the army in Hungary. But this could not be so secretly done. but that the Ianizaries began to suspect the matter: which Muhamet Bassa quickly perceiving, caused the dead body of Solyman in his wonted apparel to be brought into his tent, sitting vp. right in his horf-litter, as if he had bin fick of the gout his wonted difeafe; & fo shewing him to the Janizaries, both deceived and contented them, and so the siege went forward.

The lanizaries having in the last assault lost many of their fellowes, began now to under Thegreat Bul. mine the greatest bulwark of the castle, from which the defendants with their great ordnance mined and fidid most annow them: wher in they vsed such diligence, that the fift of September they with red by the law gunpouder and other light matter provided for that purpose, had fet all the bulwarke on a nigethi. light fire and by that means possest therof with all their force assailed the bulwark next vnto C the castle gate from whence they were with great slaughter twice repulsed by the County. But the raging fire stil increasing he was inforced with those which were yet left aliue. to retyre into the inner caftle, wherin was but two great pieces, and 14 others of small force. Thus The title Cal. the Turks still prevailing, and taking one place after another, the 7 of September they furiou. Master street fly affaulted the little Castle, wherinto they cast such abundance of fire that in short time it caught hold of the buildings, and fet all on fire. The county thus affailed by the enemy with-

ty to retyre to went into his chamber, where putting on a rich new fuit of apparel, came prefently out again with his fword and target in his hand, and finding his foldiers with cheerful countenance & their weapons in their hands attending his comming, spake vnto them these D few his last words: The hard fortune of this finful king dom hath together withour own overtaken vis but let us, noble hearts, with patience endure what soener is to us by God assigned. You know what we have before promifed which hisherso God be shanked we have accordingly performed, and now let us with like resplation perform this last. The place you see is not longer to be kept the deuouring fire groweth to still upon us, and we in number are but few. Wher fore let us as becommeth valiant men break out into the utter castle there to die in the midst of our enemies, to line afterwards with God for ener: I will be the first that will go out follow you me like men. This faid, with his fword and target in his hand, without any other armor, calling thrice vpon the name of Iesus, hee issued out at the Castle gate, with the rest following him: where valiantly fighting with the lanizaries upon the bridge, and hauing stain some of them, he was first wounded in two places of his body with a small shot, and serious fairs.

B at last strook in the head with an valueky shot, fell downe dead : the Turks for joy crying out their wonted word Alla. The rest of the soldiers in slying back again into the Castle, were all flainby the Turks, except fome few, whom fome of the Ianizaries in regard of their valour, by putting their caps upon their heads faued from the fury of the reft. In this fiege the Turks (as themselves reported) lost 7000 Ianizaries, and 28000 other soldiers, beside many voluntary mennot involled in their muster books, and three of their great Bassa's. Serinus his head was presently cutoff, and the next day, with the heads of the other slain Christians, set vpon poles for all the army to gaze upon. After that, it was taken down, and by Muhamet the great Baffa Settimberd 4 fent to Multapha the Baffa of Buda his kinfman who by two country men fent it wrapped in fent to Connel a red scarf covered with a fair linnen cloth to County Salma in the Emperours camp at Rab.

F with this taunting letter thus directed;

Muhamet Balla to Eccius Salma, Greeting.

In token of my lone, behold here I send thee the head of a most resolute and valiant Captain thy friend the remainder of his body I have boneftly buried as became fuch a man. Sigeth bids thee farmel for ever. G

The death of this noble and valiant Captaine was much lamented of all the Christian Army, and his head with many tears by his son Balthafar honorably buried among his Ancestors in Tschacaturna his own castle. Solyman at his comming with this mighty Army into Huggary, had purposed before his return, if he had not bin by death preuented, to have conquered gary to a purpose of the kingdom of Hungary, and to have again attempted the winning of Vienna. For the accomplishing of which his designes, he at his first comming sent Parthane Baffa with forty thousand Turkes to helpe the Baffa of Temesware and the Tartars, in the behalf of the Vaynod to befrege the strong town of Gyula, scituat vpon the lake Zarkad, with confines of Transylvania; not far from whence Suendi had but the August before ouerthrown H the Tattars, called in by Solyman for the aid of the Vayuod, and flaine of them ten thousand. And at the same time he sent Mustapha Bassa of Bosna, and Carambeius with a great power to Alba-Regalis, who joining with the Bassa of Buda, should keep the Emperour Maximilian busic, whilst he in the mean time besieged Sigeth, as is before declared. Parthaus Bassa Com. ming to Gyula, and laying hard fiege to the town, was stil notably repulsed by Nicolas Keret-Chen Gouernor of the town: infomuch, that in a fally he had certain pieces of his great Ordnance taken from him by the defendants, and the rest cloied. But this brave Captaine, nor m hauebin constrained by all that the Bassa could do, was at last persuaded by his kinsman George Bebiem (from whom Suendi had but a little before taken certain Caftles, for revolting from the Emperor to the Vayuod) for a great fum of mony to deliuer up the town to the Bal. fa. Which he did, couenanting besides his reward, that the foldiers should with hag and bagof Cysia see gage in fafety depart. All which was frankly granted who were not gon past a mile out of the town, but they were fet yoon by the Turks, and all flain except some few which crept into the reeds growing in the marish fast by, and so escaped. The Traitor himself expecting his reward, was caried in bonds to Constantinople: where afterward upon complaint made, how hardly he had vsed certain Turks whom he had sometime taken prisoners, he was by the commandement of Selymus, who fucceeded Solyman, thrust into an hogshead stuck full of nailes A traiter will with the points inward; with this inscription upon it, Herereceine the remard of thy anarice and treason. Gyala thou soldest for gold : if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy Lord neither wilt then beto me. And fo the hoghead closed fast vp, he was therin rolled vp and down vatill he mile. ably died.

The Emperors Camp then lying at Rab, & the Baffa of Buda and Bofna with thirty thous fand Turks not far off at Alba-Regalis, and many hot skirmishes passing between them; is fortuned that the fift of September, the Turkes in hope to have don some great piece of leve uice voon the Christians, came forth of the camp in great number, and by chance light voon a few forragers of the Army, of whom they flew some: the rest stying raised an alarmin the Camp. Wherupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with someothers issuing out pursuing the Turks, flew divers of them. In which pursuit George Thuriger descrying the Governor of The generatur Alba-Regalis, a man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilf hee lived, fiercely of Alba Regalia pursued him in the midit of the flying enemies, and neuer left him til he had taken him prile- I ner : and at his return presenting him to the Emperour, was for that good service knighted, and rewarded with a chain of gold. There was by chance then prefent a Spanistd, who had heard him fay openly at Constantinople, That he alone with his own power was able to vanquish the Germane King (by which name the Turks commonly term the Emperor.) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the presence of the Emperor; fill vrging him as it were to fay fomething for himfelfe: the Turke straitway answereed him in thefe few words following , Such is the chance of Warre, thou feeft me now a prisoner, and able to de

All these troubles, with many more like in short time to have insued, were by the death of The Turke Ar. Solyman within a while after wel appealed. Muhamet Buffa after that hee had repaired the M breaches, and placed a Turk Gouernour of Sigeth, with a strong garrison for defence of the place, and commanding of the Country, called back the disperied forces, and rising with the Army, tetyred towards Belgrade, carrying Solymans dead body all the way fitting 19right in his horse-litter caried by mules, giving it out that he was sick of the gout. Which thing the Ianizaries easily beleeved, knowing that he had bin many years so carried: yet still wishing his presence, as alwaies to them fortunat, although he were able to do nothing.

THE LIFE OF SELYMUS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, FIFT EM-PEROR OF THE TVRKS.

Elymuithe only fon of Solyman then left alive, by letters from Ma hamet Baffavnderstanding of the death of his father, hasted from Cutai, a City of Galatia not far from Ancyra, toward Constantinople; & comming to Scutari, was from thence by Boltanees Baffa of the court, conducted ouer the streit to Constantinople; where by him and Scander Baffa (Selymu his fon in law, and then Solymans Vicegerent) he was conucyed into the Imperial palace the 23 of September, An. 1 566; and there possessed of his fathers seat, was by Sugam falued the Ianizaries there present saluted Emperor. He was about the Emperor of the age of 42 years when he began to reigne, a man of an vnconstant part, 1536.

and hasty disposition, wholly given to wantonnes and exces; so that he never went to Wars himself, but performed them altogether by his lieutenants, contrary to the charge of Selymas his grandfather, given by him to his father Solyman, wherof he was never vnmindful. The next D day he came abroad and shewed himself in his majesty; and in the temple of Sophia, after the maner of the Turkish superstition, caused solemn prayers and facrifices to be made for his father which don, he gaue to the Ianizaries a largeffe of 100000 Sultanines, with promife to augment their wages. And all things being in readinesse for his intended journy, he with a goodly retinue set forward from Constantinople the 27 of September; and the 20 of O &o. ber a little from Belgrade met the Army comming from Sigeth, gallantly marching vnder their Ensignes, with the dead body of Solyman, whom the soldiers generally supposed to have bin yet living, but troubled with the gout, to keep his horf-litter, as his maner was to travell. Selimus alighting, came in his mourning attyre to the horf-litter, looked vpon the dead body of his father, kiffed it and wept ouer it, as did all the great Baffa's alfo. And that the death of E Solyman might then be made known to all men, the enfignes were presently let fal and trailed vpon the ground, a dead march founded, and heavy filence commanded to be kept thorow all the camp. Shortly after, Selymus was with great applause of the whole Army proclaimed emperor, his enfignes advanced, and every one of the great commanders of the Army in their degree admitted to kiffe his hand. So marching forward, he returned again to Constantinople the 22 of Nouembersbut thinking to enter his palace (commonly called the Scraglio) he was by the discontented Ianizaries but now come from the Wars, prohibited so to do; they with great infolencie demanding of him a greater donatiue, together with the confirmation both of their antient and new priviledges, before they would fuffer him to enter. Against which their great profumption, the Vizier Bassa's together with the Aga opposing themselves, and feeking by all means to appeale them, were by them fouly intreated, and wel rapped about the pares with the stocks of their caliners: but especially the two great Bassa's, Muhamet and Parfo fudden and vnexpected a mutiny of his best fouldiers Selymus not a little troubled, and eal-

ling vnto him the Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, demanded of him the cause therof. Who G with tears trickling down his checks for grief told him it was for mony. Which by Selyman now promifed was them, together with the policy of their liberties and the Aga with fair words and heavy countenance most establish the countenance most establish the more subject in the reputation of their wonerd loyalty with so soul a disorder not to oppose the first of him their louing captain vnto the heavy displeasure of their angry Sultan, and further affuring them; that hee would not fail them in the least of his promiles, but content them where ful of their delires. the mutiny was at length appealed, the infolent fanizaries again quieted, & selfages into the Seraglio received. Howbeit Muhames chief of the Vizier Baffa's for certain day's afterwent not out of his palace, neither came as he was wont into the Divano, but kept himself close, for fear of some greater mischief from them. This tumule thus ouerpassed, and all again wel party cified, selymus with all total folemnity buried his father, in a chappel which he affer the manner of the Mahometan kings had in his life time most stately built, with a colledge & an ho. foital. Where fall by his lide is to be feen the combod Hexelandhis best beloued wife, and of certain others his murthered children and by him hangs his scimiter, a token that he died in wars an honor not otherwise granted to the Mahometan princes. The reuenues arising of the country about Sigeth, of late won from the Christians, at his death were given to maintaine the houses by him built of denotion, which for the magnificence therof exceed at the rest bafore built by the Mahometan Kings and Emperours, except those of Mahomet the Great, and Beienet the fecond. It was by many thought, that Solyman was in good time by death cut off, as purposing that year to have wintred in Hungary, and the year following to have done great a matters against the Christians both by sea and land.

Hungary.

Solyman buried.

This great army of the Turks thus drawn out of Hungary by the death of Solyman, in some part affuaged, but altogether appealed not the endlesse troubles of that vnfortunat kingdom. Maximilian the empetor on the one fide, and John the Vayuod of Transylvania with the Turks captains on the other, renting it in pieces, as if they had for one the defiruction thereof. The Vayuod defiring to recour the strong castle of Tocay in the frontiers of his Gountrey, but lately taken from him by Suendi the Emperors lieutenant, laid hard frege to it, & had brought it to great extremity, although it was notably defended by Iames Raminger the Captain therofwhen suddenly news was brought unto him, That the Tartars (whom he had called into his country to have aided him against the Emperour, did with all hostility after their barbarous r maner, burn and destroy his Country before them, making hauock of all things, fothat the country people were glad in defence of themselves to take up arms against them. Wherepon he forthwith left the fiege, and went to aid his distressed subjects against the Tartars. With whom he had many a hot skirmish, and after much bloudshed at last opercame them, & with much ado rid himself of such bad guests. Now in the mean time, Swendi strengthned with new supplies sent vnto him from the Emperour, had taken the castle of Zackmar in the borders of Transylvania, and with like good succes had the castle of Muncatz yeelded vnto him, and after that besieged the town of Husth: so that the Vayuod was glad to crave aid of the Turkish Emperor Selymus, viider whose protection he was. Who presently commanded Partan one of his chief Bassa's, and then his great Lieutenant in Romania, rogo with his Forces L into Transylvania to relieue them. But hearing that Embassadors were comming from Maximilian the Emperor, he called him back again, until he had heard the effe & of that embaffage. At which time also the Bassa of Buda inclining to peace; sent Presents vnto the Emperour, requesting him to remooue certain of the Hungarian Captains from off the frontiers, lest haply they should interrupt the treaty of peace, then on both sides purposed, promising for his part to punish all such Turks with death, as should make any further invasion, or raise any new troubles. He writ letters also to County Salma. That hee could not but maruell towhat end Maximilian the Emperor was about to intreat with his lord and maker of peace, whilest Suends in the mean time was raging in Transylvania, then under the Turks protection; which 1 he proceeded ftil to do, Selymu would therof take occasion (ashe faid) to turn all his forces M that way. Wherfore hee requested him to perfunde the Emperour to take some more casic course in that behalf. Promising also, That he would for his part effectually travel with his Master to have better liking of peace than of wars, wishing him also to do the like," Which

thing as foone as the Emperour vnderstood, he commanded Suendi to give overthe fiege of Husth, and to keepe himselse quiet vntill he might by his Embassadors understand what the Great Turke purposed, and how he was affected towards peace.

Now indeed these two great Princes, Maximilian and Selymne (although they notably dif- Maximilian & fembled the matter) were both of them in heart defirous of peace, and that for divers great and definous of peace vigent confiderations. Maximilian forwant of mony faw it was not possible for him to fend into the field such an army the next yeare as he had the yeare before. And Selymus, beside his other troubles, was to take order for the appeafing of a great & dangerous rebellion in the furthest part of his dominions in Arabia Fœlix, where the people rising up in armes, and having flain the Baffa's and Sanzacks their gouernors, were ready to have cast off the Turkish obedi-B ence: neither was he out of feare of the Persians, ready (as was reported) to make warre voon him. For which causes he wished rather for peace with the Emperour Maximilian, than wars : and so much the more, for that it was impossible for him to send an army of any puissance into Hungary, for want of many necessary prouisions for the maintenance there, in a country so much impouerished by reason of his late wars, wherin no victuals were to be found for the reliefe of such a multitude of men as he was to fend, if he would do any good there. And truth it was (as the Turks themselves afterward reported) that Maximilian with halfe the power he had in field the last yere, might have easily recovered the greatest part of that kingdom before loft:but well knowing his own wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether enclining to peace. and by County Salma advertised from the Bassa of Buda, That if he would send Embassadors C to Constantinople, with the tribute wont to be there paid for Hungary, a peace vpon reasonable conditions might be easily obtained the resoluted voon that point. And so certain messengers being fent vp and downe to Constantinople to the same effect, it was concluded, That if the Emperor would fend Embassadors to Constantinople with the tribute yet behind, and a large commission for the treaty of peace, Selymm should give them his safe conduct, with liberty at their pleasure to returne in case either of peace or war. Which agreed vpon and faithfully promifed on both fides, Selymus fet at liberty the lord Albert de Vuis, who fix yeres Lieger in Constantinople, first for the Emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now beene streitly imprisoned in his owne house by the space of 22 moneths, in such fort that neither he nor any of his houshold could go abroad, watch and ward being kept both day & night about D his house, and his windowes also boorded vp, to the end that he should not so much as looke out into the city or any whither else more than the court of his house only. So the Emperour Maximilian now resoluted to send Embassadors to Constantinople with the tribute mony and divers other rich gifts & Presents, as well to the Great Turke himself, as the Visier Bassa's his Counsellors: and confidering with himselfe, whom to be most fit, with wisedome and honor to bring this so weighty a matter about, having to do with so barbarous, couetous, and mighty a people, made choice of the lord Anthonius Varantius of Agria (of his Counsell for the kingdome of Hungary) a Prelat of great estimation, who being a man of 63 yeares old, beside his great learning, had the experience of 27 Embassages, wherin he alwaies so discreetly bare himselse, as well contented his Prince, and purchased vnto himselse the reputation of a most E grave & wise man; and about ten yeres before this Embassage, being sent by the Emperor Ferdinand Embassadorto Selyman, and now by Maximilian to Selymus at Constantinople, returning with good successe, was by the Emperor created a Prince of the Empire, and Bishop of Agria. Vnto which so honorable a personage having the charge of this so weighty a matter, the Emperor the more to ennoble this embassage, as also to purchase the greater credit to his embasfador, joyned vnto him a most honorable Baron called the lord Christopher Teufenbatch of Stiria, one of his Counsellors also for the warres : who with full instructions both taking their leaue of the Emperor (then holding a Parliament at Presburgh) departed, and being attended Maximilian vpon with a great and honourable Retinue, fet forward the first of July 1567, and so came to finds is m. Comara a strong town in Hungary not past a league from the Turks frontiers. In which place bassadors to the Embassadors staying until the seuenth of July; in the meane time gaue knowledge of Stlymu. their comming vnto the Gouernour of Strigonium, demanding for their fecurity in the enemies country, to be met and received by some of his garrison: which granted, they tooke their barks brought from Vienna and Possonium, sufficient for their greatnesseto have carrifo entring upon the Turks dominion about a league or a little more from Comara, being for G far wasted by the foldiers and gallies of Comara, they were met by an Aga of the Turks with a Chiaus called Beeram (sent by the Bassa of Buda) in certain gallins armed with Furkish fol diers. To whom the Embassador at his landing delivered his mind, and afterward his person, gining them to under stand, that they were with all fafety to conduct both him and, all his to the Basia of Buda: which they answered they were ready to accomplish; and courteously inuited by the Embassadours, they came aboord their barke, and there, dined together. Here they that were fent with them, leaving them in the hands of the Turks, having licence to depart, returned to Comara: and they that day after five leagues failing arrived at Strigonium. where they were by the Gouernor of the city denied landing : for which fo distronourable a part he was afterward sharpely rebuked by the Bassa of Buda. Yet as they lay that night vpon H the water, certain Turkish minstrels, to do them honour and to get a largesse, with their barbarous bawling instruments placed them vp many a homely sie of mirth: and divers others with fundry forts of vauting and tumbling, fometime leaping one vpon anothers shoulders, and fometime doing their trickes on the earth, all the euening shewed them great sport and paftime. From Strigonium they with fiue leagues sailing came to Buda, leaving behind them the castle of Vicegrade, two leagues distant from Strigonium. In this city of Buda lieth the great Baffa by whom all Hungary, with the provinces thereto belonging (in the Turks power) is gouerned. Thiscity, sometime the regall seat of the Hungarian Kings, is scituate upon a little hill on the South fide of Danubius, having in the South point thereof a castle, much higher than the city, and of a most braue prospect: in which castle lieth a captain with agar. I rison of fine hundred souldiers (as the Turks say) how beit it is thought that they are not altogether fo many : it is the losse of his head to stir out of his charge, and beside, he hath commission to deny the Bassa himselse entrance, valesse he come very slightly accompanied to jealous are the Turks of that castle, as if the state of Hungary depended thereon. Herein standeth the kings palace, which taketh vp most part of the place, greatly beautified by Maithin, and shewing outwardly to have bin a very stately thing: for there are in it both large halls and faire galleries, and chambers built in most royall manner; where amongst other roomes, the Embassadors found a decaied Library full of pi Aures and Latine titles of bookes : all which things when they present themselves to the cies of the Christian beholders, offer a just consideration of noble and reuerend antiquity, and withall, strike into their hearts a certaine compassion joyned with horror, to see the renowned glory of so many great Kings all wasted and brought to nothing. The next morning the Embassadors went to speake with the Bassa: whose house was reasonable faire (considering their guise and enstome, not much delighting in the beauty of their privat buildings) scituat vpon the river side at the bottome of a hill whereon resease the city standeth. Vnto this Bassa the Embassadors presented two great gilt cups, a clocke all curiously wrought in gold, and a thousand dollars: which Present the Bassa received in his Diuano (being a large hall) where he fate with his counsellors, officers, and other Turks in their places and order; some on his right hand, and some on his left, all richly attired ingarments of filke of divers colours and fashions, reaching downe to their anckles after their manner: their heads couered with their passing white and well made turbants; in which assembly no. I thing being then to be seene but goodly order and grave silence, they seemed to the strange beholders fo many counsellors of exceeding gravity and reputation. Round about the Hall wherein the Embassadours had audience, were many seats couered with Turky carpets; the rest of the roome being all vacant. The Bassa in a place more apparant than the rest, sitting in great majesty: before whom was fee two little chaires, on which (after he had stood vpa while and embraced the Embassadors) he caused them both to sit downe. Whose speech delivered in the Italian tongue, after they had discharge themselves of the Emperors letters and greetings, was to this effect, viz. That his Imperial Majesty (for the common benefit of their subjects in Hungary)requested him to continue in his good purpose and dealing for peace : and further, to give safe conduct vnto them his Embassadours with their retinue, untill they were M come vnto the Turks court, where they were to intreat and conclude a peace, to the ending of all troubles, and the publique benefit of their subjects in generall. Which speech with checrefull and friendly countenance ended, many of the Embaffadors followers were admitted to kiffe the Baffa's hand, accounted no finall favour among (t those Barbarians, The laterpretor of these things was a Iew of Padua, who declared all, that was spoken, in the Turkish language vnto the Bassa, and in the Italian vnto the Embassadors. And although (if it had bin their pleasure) they might have told their mind each to other in the Crouatian tongue without an Interproter; yet the Baffa standing more upon his reputation, & for some other respects beside, would have the matter propounded and likewise answered in the Turkish. In which fort they also conferred continually afterward with the Bassa's at Constantinople, vales it were in some particular and privat talke of smal importance, or els in some point beside the matter. for then the Interpreter spake in the Crouatian or Sclauonian tongue, which is familiar to most of the Turks, but especially to the men of war. Before this hall where the Embassadors were entertained by the Bassa, in the base court stoodall the Ianizaries in goodly array, and his B saues with their red zarcul on their heads, and other fouldiers with high and long plumes of feathers flanding vpright: all which made a beautifull shew, & gaue all great grace to the Basfa's court. These men stir not one foot in their standings, and if the consultation do last foure houres long, to long are they to continue standing without mouing. The Embassadors haung staied two daics at Buda, were by the Bassa dismissed, sending with them his Checaisthe Steward or gouernor of his house) a man of great reputation, and Becram the Chiaus, the same that came to meet them at Comara, with a fufficient guard & certain Ianizaries, fent for their more fafe trauelling, and to prouide for them from place to place, of all things necessary for their dier as also for their horses, at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied, they imbarqued the tenth day of the aforesaid moneth towed up the Turks gallies, which holpen by the swiftnesse € of the river, carried them downe in eight daies to Belgrade, where they arrived the eighteenth of July. So having staid at Belgrade, & there leaving their boats, and taking their coaches, they fet forward by land the twentieth of the faid moneth, and with great paines trauelling thorow Rascia, Bulgaria, and Thracia, and passing a part of the great mountain Scardus, and after that. the mountain Rhodope, so by the way of Philippopolis and Hadrianople, the two and twentiethof August gathered fast voon Constantinople:where many of the Spahies and Chiausais The Emperants of the court, with a number of the Ianizaries and other foldiers, for their greater honour came emballadorabato meet them a great way without the city. By whom the Embaffadors honourably mounted ned by the on horsebacke, were by them conducted to their lodging appointed for them about the midst Turks at conof the city, where the Lord Albers de Vuis the Emperours Embassador Leiger (not long be-stantinople, D fore inlarged) having long looked for their comming, now most joyfully received them. It was then Fryday the Turks Sabath, and a day of them aboue all other daies in the weeke regarded, and about ten of the clocke two houres before noone; at which time the Embaffadors were no sooner alighted, but that Selymus going to heare the ceremonies of his religion, in the Moschy of his father Solyman (as his manner was sometime to do) passed along before the gate where the Embassadors lay, with the whole traine of his Court; and peraduenture somewhat more than ordinary, to thew the magnificence of his power and flate, to the end that the Embaffadors (aboue the former opinion by them conceived) might hold him in the reputation of a most puissant and mighty Monarch. He passing by, vouchsafed not once to give them a regard, or so much as to cast his eie aside voon them, although they were strangers, and but even E then arrived: but with a countenance as if he had knowne not so much as any thing of their comming, held on his way as it lay. But Muhamet the chief Visier Bassa, with the other Bassa's and great Courtiers, in most gracious manner as they passed by cast their eies vpon them; all the courtesie they could then shew them. Six daies after, being the eight and twentieth of August, the Embassadors all three went to visit and salute Muhamet (or as the Turks call him Mehemet) the chiefe Visier Bassa, as the maner was, presenting him from the Emperor, with source Presents given cups of filuer all guilt, of most faire and curious workernanship, of which, two of them being by the Empe. greater than the other, were three spans high, the two other being not so high by a span, but hat the other, were three spans high, the two other being not so high by a span, but hat the other, were three spans high, the two other being not so high by a span, but hat the other, were three spans high, the two other being not so high by a span, but hat the other, were three spans high, the two other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span, but hat the other being not so high by a span but hat the other being not so high by a span but hat the other being not so high by a span but hat the other being not so high by a span but hat the other being not so high by a span but hat the other being not so high by a span but had been so hig uing in them two thousand duckats of gold: beside which, they gaue him also a clocke, being great saffe's. a most curious piece of worke, and all ouer double gilt. After which greetings and presents de-F livered beside the contents of his Majesties letters, they declared vnto him in generall points, the cause of their comming, and the mind of the Emperor well disposed to a peace; and what great benefit would arise thereby to both parties and lastly turning over the blame of the late wars, and laying the fault thereof to the charge of others, sweetned thereby the sowre of their former dealings. Neither was the Bassa likewise for his part to seeke of good words, but an-ted to like fernices. There are moreouer many halls and other roomes for refort, where they

with other matters, where the Bassa's and other officers assemble together. Entring in at this second gate in one part of the court, which seem'd rather some large street, they saw the whole company of the Solaches fet in a goodly ranke, which are archers keeping alwaies neere vnto

fwered them in Turkish by the mouth of Hibraim the chiefe Dragoman, who deliuered his G mind to them in Latine or Italian, according as the Embassadours had before vertered theirs: which parley fo ended, certain of the chiefe of the Embassadors followers were admitted into the Diuano to kiffe the proud Baffa's hand. The fame day the Embaffadors also faluted Partas the second Bassa, and Ferrat the third in order and authority. To Partau they presented two cups of filter all gilt, befide a clocke of the same making with the afore named, and two thou. fand dollars; and the like to Ferrat. The next day they went to visit the other three Bassa's A. chomat, Piall, and Muhamet, presenting every one of them with two faire cups and a thousand dollars. These were the fix Visier Bassa's to Selymus, then lying at court with him, men that for wealth and authority went before all other in the Turkish empire, as in the course of this Hi. flory may appeare. And so having visited them in generall, the Embassadors to set their affaires on foot, the fourth of September closed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of Estate. matters was especially committed. Yet after this first conference, because it was necessary before so weighty affaires were broached, first to do the Turke reverence, and to deliver the prefents, with the Emperors letters to him written; for some few daies there was not any point at all of the Embassadors businesse handled.

Selymus not long after the Embassadors were arrived, went out for his disport and pleasure on hunting: fo that in the mean time, after the presents were given to the Bassa's, matters slood still altogether vnaduanced, vntill the 21 of September: and that day (Selymue being now teturned from his disport) it was appointed that the Embassadors should have audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their followers, of those that should attend your them, which were not in all about twelve persons: for they to whom this charge was committed, faid it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great traine should come before fogreat a Prince, and that they might not bring with them about that number: whereupon they appointed but fix apiece to attend them; and of fifteen cups of filuer and gilt, being most curiously and cunningly engrauen, one of the fairest among the rest was given to each of those twelue to carry, and they ordered to go by two and two before the rest, that came after in order with the rest of the Presents, which was two exceeding pretious clocks, like in bignesse to them before given to the Baffa's, but far aboue them in value, & 45000 dollars for the tribute behind and yet unpaied. The greatest of those cups was fix spans and a halfe, and the least two The Imperours spans in height: some of them being double cups, after the high Dutch manner. The Embasthe land of the la lodging (befide many of the Spahi's and Chianfi's, and others of good fort (which were come tarks value to honor them with their presence to the palace) putting themselues in readinesse betimes in the morning, and taking horse set forward toward the court. The formost were they that did beare the presents in their hands, the people of the city in every street flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they passed: and verily there had beene seldome times feene the like embassage in those parts: for besides the fame that was blowne abroad in energy quarter, That they were men sent from one of the greatest Princes in Christendome; the diuerfity of their attire (fo few as they were) more than any thing befide, did represent the Majefty of the Christian Emperor to them that gazed voon his Embassadors and their traine, the L people conceiuing thereby, that he was lord and ruler ouer many provinces and countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Bishop of Agria (the chief embassador) being attired in long & fober garments of very fine purple cloath, having their shooes pieced over the foles with yron plates, and halfe their heads shauen, seemed to differ from them but little:but on the other side, the high Dutch attired in black, with their veluet caps, and short cloaks laied with filuer lace, & long breeches little leffe than Rutter wife, and chaines of gold about their necks, appeared very strange & vncouth to the Turkish people: so accompanied in this hono-The first gate of rable wife, the embassadors entred the first gate of the great Turks palace. This gate is built of the great Table in most fumptuous maner, & of a stately hight, with certain words of their language in the front therof ingrauen and gilt in marble. So passing thorow the base court, which hath on M the right fide very faire gardens, & on the left, divers buildings feruing for other offices, with a littleMoschy, they came to the second gate, where al such as came in riding, must of necessity alight:here fo foon as they were entred in at the fecond gate, they came into a very large fquare court, with buildings & galleries round about it, the kitchins standing on the right hand, with the person of the great Turke, & scruing as his footmen when he rideth: they vie high plumes of feathers, which are fet bolt vpright ouer their foreheads. In another place there stood the Capitzi in like array, with black staues of Indian canes in their hands: they are the porters and warders of the gates of the palace, not much differing in their attire from the Ianizaries; who food in ranke likewise in another quarter. And besides all those, with many more that were out of order, as well of the court as of the common people, those Knights of the court which accompanied the embassadors thither, with other great ones also of like degree, were marshalled all in their feueral companies. And among the rest, the Mutsaracha's, men of all nations and all religions (for their valour the only freemen which live at their owne liberty in the Turkish empire) (tood there apparelled in damaske, veluer, and cloath of gold, and garments of filke of fundry kinds and colours: their pompe was great, and the greater, for the turbants that they wore voon their heads, being as white as whitenes it felfe, made a most braue and goodly shew well worth the beholding. Passing through them, the Embassadors were led into the hall, where the Bassa's & other great men of the court were all ready to give them entertainment : they of their traine being at the fame time brought into a roome that stood apart under one of the aforesaid lodgings all hung. with Turky carpets, Soone after (as their vie and maner is) they brought in their dinner, couering the ground with table cloathes of a great length fored voon carpets, and afterward featte- A benely feat ring upon them a maruelous number of wooden spoons, with so great store of bread, as if they great subsection had bin to feed 300 persons: then they set on meat in order, which was served in 42 great platers of earth, full of rice pottage of three or foure kinds, differing one from another, some of Turks cours. them feafoned with hony, and of the colour of hony; fome with four emilke, and white of colour; and fome with fugar: they had fritters alfo, which were made of like batter, and mutton beside, or rather a dainty and tooth some morfell of an old sodden Ewe. The Embassadors in the meane time dined in the hall with the Bassa's. And after dinner certain of the Capitzies were sent for the twelve of E the embassadors followers, before appointed to do the great Sultan reuerence: by whom (their Presents being already conucied away) they were removed out of the place where they dined, and brought on into an under roome, from whence there was an afcent into the hall, where the Bassa's were staying for the Embassadors: who soone after came forth, and for their ease sat them downeypon the benches, whilest the Bassa's went in to Selymus, who before this time had made an end of dinner, and was removed in all his royalty, into one of his chambers, expecting the comming of the Embassadors. The fame day the Embaffadors also faluted Partes the second Bassa, and Ferrat the third in order and authority. To Partau they presented two cups of filuer all gilt, befide a clocke of the same making with the afore named, and two thou. fand dollars: and the like to Ferrat. The next day they went to visit the other three Bassa's Achomat, Piall, and Muhamet, presenting every one of them with two faire cups and a thousand dollars. These were the fix Visier Bassa's to Selymus, then lying at court with him, men that for wealth and authority went before all other in the Turkish empire, as in the course of this Hi. flory may appeare. And so having visited them in generall, the Embassaders to set their affaires on foot, the fourth of September closed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of Estate. matters was especially committed. Yet after this first conference, because it was necessary before so weighty affaires were broached, first to do the Turke reverence, and to deliver the prefents, with the Emperors letters to him written; for some few daies there was not any point at all of the Embassadors businesse handled. Selymus not long after the Embassadors were arrived, went out for his disport and pleasure

Whereupon they made choice out of their followers, of those that should attend upon them, which were not in all aboue twelue persons: for they to whom this charge was committed, faid it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great traine should come before fo great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them aboue that number: whereupon they appointed but fix apiece to attend them; and of fifteen cups of filuer and gilt, being most curiously and cunningly engrauen, one of the fairest among the rest was given to each of those twelue to carry, and they ordered to go by two and two before the rest, that came after in order with the rest of the Presents, which was two exceeding pretious clocks, like in bignesse to them before given to the Baffa's, but far aboue them in value, & 45000 dollars for the tribute behind and yet vnpaied. The greatest of those cups was six spans and a halfe, and the least two The Emperours spans in height: some of them being double cups, after the high Dutch manner. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Bishop of Agria (the chief embassador) being attired in long & fober garments of very fine purple cloath, having their shooes pieced over the foles with yron plates, and halfe their heads shauen, seemed to differ from them but little:but on the other side, the high Dutch attired in black, with their veluet caps, and short cloaks laied with filter lace, & long breeches little leffe than Rutter wife, and chaines of gold about their necks, appeared very strange & vncouth to the Turkish people: so accompanied in this hono-The first gate of rable wise, the embassadors entred the first gate of the great Turks palace, This gate is built of marble in most sumptuous maner, & of a stately hight, with certain words of their language in the front therof ingrauen and gilt in marble. All this while not the least found in the world being raised, but a facred simple of the taining of the trace in energy corner, as if men had bin going to visit the holiest place in Ierusalem, Yes for all that, the embaffadors followers placed one from another (as is aforefaid) were not aware that the great Sultan was fo neere, looking still when they should have bin led on forwards all together: howbeit they were fet in one after another, neither did they that were fo fet out, return again into the roome, but having severally done their reverence, were all (except the Embaffallors, that fill flaid in the chamber) by one and one fent out another way into the courte neither could he that came after, see his fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to do his reuerence:but fuddenly as the former was let out, the next was advanced forward to the doore, where Isman the Capitzi-Bassa and the Odda Bassa, taking him by both arms and by the necke, the one at the right hand, and the other at the left, & fo leading him apace, by the way foftly felt his wrifts with their hands, left peraduenture he might haue some short weapon Itineratio Di in his sleeue. Yet were they not all thus groped, as Marc. And thus like men rather carried to prison by sergeants, than to the presence of so mighty a Monarch, the were presented vnto his Majesty: he sitting vpon a paller, which the Turks call Mastabe, vsed K by them in their chambers to fleepe and to feed vpon, couered with carpets of filke, as was the whole floore of the chamber also. The chamber it selfe being not very great, was but darke, altogether without windows, excepting that one whereof we have before spoken, and having the wals painted and fet out in most fresh and lively colours by great cunning, and with a most delicat graceiyet vie they neither pictures nor the image of any thing in their painting. Thefix Visier Bassa's before mentioned, were standing at the left hand as they entred in at the chamber dore, one by another in one fide of the chamber, and the Embaffadors on the right hand on the other side standing likewise, & vncouered. The Dragomans were in another part of the chamber, neere the place where the Sultan fat gorgeously attired in a robe of cloth of gold all em-broidred with jewels: when as the Embassadors followers by one & one brought before him, L (as is aforefaid) and kneeling on the ground, a Turke standing on his right hand, with all reverence taking up the hem of his garment, gaue it them in their hands to kiffe. Selymus himselfal this while fitting like an image without mouing, and with a great state and majesty keeping his countenance, dained not to give them one of his looks. This done, they were led back again, no uer turning their backs towards him, but going still backwards untill they were out of his presence. So after they had all thus made their reuerence, & were departed out of the chamber, the Embassadors deliuered vnto Selymus the Emperors letters, and briefly declared vnto him their message: whom he answering in source words, as, That they were to confer with his Bassa's, prefently they were dismissed. And so comming out of the two inner gates, they mounted on horsebacke, and took ethe way toward their lodging, being at their return accompanied with M the whole order of the Ianizaries, with their Aga & other captains: among whom were certain of their religious men called Haagi (which vie to follow the Ianizaries) who continually turning about, and in their going, finging or rather howling out certaine Plalmes and praiers for

wonder, that they either left not for wearinesse, or fell not downe like noddies for giddinesse. All these were sent, the more honourably to accompany the embassadors to their lodging: and beside these, many more on horsebacke that attended them at their forth comming ; in regard whereof, the embassadors when they were come to their lodging, to requite their greedy courtesse, franckly distributed among it them aboue source thousand dollars, and yet well contented them not.

The Embassadors after this entertainment at court, had divers times conference with the great Baffa's concerning peace, as Selymus had commanded twherin by reason of the Turks vnreasonable demands (as their manner is at their first meetings) nothing could be as then concluded: fo that Selymus himselfe being shortly after to depart for Hadrianople, where he was B recontinue for fome moneths (but rather as it was thought for that they could not agree you a point of great consequence) the treaty for peace was intermitted, vntill such time as a mesfenger dispatched in post, might return vnto the Turks court, with some resolute answer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the reigne of the late Emperour Ferdinand, that the The printipall cerning that matter. 30 it was, that during the reigne of the late Emperous Feramona, that the specific rules Turke his subjects in Hungary paied all their taxes and tributes vnto their old Lords and matter be made flator. fices, abiding and living in the Emperors jurifdiction, as did the subjects of Ferdinand, to their differed from lords that dwelt in the Turkes dominion and territories; now in this treaty for peace, the the treaty of peace, the treaty of peace. Turks (among it other their vnreasonable requests) demanded to have their subjects freed, and vet the subjects of the Emperor to pay as they were before accustomed. Which as it was a request nothing indifferent, to was it no lesse prejudiciall and hurtful vnto the Emperor his sub-C. jeas in Hungary: for which cause the Embassadors would not by any meanes consent thereunto before they knew the Emperors farther pleasure concerning the same. Whereupon they dispatched one Sig. Odoardo a gentleman of Mantua, very skilfull in the Turkish language and in such like affaires, by reason that as well about this businesse, as at divers times before about other the like he had been emploied from Vienna to Constantinople in the Emperours feruice. So Selymus shortly after, Viz. the twentieth of October, departing from Constantinople, ingreat magnificence passed by the gate where the Embassadors lay with his whole court in armes, and in the same order that is viually kept when he goeth to warre or taketh any great journey. After whose departure the embassadors having sufficiently viewed the city of Constantinople, and then at good leifure, to passe the time and to see the countries they had so ofn ten both heard and read of, together with the ports and hauens on both fides that narrow fea which divide th Europe from A sia; embarking themselves, & crossing the mouth of the haven betwixt Constantinople and Pera, passed all along it the coast on Europe side, vnto the Euxine or blacke sea, and sobacke againe by the other side of that streight sea: curiously noting the great ruins of the antient city of Bythinia, with some others along it the Asian shore, together with the pleasant scituation they in former times had, whilest they yet flourished in their glory, but now for most part (or rather altogether) laid in the dust and brought to nought: and so returned againe to Constantinople. But while st they thus deceived the time, and lay long expecting the returne, as well of their owne messenger sent unto the Emperour, as of Selymus himselse: they were aduertised in all haste to repaire unto him to Hadrianople, whether the E aforefaid meffenger was now come with full inftructions of all things concerning the treaty for peace. For which cause they with great speed making themselues ready, and taking their leaue of Piall Bassa (who for that he was Selymus his great Admirall, then lay at Constantinople) fet forward the first of Ianuary in the yeare 1568; and so after nine daies trauell, at length 1 5 & arriued at Hadrianople about an hundred fifty three Italian miles distant from Constantinople. Here they staied untill the peace was concluded, which was the seventeenth of February: the chiefe capitulations wheref were, That either of those great Princes should still hold The chiefe capit ry: the chiefe capitulations whereif were, I hat either of those great I have been foundly earely pay intation where what they had got each from the other in the late wars: That the Emperor should yearely pay intation wherein the late wars: thirty thousand duckats to the Turkish Sultan as a tribute for Hungary, the tribute to begin consider was in the beginning of Ianuary last past this yeare 1568: That the subjects of the Turks should InixiMaximipay nothing to the subjects of the Emperour, neither the Emperours any thing to the Turks, par, & Selymur, but to be both of those paiments free, And that you these conditions there should be a firme and fure peace betwixt those two great Monarchs for eight yeares next following: wherein the Vayuod of Transyluania was (as the Turks tributary) to be also comprehended. Neuerthele Le, all things at this time thus agreed upon the Turks after their fubtile manner finding

At which time having their dispatchand taking their leaue of the Great Turke and the Bassa's accompanied with Hebraim-Beg (Selymus his embassador unto the Emperour) they by land returned rowards Vienna; where they with the joyfull newes of peace the tenth of May arrived, being there two daies after at the court most honourably received. And five daies after, audience was giuen vnto the Turks Embassador; who well heard and hetter rewarded, shortly after returned with a full conclusion of peace from the Emperour, to Constantinople.

But whileft this peace was thus in concluding, and the embaffadors yet refident at Hadrianople, the fixteenth of February came an honourable embassage from Shach Tamas the Persis mae the l'offan an King, vnto the great Sultan Selymus, to intreat a peace betwirt them, or rather to conclude the same, being before agreed upon the controuersies, for which they afterwards fell to open war. Which embassage for that it is no lesse truly than plainely set downe in a letter sent from Erzirum (a city then in the confines of the Turks dominions towards the Persians) written by a Chiaus to Muhamet chiefe of the Visier Bassaes, which Chiaus was of purpose sent from Constantinople, to meet the said Persian embassador: I thought it not amisse for the better understanding thereof, to fet downe the effe & of the same letter as it was translated out of the Turkith into the Italian by the Emperors embassadors interpreter.

The effect of the Letter written to Muhamet Bassa, the chiefe Visier, by a Chiaus sent of purpose to meet the Persian Embassadour.

Fter due falutations, this is the effect of that which wee thought good to make knowne unto your A Lordship. Now at this present (towit in the beginning of the moneth Gianna Sulacehir) is in good * Schach Culi health ariued the Embassador of Persia, the Kings chiefe counsellour, called * Schach Culi Soltan, a-Soltan, was not tended upon with a bundred and twenty Gentlemen, with quilt Turbants on their heads, and well furnis steproper name of the amballa- shed with spare horses led in mens hands. Besides whom he was accompanied also with two hundred knights to der, but a title all apparelled in cloath of gold, with four hundred Persian Merchants, in all about seven hundred per of behour, and fons with a shouland nine hundred beasts, Camels, Mules, and Horses; flue couple of drums, energeousle being placed upon a seucrall Camell, fine Nacars, three trumpets, fine flutes, and other instruments, in all about thirty mustions, playing upon the seinstruments: There were also two Choristers or chaunters of the to the King. Alcaron, one Organist, one playing upon a Turkish instrument like a Lute, two players upon Sagbuts, with two other musitions, eight in all. There were also foure bondwomen scruing in the Embassadors own chamber. Who when he was with all this magnificent pompe come within one daies journey of Brzirum, the "Sayme are fol- * Sayms and Spanies affembling themselves together to the number of eight thousand men, went to meet diers of greater him: among st whom were an hundred more, all apparelled in cloath of Gold and Sattin: two then and bonor than toe

Afters at the him: and so being come into the city, caused all the instruments to be placed upon, even from morning unleaft, ont of the till night. The next morning, the Embassador inuited the Bassa with all the Lords and officers; who bereunus of cer, ing come, he entreated them to heare hu musicke : and in like manner the Lord Bassa invited the Petso and villages. Ans. But as the Embassadour was going to the banquet came another Sultan of the Kings, who brought unto the same Embassador a guilt Turbant, and arich gowne wrought with gold, which he caused him to terlaced with gold, and the supporters imbroidered with the same : besides this, he sent two bookes of Hi- M. * A Mescalin stories, and two Pearles, which in weight weighed ten * Mescaly : one Balasso as big as a little Pearle ; fouredrams, is fourescore and two times an hundred * Tumenlich of stuffe, amounting to fourescore and two summes of in value as Afters, and forty Falcons: all which the Persian King hath sent unto the Great Sultan, as tathe only Monarch and Patron of the World. This Schach Culi is the next in authority to the King, and so was in the put on by the way. By this Embassadour the Persian King bath sent all the armour of Sultan Bajazec, with all his Camels and other wealth. The causes of the long stay of this Embassadour were specially two:

the one for that the Persian King had caused to be made two paulions of one piece, the curtanes being in-time of great King Hylmael. Thefe two Persian Sultans are the Kings chiefe Sultans and courtiers. and therefore fet themselves forth with all the pompe they can. Tet notwithstanding all their bravers being come to Erzarum within the view of our army, the Persians were amased to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of the Persians are returned againe into Persia. And if it please God at the comming of my meffenger unto you, your Lordship shall understand of what condition and state these two Princes and Sultans are. They have each of them yearely fix Tumoni: which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, fix thousand Aspers. Your Lordship after this account may judge of the reft. The other canfe of the long flay of this Embassadour, was for that in Syruan the people were op in rebellion wherein many of them were flaine to the appealing of which sedition, this Schach Culy was fint, and new at last u come. From Erzirum in the beginning in the moneth of * Giuma Sulacchir, in the yeare * December.

This the Persian embassador was with the greatest pomp that might be entertained by the The Persian em-Turks at his first comming to Hadrianople, al the braue courtiers with the Ianizaries & other halfadour the mountably enterfouldiers of the court going forth in most seemely order to meet him. Who now entred the rained by the city, and come before the house where the Emperours Embassadors then lay, and seeing cer. Twist at Hatain of their retinue before the dore, asked of Ismam the Capitzi Bassa, what people they were; who told them that they were the followers of an Embassador that there lay, sent from one of the greatest Princes of the Christians, namely, the Emperor, who was defirous to make peace with the great Sultan his master. Whereunto the Embassador replied, that he would willing-C ly falute them : which Isam hearing, streight way turned his horse towards the place where they flood. Now the Emperors embaffador being fecret within a lettice, & feeing them come towards him, went forth and stood vpon the doore threshold, and so with signes and words saluted one another. Among the others the Persian embassador faid vnto the Emperors. That he would gladly talke with him, if it might so please the grand Seignior: Hebraim the Dragoman who then was with the Emperors embassadors, being interpreter. So having courteously saluted one the other, they departed, but neuer after came together. Two daies after, the Persian embassadors (according to the manner of that barbarous nation, who with empty hands falute not one another) by his Checaia or steward of his houshold, presented all the Visier Bassa's with divers rich gifts and presents, every one of them according to their degrees & places and D the day afterwent himself to visit them, where by the way fel out a strange matter, like enough to haue cost him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the embassador was going to visit Muhamet the The Persan emchief of the Visier Bassa's for the first) meeting him, shot at him with an harquebuse, with puring to visit him. pose to have slain him; but as God would, missed him, and hurt but one of his chiefe followers hames the Visit in the arme. Wherwith the embassador not a little dismaid, as supposing himselfe to have bin er Rassa, in danbetraied, turning his horse, was about to have gone to his lodging : but the great Bassa in the gaint, mean time having knowledge therof, presently sent out men to guard him, and to excuse himfelfe of the fact. Whereof the embaffador being affured, held on his way. In the meane space, the fellow who shot the harquebuse, being apprehended, was brought before the Embassador and the Bassa, who asking him for what cause he discharged the shot against the embassador? he without change of countenance boldly answered. That he did it for no other cause but for that the embaffador was an heretick, and fent from an hereticall king, and an enemy to their religion: and therefore that it was not convenient he should come to intreat of peace with his lord; adding further, that he was not worthy of any peace. Which the Baffa hearing, adjudged this, the Persian embassador the 22 of the same moneth went to deliver the presents sent from his master vnto the grand Seignior, and to kisse his hand; sending first before him the Presents vpon 44 Camels, whereof 34 were the Kings of Persia, and the other ten his owne. The Therish prosent Kings Presents was an Alcoran, with the authority of Ali, as they hold. It was covered with gold, and garnified with most pretious stones. He presented also abooke of Histories, coucred as the other: he gaue also a box, wherein was a very faire precious stone called Balasso, and two pearles of a wonderfull greatnesse, with two purses of an dishes (which we call China dishes) made of most pure earth, kept aboue sifty yeres buried vn. G der the ground, to the end fo to be fined and purified, which (as some say) wil milt and dissolve if any poison be put into them. He gaue also two most stately paullions, 20 great carpets of filke, and many other leffer of filke and gold, also nine faire canopies to hang ouer the ports of their paulions, things not vied among the Christians. He gaue also nine very faire carpets of camels haire, nine faddles fet with stones after the Persian fashion, seuen states of silver, seuen fcimiters with red scaberts, seuen bowes with arrowes and quiuers, all wrought with gold and pretions from the presented also many other carpets called Testich, made of the finest lawne, and fo large, that feuen men could fearcely carry one of them. All the Faulcons were dead by the way. The presents which the Embassadour gaue vnto the great Turke in his owne name. were also these: an Alcoran, a paulion faire and large, certaine scimiters, bowes and attowes H richly garnished, with certain carpets of silk, and Camels haire. After which presents so deline. red, & reuerence don vnto the great Sultan by the embaffador, and thirty of his followers ali in cloth of gold, he returned to his lodging, very honorably accompanied, as well by the Turks as them of his own retinue. First besides many others, there were a great company of the Spahies and Chiaufies, and other courtiers mounted vpon goodly horfes, well furnished & in decent order: here might a man haue seene store of cloth of gold, veluet, damaske, & other kinde of silke. After these there followed about three hundred Persian horsemen, apparelled after their manner, some with gownes made of divers little pieces of taffata of fundry colors, reprefenting the pictures of men, women, horses, and other beasts; and some of them imbroidered with Houres and fruits of fundry forts; fome had also gownes of cloth of gold, but not fo faire as the Turks; and some of veluet, but very few of cloth; for that the Persians had no great plenty either of veluet or yet of cloth, except such as they have from the Portingals that travel into those Eastern countries, yet of filk & wool it appeareth they have great plenty, most part of their gowns being of wooll quilted with bombaft. After these horsemen followed many Perfian footmen, peraduenture all feruants; after whom came the Turkish horsemen; and last of all came a horse of the embassador led by a Persian; after which horse followed 200 Ianizaries; and in the rereward of all came the embassador alone, gorgiously attired both himselseand his horse. He himselse was inuested with crimson veluet, mingled with some other colors shis saddle and bridle were all bedeckt with jewels : the caparison of his horse, was all imbroidered with Turquoies and other pretious stones: the horne vpon the top of his Turbant (which the Turks call Meteuenchia) was altogether wrought with gold, and fet with pretious stones: in briefe, vpon every part of his body hanged jewels of great price. After the Embaffadour, followed about 140 Persian horsemen, and others of his court apparelled as before, some well, force ill, according to their ability. Now although the Persians (as is to be thought) shewed all their pomp, yet they made nothing fo faire a shew as did the Turks; neither are they so faire men of complexion, being for the most part of a swart and browne color, and rather littlemen than otherwise, not much vnlike to the Spaniards. The embassador being departed, the Pre-An bonourable sents were all brought and shewed to Selymus; who allowed for their ordinary charges 500 ducats a day, for that indeed their number was great and their beafts many. These expences beflowed vpon the embassadors, do presently begin as soone as any of them enter into his dominions; and end, so soone as the businesse for which they come is finished. But long it was not, but that this embassador having concluded a peace betwire the two great Princes, Tamas and Selymus, & dispatched such matters as he came for, returned home again into Persia. The Venctians also now at this same time, by their embassadors sought to renue the league they had made with the great Turke, now expired: which as it was eafily obtained, fowas it of small affurance; Selymus the next yeare quarrelling with them, and raising new wars, to the great burg and disturbance of that State, as shall forthwith appeare.

Selymus now at peace with all the World (a thing of the Turks not much defired) began to thinke of workes of charity : and purposing to build a magnificent temple at Hadrianopse for his owne sepulture, with a Monastery, a Colledge, and an Almes house (as had his fa- M ther, and other his ancestours before him at Prusa and Constantinople, led thereunto witha vaine and superstitious deuotion) was troubled with nothing more, than how to endow the fame with lands and reuenues sufficient for the maintenance of so great a charge : for that the Mahometan Kings, are by their superstition prohibited to conuers any lands of possessions to fuch holy vies, other than fuch as they have with their owne fword won from the enemies of their religion, which they may (as they are persuaded) as a most acceptable sacrifice, offer to their great Prophetiwhich diuelish persuasion serueth as a spur to pricke forward every of those ambitious Princes to adde something to their Empire. This his devous purpose once knowner wanted not the furtherance of many ripe heads, deniling fome one thing, forme another as they thought best fitted his humor. But among st many things to him presented, none pleased him so well, as the plot laid for the taking of the rich Island of Cyprus from the Venetians: a conquest of it felfe sufficient, both for the eternising of his name, and performance of his own charitable works intended; with a large ouerplus, for the supplying of what society wanted in his fathers like devout workes at Constantinople. But that which moved him most of all was the glory of such a conquest, which as his flatterers bare him in hand, might make him equall with any his predecessors, who in the beginning of their reigne, had vsually done or attempted some notable thing against the Christians. Hereupon the matter was by Selamus propounded to the great Bassacs to be considered of: without whose adulse and counsell, the Turkish Emperors seldome or neuer take any greatwars in hand. Amongst these grave counfellors, Muhamet the chiefe Visier Bassa, man of greatest authority (vnto whom Selymus was Muhamet Bassa beholden, that he had so quietly obtained the empire) and a secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much comission and secret friend vnto the Venetians, diffusitely second much completely seco feemed much to missike of that motion, persuading Selymus not to yeeld thereunto: alledging inualing of befide the danger and uncertainty of the expedition, that his father Solyman at the time of his Copyria death had charged him streitly, that the league with the Venetians should be religiously kept. C and that he could not with his honour without just cause so quickly breake the league, which he himselse had but a little before most solemnly confirmed. But Mustapha the second Bassa, sometime Selymus his tutor, and therfore of him much honoured, with Piall Bassa the Admira! (both enuving at the great honor of the Visier Bassa) so mightily impugned that he had before faid, and fo importuned Selymus with the shew both of honor and profit attending that action. as also with the easinesse therof(a great part of the Venetian Arsenall being but a little before burnt, and their forces much weakned) that he rejected the counsell of Muhamet, calling him in his choler, Christian (which among the Mahometans is a word of no (mal difgrace:) and yeelding wholly to the persuasion of Must apha and Piall, presently caused preparation to be made both by sea and land, for the performance of that his resolution. Which was not so covertly D carried in the Turks court, but that it was discouered by M. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian embassador; and not without cause suspected by the Venetian Merchants, whom the barbarous Turks began now to cut short in their trafficke, looking big voon them, as men suddenly changed, and euill intreated them with hard speeches, the undoubted signes of greater troubles to ensue. The Venetian Embassador now out of doubt of the Turks purpose for the invasion of Cyprus, came vnto Mubamet the chiefe Bassa, complaining of the breach of the league; and putting him in mind of the fidelity of the Venetian State toward the Turkish Emperour, requesting him, that Selymus might not make too much hast to begin that war, which would fet all Europe on a broile but rather by his embassadors sirst to declare his mind to the Senat, for that so it might haply come to passe, that all might be quieted, to the good of both parts with-E out war. Which the politicke Embaffador requested not of the Baffa for any hope he had to auert the war, for which the Turke had now all things in readinesse, but only by such an hope of composition, to hinder the Turks endeauors, & towin time, vntil that the State (being fully certified of all these matters) might make ready their fleet and forces, and so in armes be ready to answere their armed foes: neither did he cuer leave the Bassa, vntill he had by his meanes procured, that one Cubates should be sent Embassador to Venice, to proue the minds Selymus finof the Senators, whether they would willingly deliuer the Island, or adventure to have it ta. deib cubates ken from them by force. These things and such like as were then done at Constantinople, being by Letters fent in post from the Embassadour, made knowne at Venice, brought a gene-Tall heavinesse vpon the city: for why, that understanding and provident State, warned by their F former harmes of all others most dread the Turks forces. Cubates the Embassadour accompanied with Aloylius Barbarus the Embassadors sonne, and Bonricius his Secretary, departing from Constantinople, came by long journies to Ragusium, where Angelus Surianus sent from Venice to meet him, was ready to receive him; who being taken into his gally, brought him to Venice.

Hard to truft vrouconfede.

In the mean time the Senators sitting oftentimes in counsell, were divided in opinions con. G cerning the chiefe matter they confulted vpon : some there were, that shought at not good to wagewar against such an inuincible enemy, nor to trust upon a vaine and title hope, wither to commit all vitto the hazard of fuch fortune as was vitto them in that war by the common propounded: they alledged, That they had alwaies unfortunatly taken up armes against the Turks. and that therefore they should fet before their cies, what harmes they had suffered, and how that beside the losses already sustained, they had alwaies in the winding up of the warres loss fomething more : that it were better to partwith Cyprus fo that they might quietly injoy the rest, rather than to enter into armes: Time they said would at length give them some one fit occasion or other to recouer that they had lost, and to restore their state vnto their former honour, which for the present, was about their power to maintaine: To put their trust in their H confederats (they faid) was but to deceive themselves: they should remember how often even small causes of false suspition, or hope of profit, or feare of harme, had veterly frustrated and broken in funder the most folemne capitulations of the strongest leagues: how often destru-Aion had come thence from whence and was alwaies to have bin hoped for, they needed not to seeke farther for examples, than from their own domesticall affaires. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the Island was by force of armes to be defended: faying, That nothing could be more dishonourable, than without fight to depart with so notable a part of their feigniory:neither any thing more commendable, than to proue all things for defence of their honour : neither would the proud Turks, with whom no affured league could be made (as they faid) hold themselues content with this yeelding up of the Island, but by intreating of them and giving them way, become more infolent: and when they had taken Cyprus from them. would also seeke after Creet & Corcyra, and so yeelding them one thing after another, spoile themselues of all together: Ambitious and greedy Princes (they said) grew more bold and infolent by other mens feare; and that no great or notable matter was to be done without danger that hard beginnings had oftentimes merry endings: that the fauor and good will of that insatiable and greedy nation, was not to be gained but with so great losse and charge as that such a costly piece would be much more hurtfull than war it selfe : beside that, it much concerned other Christian Princes to haue the Venetian State preserued, and that therefore it was to be hoped, that they would to the vttermost of their power give them aid. The matter thus debated too and fro, it was in the end resolued vpon, to take vp armes in defence of their honour, K and by plaine force to with stand the Turke.

So when Cubates the Turks Embassadour came to Venice, neither did any man of cuttesse meet him, neither was any honor done vnto him, or so much as common courtesse shewed vn. to him: but being afterward admitted into the Senat house with his two interpreters only, he deliuered Selymus his letters, inclosed in a little bag wrought with filke and gold; and so whilst the same letters were in breaking vp, and translating out of the Turkish language into Italian, deliuered also his message by word of mouth, as followeth:

What great account the mighty Sultan my dread Soueraigne hath alwaies made of your most honou-Tuite embassa- rable friendship, is therein right well declared; that in the very entrance of himselfe into his Empire, L he forthwith and without any hard or new conditions renewed his league with you: which he hath on his part alwaies kept most faithfully and unuiolate; worthily griening the like kindenesse not to be showed on your behalfe, neither the like care of keeping your faith to appeare in you; who by harbouring of Pyrats in your hauens, and murthering of his subjects, have oftentimes broken the league. Which injurits, although they were by war to have beene revenged ; yet hath he, so mighty a monarch, hitherto beene alwates more mindfull of your honour and friendship, than of his owne majesty and profit. But for asmuch as there is no end of these injuries and wrongs, and that it is now come to that point, That longer to forbeare, might be imputed unto him rather for cowardife than courtefie, as alfo that it much more concerneth your state than him, and that therefore you ought no lessethan he to desire, that all causes of unkindnessemight be cut off, and order token, that in so great and mutuall good will, there should be no falling M out by new quarrels dayly arising: the only remedy thereof is, if you shall deliver winto him the flando Cyprus, the cause of all these grievances. Now it beseemeth you for your great wisedome, to make small reckoning of so small a matter, in comparison of the fauour of so great a Prince, which if you willing! of your selves yeeld unto him, you stall right wisely provide for your affaires, and have him so great a monarch alwaies your friend and confederat : where we if you shall show your selues obstinate, and not to reeld to this hu fo fmall arequest, his purpose is, by strong hand not only to take from you the Island, the cause of the war, but also to prosecute you with most cruell war both by sea and land. And theruson I take God to witnesse, all the blame of the calamities to ensue of so mortall a war to be imputed unto your felnes. as the worthy neward of your wilfulneffe and breach of faith.

Which said he in the name of Muhamer the Visier Bassa told the Senatours, That he was right fory that this breach was fallen out betwixt the Emperor Selymus and them; and that although he doubted not but that they would right wifely confider of all things; yet he could B not for the good will he bare vnto them, but admonish them of such things as he deemed for them both profitable and wholesome and therefore did most instantly request them, and withall aduise them, not to enter into armes against so mighty a Prince, neither wilfully to plunge themselves into such dangers as they could hardly or never find the way out : for that their ftrength was nothing answerable vnto his, and that the event of that war would be vnto them deadly; and therefore he tooke God and the love that he bare vnto them to witnesse. that he had in friendly fort forewarned them of their harms, and aduised them for their good. Giving them further to vnderstand, that Solymus did nothing but thunder out most cruell threats against their State, which his indignation was raised of the manifold complaints. brought against them to his court at Constantinople.

Selymus his letters answerable to his Embassadours speech, was also full of false surmised The effect of Segrieuances; he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike maner entred into the frontiers is the feet of his Empire in Dalmatia, and there had don great harme; that they had put to death certain netians.

Turkish pyrats whom they had taken alive: that the Island of Cyprus was an harbor for the pyrats of the West; and that from thence they robbed his peaceable countries, & surprised his Subjects travelling that way for devotion vnto the Temple of Mecha, or otherwise about their affaires. And that therefore those causes of discord might be taken away, and the hinderance of trafficke removed, he required them to yeeld vnto him the Island of Cyprus: which if they refused to do be would by force of armes take it from them, and by force of strong hand cause them to do that which they might the better have done frankly and of their owne accordand D further, to make them understand how far the Turks did excell all other men in martial proweffe. As for the league before made betwixt his father and them, he faid he had renewed the fame, not because he had any liking thereunto, but because he had as then set downe with him-

selfe, for a while in the beginning of his Empire peaceably to endure all things.

The Venetians, for that they knew the Embassadours errand before his comming, having The answer of now read his Letters, gaue him such answer as they had before resoluted upon : which was, to the Turker That the Venetians had at al times inviolably kept their leagues with the Othoman Emperors, demands. and had in regard thereof let slip many opportunities and fit occasions for them to have augmented their dominions in: That they could without any danger to themselves, have destroied the Turks fleet both at the Rhodes and Malta, and other places also, but that they more re-B garded their honour; and alwaies thought, that nothing better became great and magnificent Princes, than to performe their faith once given, and in all their actions to be like themselves. And therfore had diffembled and put up many grieuous and bitter indignities, lest they might be thought to have first broken the league: That they had never passed their owne bounds, or inuaded the Turks; only to have taken order, that no pyrats should at their pleasure roame vp and downerhe feas. Now whereas all duties being on their parts fincetely and most religioufly kept; Selamus complained himfelfe to be wronged, whereas he himfelfe had done the wrong, and had contrary to the league, denounced war against them, expecting nothing lesse a fithence that they could not by the power of the league, they would by force of armes defend that Kingdome, which they by antient and lawfull right possessed, delivered vnto them by their Ancedors. That God, in whose helpe they trusted, would weigh in indifferent balance. all mens words and deeds, whom they tooke to witnesse, that they were the authors of beace. and Selymus the cause of warre; and that the same God would be now present vnto their just complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take reuenge on them, which fallifying their faith and promife given, and violating the facred league, had enforced them to take vp Cccc

Which outrage it was thought they would in their fury haue performed, had not such as by the commandement of the magistrats garded him, better affured him of his fafety, than either regard of duty or the law of nations; he by the way as he went fill ftorming, and fwearing by his Mahemet to be of that fo great an indignity re-The refolution uenged. This answer of the Senat wato the Turks Embassador concerning war, was of some of the Scant for well liked and highly commended, as full of honour and valour. Others deemed it too flarpe, H year distribution in the Turkish Emperoribeing of the Turkish Emperoribeing ted of others. of opinion, that they might have of him obtained a more indifferent peace by curtefie, than by rigor. As for the decreed was, they veterly difliked, for a finuch as all was were wofull, but especially those that were to be maintained against them that are too strong for vs. In such die uersitie of opinions it appeared, That the Senat should of that so honorable a decree reap such commendation, as the event therof should afford (than which nothing is more vareasonable) if things fell out well, then was it wifely and worthily done; if otherwife, then was it like to be reputed a foolish, a rash, and wofull resolution.

The greater the danger was now feared from the angry Turke, the more carefull were the Venetians of their State: wherefore they forthwith fent meffengers with letters who the Go. 1 uernors of Cyprus, charging them with all carefulnesse and diligence to make themselves ready to with stand the Turke, and to raise what power they were able in the Island, not unlitting any thing that might concerne the good of the flate and at the fame time made cholded then most valiant & expert captains both by sea and land, vntowhom they committed the defence of their dispersed Seigniory, with the leading of their forces. Hieronimus Zanim was appoint ted Admirall, Lucas Michael was sent into Creet, Franciscus Barbarus into Dalmatia, Sebistiana Venerius into Corcyra, all men of great honour, experience and valour. Other meaner captains were also sent with lesse charge into the aforesaid places, as Eugenius Zinglitus a noble gentleman with 1000 footmen into Cyprus, who had also the leading of all the horsemen in the Island : after whom County Martinengus promised to follow with 2000 footmen moe. The K firong cities were now by the Venetians in al places new fortified, armor, ordnance, and victuall provided, and what soeuer els they thought need full for defence of their State. And for as much as they well knew they had to do with too mighty an enemy, they by their Embaffadors fent for that purpole, earneftly folicited most of the Christian Princes to joyne with them in league, and to give them aid against the common enemy, who as he was too strong for any one The Emperour, of them, fo were he not able to stand against their vnited forces. But the Emperor Maximilian the French ting of excused himselfe by the league he had not long before made with the Turke for eight yeares, and the tank of which he faid he might not breake , yet he had before his eies a most pregnant example, what sled with their small reckoning the Turke made of his faith and league, which he without any just cause had to and the Ve. broken with the Venetians. The like excuse vied also Charles the French King, and Sigismund L. netian against King of Polonia; who both seemed to be very forty for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turke, but could not help them, for that they were in league with the Turkish Emperor. Neuerthelesse the French King did them the curtesie to offer himselfe to be a mediato, if they fo pleased, betwire them and Selymus. The yong King of Portingall Don's chaffing pretended also for his excuse the great plague which had but a little before raged in his kingdome, and much diminished his people; as also that he was to maintaine wars by sea against the Turks in the East-Indies, to the no leffe benefit of the Christian commonweale, than if he what christian should aid the Venetians in the Mediterranean. Only Piss Quintus then Populated Philipking Princes promise of Spaine, with certaine of the Princes of Italy; namely, Phileberr Doke of Sanoy, Guide Piles baldm Duke of Vibin, Cofmus Medices Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Males, promifed M them aid, which they afterward most honourably performed.

Selymus of himselfe angry with the Venetians, and firme in his resolution for the conquest of Cyprus, was upon the report of Cubates his Embassadors bad entertainment at Venice, sinther inraged the deemed the Majesty of the Turkish Emperor contemped, and himselfe in the person of his Embassador disgraced seeing that they whom he had thought would have veelded vnto any thing, rather than the league should have bin broken, had sent him such a short answer, and so concemptuously vsed his ombassador, vnto whom they had not afforded so much as common curtefie. It did nor a little moue him alfo, that the Venetians had in their letters fent by his embaffador, omitted the glorious titles vivally given the Turkish Emperors; wherfore in some part to fatisfie his angry mood, he caused Marcus Amonius Barbarus the Venetian Embassador, and all the Christian Merchants of the West thorowout his Empire, to be clant vp in prison, and their ships staied under an arrest. And setting all other things apart, set himfelse wholly for the preparing of such things as should be needfull for the intended war.

But for a fruich as the Island of Cyprus was the prey whereafter the greedy tyrant fo much gaped, and for which the bloudy wars betwirt the Turke and the Venetians, with their Chriftian consederats, presently ensued it shal not be from our purpose to spend a few words in the describing thereof, as the stage whereon the bloudy tragedy following was as it were a fted: as also how it came first into the hands of the Venetians, and by what right of them so long possessed (although it be in some part before declared) untill it was now by Selymus the Great Turke, again (all right injuriously demanded, & at length by strong hand wrested from them. the death of his father maried the daughter of the Marquis of Mont ferratrafter whose death, P he married one Helena of the most noble house of the Paleologi in Grania, by whom he had one only daughter called Carlotte; but by another woman a base son called James. This King John was a man of no courage, altogether given to pleasure, and according to the maner of his efforminat education, showed himself in all things more like a woman than a man: which Helena his wife, a woman of a great spirit, quickly perceiuing, tooke upon her the soueraignty and whole gouernment of the Realme, gracing and diffracing whom the pleafed, and promoting to the G Ecclesiastical dignities such as the best liked; abolishing the Latine ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greekes, and tooke such further order as pleased her selfe in matters of state concerning both peace and warre; her husband in the meaner time regarding nothing but his vaine pleasure: wherby it came to passe that all was brought into the power of the Greeks the queenes friends. Now the queene her felfe was much ruled by the counself of her nurle, and the nurse by her daughter fo that the people would commonly say, The daughter ruled the nurse, the nurse the queene, and the queene the king. The nobility ashamed and weary of this manner of gouernment, by generall confent of the people, fent for tohn the king of Pottingals coulin german (whom fome call the king of Portingall) to whom they gaue Carlotte the gais coulin german (whom touc can hower to supply that want of gouernment which was in king Iohn his father in law. He taking the authority into his hands, quickly reformed the difordred kingdome, as well in matters concerning religion, as civile policy. The Latine cere. monies were againe restored, and the gouernment of the daughter, the nurse, and the Queene. brought to an end. But the mischieuous daughter doubting the countenance of the yong king perfused her mother, as the tendred her own life, to poifon the King. Which thing the wretched woman (by the consent of the queene mother, as was reported) in short time performed and so brought that noble prince, wel worthy longer life, vnto his vntimely end : whereby the gouernment was again restored vnto the Greeke queen, who in the name of her weake husband commanded again at her pleasure. But aboue all, the nurse and the daughter insulted upon the yong queene Carlotte: which the not well brooking, grieuoufly complained thereof to Iones her base brother, requiring his helpe for redresse thereof : who not long after slew the nurses daughter, not fo much in revenge of the wrong by her done vnto his fifter, as to prepare a way for himselfe for the obtaining of the kingdome; grieuing inwardly; that she or her husband should be preserved before himselfe. Which thing Helena the queene quickly perceiving, perfuaded the King her husband to cause his base son to enter into the order of priesthood, and fo to become a Church-man, thereby to cut offall his hope of aspiring vnto the kingdome: which the king at her instance did, and made him Archbishop of Nicosia. In the meane time Carlette by the persuasion of her mother and the nobility of the country, married Lewis son to the duke of Sauoy: who being for that purpose sent for, came with all speed to Cyprus. After that, the queene mother and the old nurse (desirous nothing more, than to revenge the death of of the nurses daughter, vpon Iames now Archbishop) deuised first how to thrust him out of all his spirituall promotions, which were great, and afterward quite banish him the kingdom. Hereupon the queene wrote letters against him to the Pope, to have him degraded, for thathe being a man base borne, with his hands imbrued with guilt lesse bloud, was vnworthy of holy orders. Which letters by chance came to Iames his hands: who inraged therewith, accompanie ed with a number of his friends and fauourits, fuddenly entred the court, flew fuch of his enemies as he found there, divided their goods among ft his followers, and as king poffeffed himfelfe of the regall city. In this broile the Greeke queene Helena died, and shortly after her hufband also. All things being thus in a hurley and out of order, certains of the nobility for redresse thereof, sent for Lewis the husband of Garlotte, as for him to whom that kingdome in the L right of his wife most justly belonged : who upon his agricuall was, of all forts of men joyfully received & welcommed as their king. Iames the viurper understanding before of the comming of Lewis, and perceiving the inclination of the people towards him, fled with divers of his friends to Alexandria to craue aid of the Ægyprian Sultan : in whose court he found such fauour, as that he was by the Sultans commandement royally apparelled and honoured with the title of the king of Cyprus, which he promised for ever to hold of the Sultans of Ægypt as their vassal and tributary. At which time the Sultan also by his embassadors commanded Lenis to depart the Isle who by all means fought to have pacified the Sultan declaring vito him his rightfull title, yet offering to pay vnto him the wonted tribute, and so allow vnto James a yetely pension of 10000 duckats during his life. But all in vaine, for James Still present in the Sul- M zans court, and wifely following his owne fuit, at last concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a king, than to confirme a king) and meeiuing of him a great army, returned into Cyprus, where in thort time he to diffreffed Lowis, that he was glid to for fake the Island, with his wife, and to return into his country, leaving the kingdome of Cyprus

A again to lames who now by the supportation of the Ægyptian Sultan possessed therof, vet liued not without care of Carlette & her husband Lewis, whom he knew the Cipriots wonderfully affected. Wherfore for the more affurance of his estate, he thought it best to joine in league and friendship with the Venetians, whom he knew to be of great power at sea, and of all other firtest to crosse what soeuer Lewis should in the right of his wife attempt against him. Which league he afterwards made, and the better to confirme the same, tooke to wife Catherin Cornelis, the daughter of Marcus Cornelius a Magnifico of Venice, being before adopted to the Senar, and euer after their reputed daughter. Not long after this marriage, James died in the vere 1470, leaving the Queene great with child, who in due time was delivered of a faire fon voto whom with the mother the Venetian State became tutors, as their adoptive fathers, & in their behalfe tooke, you them the government of the realme. This childe shortly after died also. not without some suspicion of poison; after whose death great troubles arose in the kingdom. infomuch that Andrew Cornelius the queens uncle, a most grave counfellour, and gonernour of the Realme under the queene, was by the confpiracy of certaine noblemen flaine, and all the Mand ready to repolt from the queene. For appealing of which troubles, the Venetians were glad oftentimes to fend their admirals with their gallies into Cyprus, to take order in the matter, and to aid the queene: who at length perfuaded by George Cornelius her brother, whileft it was yet in her power, as a louing daughter to yeeld up the kingdom unto her adoptive fathers. which the defitute both of counfell and power, could not long hold fo far from her friends. befet on the one fide with the Great Turke, and on the other with the mighty Sultan of Æ-C gypt , Sheil fay, thus perfuaded by her brother, came to Venice, where the was with the greatest honor that could be deuised, received by the Duke & whole State at sea in their great and goodly thip the Beucentaure, and fo with all royall triumph brought thorow the midft of the Sabellie Engire city vnto the place most richly for the time appointed for the receiving of her where shortly advoited a after, attired in all her royall habiliments the came in great Majesty vnto the Senat house, and there before the tribunal feat of Augustinus Barbadieus then Duke of Venice, laied downe her crowne and Repter, and as a most louing daughter refigued vp her kingdome, to the great honor and profit of her country. Thus the kingdome of Cyprus was deliuered into the hands of the Venetians in the years 1473; which they peaceably held from that time, paying vnto the Sultan of Ægypt such tribute as had the late King Iames : which yearely tribute they in like D manner payed vnto the Turkish Emperors, after that the kingdome of Ægypt was by Selymus the first conquered in the years 1517, as due vnto him by law of Armes: with which yearely tribute both Selymu himselfe, and Solyman after him, held themselves well contented. But now this Turkish Emperour Selymus the second, of whom we speake, desirous both of the honour of fuch a conquest, and of so rich a prey, made no account of the accustomed tribute, but of the fruitfull Island it felfe whereof he, as is before declared, hath by his Embassadour made a proud demand but is thereof denied by the Senar. Selymus throughly furnished with all things necessary for the inuation of Cyprus, in the be- 1570 ginning of February fent a great power both of horse and soon into Epirus, and the frontiers of selsmusaus. against the Christians at Zerbi, and afterward by many degrees rife to the honour of one of the greatest Bassa's. He departing from Constantinople, and cutting thorow Polopone fur and Helespontus, came to Euboea, and there for certaine daies lay in such order, as if he should have prefently given the enemy battell: but understanding by his espials, that the Venetians griewordly vifited with the plague, and flowly relieved by their friends, were not like in halte to fome out he sook his course to Tenos an Island of the Venetians, to have taken it from them. This Island is one of the Cyclades, and was by nature strong, but stronger by the industry of the defendants, who living fer from the Christian countries, and compassed about with such fruell and warlike enemies, as people fat diftant flood in dread of, could never for any feare or danger be removed from the Christian religion, or induced to submit themselves to the Turks government, as most of the other Islands had. Piall here landing his forces, sought both by faire meanes and foule to have perfuaded the Inhabitants to have yeelded up the Towne: 6 but when he could get nothing of them but foule words againe, he began by force to affault the same. Two daies the Towne was valiantly both assaulted and desended that at length the Turks perceiving how little they prevailed, and that the defendants were refolately fet downe for the defence of themselves and their Country; shamefully gave over the assult. and abandoning the Island, directed their course toward Cyprus. For Mastapha author of that expedition (for his antient hatred against the Christians made Generall by Selyman) had before appointed Piall Bassa at a time prefixed to meet him at the Rhodes; and that he that came thither first should tarry for the other, that so they might together faile into Mustapha having before sent a great part of his army by land into Pamphilia, embarqued H the rest with Haly Bassa Generall of the forces at sea, who yet staied for him with the rest of the fleet at Constantinople. This Haly was one of the chiefe Bassa's, a man of great account, and formetime an especiall and noted follower of Muhamet Baffagout now (as it is oftentimes elfewhere feene, that men together with the change of fortune, change their minds and affections alfo) was become a great fauorite of Mustapha. Now to colour fo manifest a wrong and breach of the Turks faith, Muftapha the Generall, according to the Turkish manner, a little before his arrivall in Cyprus, gaue the Venetians there to understand by letters of his comming, stalk of his purpose for the taking of that Island from them for that without some such senderde nouncing of war vnto them against whom it is intended, the Turke generally account their expeditions not to be altogether fo lawfull or fortunate as otherwife; and thereforewittento 1'

Mustapha Bassa, vnto the Venetians

Hat the Kingdome of Cyprus by antient right belongeth unto the hingdome of Agypt, you are not ignorant, which being conquered by the Turks, it together with it become of right a part also file Othoman Empire: that Island we come to challenge, leading after us two hundred thou and values fill diers untowhich power, and the wealth of the Othoman King domes (all which, the most might Empire vor is about, if need shall be, to send shisher, and to bend his whole strength thereon) all the united forces of the Christian Kings are not comparable, much lesse the Venetians, fo small apart of Europe, for fakes & of their friends, can suffice. Wherefore we will and exhort you, for the antient amicy which has been betwirt your State and the willerious Othoman Pamily, to yeeld this king dome wate the mift pullant Emperous, whose very name is become dreadfull to all the nations of the World; and quietly and without resistance to trans the Island, with the love and friendship of so event a Monarch to be for ever invioledly kept betweene him and you. Whereas if you shall before such wholesome counsels, fondly preset jour value hopes, you are to expect all the calamities of war, with fuch dreadfull examples at the angry Conquerents where of their vanquilbed enemies. For refolution whereof, we yet give you halfe a mineral face to besbinke your felnes in : and fo fare you well.

All this being now in readineffe, and a most toyall gally of wonderfull great will beau. L ty by the appointment of Selymin prepared for the great Baffa the Generall; he togriffer wit Hay Baffa and the reft of the fleet departed from Conftantinople the fix & twentiether May and at the Rhoder met with Piall, as he had before appointed. The whole fleet at this fine confifted of two hundred gallies, among ft whom were divers galliors, and final men of wal with divers other vessels prepared for the transportation of horses; with this sleet of which the Tartifiest kept on his course for Cyprus. They of the Island in the meane time carefully attending the defend in cy enemies comming, from their watch towers first discovered their sleet at the Westend of the Island, not far from Paphos: from whence the Turks turning upon the right hand, and printing the promontory Curio, now called Del Le Gate, landed divers of effert men, who being and spoiled certaine villages, and with such spoile and prisoners as they had taken; returned again M The Tarks land vinto the fleet; which holding on their former courfe, came at length to a place called Saling (of the abundance of fale thete made) where they knew was best landing, and there is more roade came to an anchor, where the Baffa's without any reliftance vpon a plaine shore landed their army.

Now all the hope of the Christians, was to have kept the Turks from landing, which they should with all their strength and power have done, neither was it a matter of any great difficulty, for had the defendants but kept the shore, and from the dry and firme land valiantly repulsed their enemies, they might vindoubtedly with their shot and weapons have kept them from landing, or els had done them greater harme; knowing in the mean time, that in all the Island was no good harbour for them to put into, and that riding in an open road subject to al wind and weather, they could not long without danger of shipwrackeride it out : but they cither terrified with the greatnesse of the fleet, or preuented by the celerity of the enemy, to their great hurt omitted fo faire an oportunity, as the wofull sequell of the matter declared. It exceedingly incouraged the Turks that they had so easily sooted the Island, which they thought they should not have done without a bloudy fight.

The Bassa now landed, presently intrenched his army, and forthwith sent the fleet to transport the rest of his forces out of Pamphilia into the Island. And at the same time sent out certaine scouts to take some prisoners of whom they might learne the scituation of the country, the best water to passe them with his army, the strength of his enemies, and what they did, and many other such like things which it concerned him to know. But the greatest question among the Turks themselves was, Whether they should first set upon Famagusta or Nicosia ? Famagustastandeth low, altogether subject to the scorching heat, which was then great, according as the time of the yeare, and nature of the country required : wherefore the Baffa for feare of diseases to arise in his army of the immoderate heat and vnwholesome scituation of the place. C thought it better to begin his wars with the fiege of Nicosia, and to make that city the feat of the war, for the conquest of the rest of the Island. So having put all things in order, and well viewed the country, and finding nothing he needed to stand in doubt of, he set forward with Musapha safhis army roward Nicossa, which was about thirty miles distant, being the chiefe and richest same the same the same the same the same that the city of all the Island. Which way focuer the army marched, it foread a great deale of ground a and the neerer it came, the greater was the flaughter of the country people, and the number of prisoners taken of all forts. But when news of the enemies approch was brought into the city, a generall feare presaging future misery possessed the hearts of all men. There was not in the city any valiant or renowned captaine, who as the danger of the time required, should brave taken upon him the charge: neither any strong army in the Island to oppose against the ene-D my : the Gouernor of the city was one Wicholam Dandulm, a man too weake for fo great a bur- Nicholam Danthen, who alwaies brought up in civile affaires, was to feck how to defend a fiege. Of the citi. dalso Goserner fens and country people he had taken up foure thousand footmen, and a thousand horsmen, all of Ninga. raw foldiess, commanded by the gentlemen of the country, men of all others most courteous; but as well the captaines as the fouldiers, as men brought up in a plentifull country, fitter for pleasure than for war. The greatest hope and strength of the city, was reposed in twelte hundred Italian footmen, and fix hundred horsemen. The whole number of the souldiers in garrison for defence of the city, was deemed about 8000 horse and foot: too weake a company against fo sierce and strong an enemy; and the more, for that the Basia an old and most expert Arenerall was there in person himselfe present, a most seuere and absolute commander, whom it would have beene a hard matter to have with flood with equal power. The Venetians had enerhad great care of the Island of Cyprus, as lying far from them, in the midst of the sworne enemies of the Christian religion, and had therefore oftentimes determined to have fortified the same 1 yet fearing therby to seeme to distrust or dread the Turks, and so give them occasion of offence, left ie ftill vidoue. This city of Nicoffa ftandeth in the middeft of the Island, The description in a plaine and champaine country, compassed round with a wall, as if it had been drawne with of rejection. a compaffe, and is in circuit about fine miles for the maner of the scituation, and magnificent buildings, as well publique as privat; many have compared it vnto the beautifull city of Flozence in Italy: and was for the wholesome and commodious scituation thereof notably peopled. This city had the Venetians of late fortified with new wals, thicke rampiers, and eleven F firong bulwarkes, according to the manner of the fortification of our time, and had raifed three great fortreffes for defence of the wall, which they furnished with a strong garrison, great store of artillery and other warlike prouision. Neuerthelesse, they found by experience in this war, That foreifications are firengthened by the defendants, rather than the defendants by the fortifications.

The 22 of Iuly, the Baffa with his army incamped within a mile & a halfe of the city, when G presently the Tarks by troups issuing out of the campe, rid contemptuously before the walls and gates of the city, and with often and loud outcries upbraided the defendants; which by them being answered with silence, was taken as a token of their feate. And Mustapha himselfe comming as neere as he might without danger, tooke full view of the wals and feituation of the city. Shortly after, the enemy drew neerer vnto the city into a more open plaine; and with their tents filled the lower part of the hill, which they call Mandia: but the Baffa's tent they fet aloft voon the hill, to the terrour of the defendants and incouragement of the Turks. The campe being fortified, the Turks with incredible labour and celerity brought their trenches from far, and at the first cast up some few forts, but afterwards, as their army increased, many mo; which they raifed fo high, that they ouestopped the wals of the city, and made the place more dangerous for the Christians to defend. There having placed 70 great pieces of battery. Nicefa barred they began to batter the city both day and night without intermission; with such an horrible and affaulted, thundring, that the earth trembled, the houses shooke as if they would have fallen down tat fient valuantly which time many were flaine, both with the deadly shot, and the broken pieces of stones bear defended.

Being come fo nigh, they first skirmished a farre of with their small pieces: but afterwards, they not onely battered the walls with their great attillety. but with small shot, arrowes, and stones, ouerwhelmed the defendants, as if it had bine shower of hailes to to have driven them from off the wall and rampires. In few daies, not only all the curtaines betwixt three of the bulwarks, was by the fury of the great ordnance beaten downer but all places thereabout lay full of the dead bodies of the affailants and defendants. For al. though the Christians foughtat great disaduantage, both for the number of men, and indiffe. rency of the place: yet desperation joyned with extreame necessity, of all othershe greatest weapon, gaue them fuch courage as with fhot, stones, timber, and fuch like, to keep down their enemies, and defend their wals ; and ofrentimes to make great flaughter of them, with their as. tillery & murthering pieces, bentypon them as at a certain marke, who the thicker they flood the greater was their harme. They also oftentimes dismounted many of the great pieces and made them unferuiceable, and with feather beds and facks of cotton, wool, madeup their bress & ches which the Turks labored again to burn with pitch barrels, and earthen pots full of wild fire. After long fight the Turks entring the ditch, made themselves two waies to the walls, which they fortified on both fides with faggors & earth; in fuch fort, as that they were fafe from the loupes of the bulwarks which flankered the ditch. All this quickly performed, some prefently fet up scaling ladders: others filled the ditches with rubbish, wood faggots & earth and others in the meane time with mattocks and leavers were digging down the foundations of the bulwarkes Constance and Padocatera, taking name of them that had the chiefe charge in the building therof. The Christians right valiantly endured the first assault of the enemy, and firucke downe dead into the ditches many of them that were climing up the ladders : and had in (hort time flain mo than they were themselves in number, and inforced the refusogine over & the affault. These things were done in the beginning of the siege, whilst yet both patties were Arong in which hard conflicts a great number of foldiers were loft, and most of the canoniers flain. After this affault, both parties for a mhile busied themselves and spent their time in their ingenious deuises, wherein it appeared that the Turks were much cominger in deuising of meanes to take the city, than were those Christians in desending the same.

Now had the Venetians in the first motions of these warres, praied aid of divers Christian Princes, from most part of whom they received but cold comfort, as is before declared inet now at length (though somewhat late) they had drawn into the confederation of this war, the Pope and the King of Spain by whole example form other princes of Italy moned put to allo their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter most concerned, haddingood M time put their fleet to fea, but knowing themselves too weake to encounter the ibink nehey lay fill vpon the coast of Dalmaria, about I adera expecting the comming of the Spanish Admit rall with his gallies. Two moneths (wherein much might haue been done) were now pastiin this expedition, and yet no newes of his comming : fo that what the speed and industry of the Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingering of the Spaniards, marred, Besides that the plague began to arise in the fleet, lying so long in one place; which at length grew so hot, that many of the gallies had neither marriner nor fouldier left in them: neither did this mortality fo cease, vntill there were twenty thousand dead thereof; amongst whom were many noble gentlemen of great account, which might have done their country good feruice, had they been in time imploied.

Summer now almost halfe spent, and the plague well ceased, the Venetian Admirall weary The Venetian which he had before dispersed to avoid the infection, sailed to Corcyra, where he met with teene saile as Venerias, another of the Venetian commanders, who there staid for him, having but a little be- Coregra.

fore taken from the Turks Cestria, now called Supporo, a town vpon the sea coast over against Corcyra. The whole fleet of the Venetians being affembled together, was an hundred and feuenteene faile, among ft which were 12 great galeasses, but all too weake to give battell to the Turks, as being themselves kronger in shipping than in men. Neuerthelesse, the Admirall forry and weary to fee the spoile of the Venetian territory, and moved with the diffresse of the befieged in Nicosia, rather than for any hope he had with that strength to do any good against the Turks fleet, departed from Corcyra towards Creet, and the twelfth of August landed at Suda, a port of that Island. In the latter end of this month, Columnius the Popes Admirall, and Auria Admirall for the king of Spaine, arrived there also, whom the Venetian Admirall welcommed with great joy and triumph. The whole fleet of the confederat Princes now at length C met together, consisted of an hundred ninety two gallies, and twelue galleasses, beside victualers and other small vessels, laded with munition and other necessary provision for the fleet. Of these gallies the Pope had set out twelve, the King of Spaine forty two, the rest with the galcaffes were the Venetians. In this fleet were imbarked thirteen thousand fix hundred threescore fouldiers : of whom the Pope sent eleven hundred, the King of Spaine three thousand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thousand six hundred and sixty. About the middest of September, this great fleet furnished with all things n needfull for such an expedition, loofed from Creet, and with a faire gale of winde set forward for Cyprus; in all their course keeping such order, as if they should presently have met with the enemy. In the middest of these troubles died Petrus Loredanus, Duke of Venice, lea-

Dukedome. Whilst the Christians thus slowly proceed in their soweighty affaires, Mustapha in the mean time laid hard fiege to Nicofia: and dividing his army into foure parts, affaulted foure of the bulwarks of the city, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the siege. The assault was both long and terriblessury, and the very sight of the warlike Generall, who was there a present witnesse, and beholder of euery mans forwardnesse or cowardise (a matter of great moment) besides their natural siercenesse, carried the Turks headlong without any perill or danger. And on the other fide, the greatnesse of the danger, the seare to lose both life and liberty, with the hope of reliefe, encouraged the defendants to dare any thing: fo that the Turks could not approch the wals, or mount their scaling ladders, but they were presently flain, or together with their ladders thrown to the ground. Many of the Turks were there flain, but especially such as were most forward; and of the defendants were also more lost than shood with the safety of so small a number : and for a smuch as sew or none escaped out of that fight vnwounded, the poore defendants were brought vnto a small number. Many skilfull men were of opinion, that the city might have bin that day taken, if the affault had by the Baffa bin longermaintained by bringing still on fresh men sbut such was his losse, as that he was glad F for that time to give over the affaut, and fo with dishonour to retire.

After this affault, it was by some of the captaines thought good, that they should (whilest The Christians. they were yet of some reasonable strength in the city) fally forth voon the enemy: so to make styrum in the city of the standard and with his some good horse in themselves and with all by so studies an appropriate of the standard and strength in the city of the standard and strength shew, that they had yet some good hope in themselves, and withal by so sudden an exuption to Tarks. performe fomething upon the secure enemy. Of which motion Dandalus the Gouernor in no case liked, as loth by such a dangerous piece of service to diminish the number of the defendants, and fo to give the enemy an eafier means to take the city. Yet feeing all the captaines generally of another mind, he yeelded vnto their desire, So in the hortest time of the day, when as the Turks least thought that the Christians would have sallied out certain Italian companies under the conduct of Cafar Plonianus of Vincentia, and Albertus Scotus, iffued out by the gate that leadeth to Famagusta, and vpon the sudden brake into the enemies trenches, where they found the Turks some playing, some sleeping, but searing nothing lesse than that the Christians whom they dayly braued, durst to have adventured to come forth. But when the Turks, awaked with the alarme, came running in on enery fide. the Italians oppressed with the multitude, were glad to retire in which retreat divers of them were flaine, and among it them their two leaders Cafar and Alberton: fo that this fally ferued to no other purpose than to weaken the defendants themselves, and to cause the Turks to keepe better watch and ward against such sudden eruptions.

About the same time divers letters were shot with arrows into the city, to persuade the besse.

ged Christians to yeeld themselves for that in so doing they should find the Bassa mild and mercifull conqueror: wheres otherwise if they should by wilfull holding out delay his victo. ry, they were fure to indure what soever could be indured or suffered. But when Mustaphabad thus in vaine with hope and feare tried the minds of the defendants, he called forth to parley Multapha Baffa Certaine fouldiers that were standing upon the bulwarke called Constantius, of whom some in variable for were by the confent of the Gouernor fent forth vnto him: vnto whom Muftapha by his inter-Nicofa to reta pretor complained. That no answer was given unto his letters; he set forth unto them the glo- K ry, power, and greatnesse of the Turkish empire; and debased the strength of the Venetians: then he perfuaded them to yeeld, propounding vnto them the miseries that would sall vpon them if the city (hould by force be taken; which he threatned would be far greater than the danger the Turks were to undertake for the winning thereof; and that therefore it concerned none fo much as themselues, whether the city were given up by composition, or els woon by firong hand: he shewed into them the profit that should arise into them by yeelding of ityp, and offered to them large entertainment, if they would ferue him: and to conclude, told them, that they should neuer afterward find at his hands so great grace as was at that instant offered them. The crafty Baffa did what he might to haften the winning of the city, both for that he doubted the comming of the Christian fleet, & that his great army was exceedingly troubled L with contagious and grieuous diseases, arising of the immoderat hear & drought in that so hot a country. But the fouldiers thinking any thing more affured than the Turkish faith answered him. That they did not as yet doubt their own strength, & that they were ready to indure any thing that could happen, rather than to prefer the vncertain friendship of an vnknowne prince, before the gracious fauour of fuch worthy Princes as they had fo good experience of

This answer cut off all the Bassa's hope for taking of the city by composition: wherewith being both grieued & enraged, he commanded all things to be made ready for the affault and the more to encourage his foldiers, promifed wato them great rewards and honors that should first or second mount the wals. After that he gave a generall assault vnto the city with all his power:wherein both he as a most worthy captaine, and his soldiers, fought most siercely. You M haue to do (faid he) with the small and last remainders of your enemies which are scarce able to stand or hold their weapons in their hands, rather than with enemies indeed thall you not then casily ouercome them, being but few and feeble, that have vanquished them when they were many and lufty? The end of all your labor is at hand, your hoped rewards approch, only

A play you the men, and faint not in this affault; the spoile of this rich city shal be the worthy reward of your labours, the fruit of all your trauell confideth in this one moment. Whilest he thus incourageth some, and reproueth others, they mindfull of his promises, and these of the difgrace, altogether with their thick thot fuffer no man to stand in fascty vpon the wals; & out of their forts alfowith their great ordnance greatly annoied the defendants. This done, they Nitefit mil attempted by the ruines of the wall, and in other places by scaling ladders to have entred the tember affault was by the cruell enemy maintained nor for form from how he is the planting the started by city. Which terrible affault was by the cruell enemy maintained, not for some few houres, but for divers daies together without intermission, fresh men still comming on in stead of them that were wounded or flain. Yet did the defendants valiantly indure all that ftorm, and in fuch weake cafe as they were, worthily performed what was possible for so few to doe: yet still in B hope (the poore comfort of men in misery) that reliefe might come by the approch of the Christian fleet. At length, when the matter was brought to this point, that the Turks were in great hope to have gained the wals, and Multapha himselfe probably guessed, that the Christians were now weary of the long affault, and fore weakned with wounds and other infinit miferies, not to feeke in a city fo hardly diffressed, and was in that his opinion also confirmed by certain fugitiue Christians: he neuerthelesse vpon the sudden caused a retreat to be sounded, & foretiting into his trenches, lay ftil all the next day without any thing doing. The defendants thinking that he had given over the affault, because of some aid that was comming to their reliefe, became more carelesse of the enemy, & vpon the vain hope of such aid, with lesse diligence repaired their breaches and prouided for the repulfing of their enemies. But the Baffa C in the mean time had chosen out of his whole army about 200 of his best captains & soldiers. allmen of aproued valour and agility of body, whom the next day after, he fencearly in the morning, to make proofe if they could by scaling ladders secretly and without any noise set vp, get into the foure bulwarkes which he had before fore shaken with his great ordnance. These resolute men leading the way, got first vp, after whom followed divers others, and so The Turks gain tooke the aforesaid bulwarks: when presently after, other companies of their fellowes which the bulwarks frood ready for the purpose, comming on forward, did with their scaling ladders in divers pla. Nicopa. ces recouer the top of the wals : for now the matter was not done by fecret furprise, but by open force. In euery one of these bulwarkes were 70 Italians and as many Epirots, who there keptwatch and ward; these men part ascep, as fearing no such danger, and part lying, lasily vp-D on the ground, were there surprised on the sudden and slain : othersome of them awaked with the strange and vncouth noise, betooke not themselves lustily to their weapons, but for saking their stations leapt down out of the bulwarks at such places as were next vnto them, some for feate ran vnawares into the middest of their enemies. V pon this alarme some of the Christian captains came speedily to the walls with their companies, as did Eugenius, who whilest be in vaincrieth out to such fearefull fouldiers as he met, that they should not so cowardly fly, and flaieth others that were flying, was himfelfe shot thorow with a small shot and slaine. Other eaptains in other places likewise labored in vain to have staid the flying souldiers, whose perfuafions, requests, and authority in so generall a feare, nothing at that time prenailed. The defendants thus beaten from the wals and bulwarks, gathered themselues into the mar- Nicofa taked E ket place: but the citisens stealing home to their owne houses, there stood in the entrances of by the Tarks. the same, searefully expecting the destruction of the country, together with their owne. In the meane time the Gouernor of Aleppo with his regiment scoured the walls of the city round about, as he had in charge from the Generall: and without respect put to sword all that he met. armed or vnarmed. At the bulwarke called Barbarus, it fortuned him to light vpon a company of Italians, who for a while fought desperatly, but were in the end ouerthrowne and slaine. When he had thus cleared the wals, & left fuch companies as he thought good in places conuenient for the keeping of them, he came down into the more open places of the city; and feeing them that were gathered together into the market place to have cast themselves into a ring and to fight as men altogether desperat, he caused certain murthring pieces to be bent vp-F on them : which they perceiving, laied down their weapons, and yeelded themselves vnto the mercy of the enemy. By and by all the gates of the city were strongly guarded by the enemy, to the intent that no man should go in or out. Dandalsu the Governor, and Contarensus the Bishop of Paphos, with the rest of the nobility, and better fort of the citisens, had got themselves into the towne hall, and their stood voon their guard : vnto whom Mustapha sent word, that he would take them all to mercy, if they would without further refistance yeeld themselves. But G whiles messengers run to and fro, the Turks violently brake in vpon them, and there sew them enery man. After the death of these noblemen, the cruell enemy spared none : and having flain fuch as they found abroad in the freets, brake into the houses, where they made hauceke of all things: yong babes were violently taken out of the hands of their mothers, virgins were thamefully rauished, and honest matrons before their husbands faces despightfully abused A great fireb. churches were spoiled, and all places filled with mourning and dead bodies: the streets were in all places stained with bloud, for in the city was slain that day fourteen thousand eight hun. died threescore and fix persons. Neither was there any end of the spoile, vntill the greedy ene my had carried away all the wealth that long peace had heaped vp. It is reported, that the prey there taken, amounted to twenty hundred thousand millions of duckats: 200 of the most H goodly and beautifull youths were chosen out of purpose to be sent to Constantinople for present for Selymus. In the city were taken also 250 pieces of great ordnance: whereof some were by the enemy carried away, and the rest left for defence of the city. Thus the famous city of Nicolia, fometime the regall leat of the Kings of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the Turks, the ninth day of September in the yeare 1570, in whose power it still remaineth.

Mustapha having as he thought best disposed of all things in Nicosia, with the very terrous of his name, rather than by any force, brought most part of the rest of the townes in the Island under his obeyfance; and by faire intreaty and promife of good vfage, brought backe again unto their wonted dwellings the rude country people, who by the comming of the Turks were fled with all that they had into the mountains; them as men not to be feared he commanded 1 civene retited to till and fow their land as they were wont. The city of Cyrene is strongly sciruated, not far unio the Turks. from the fea, and was then well furnished of all things needful for the induring of a long fiege.

Higher the Baffa fent one of the Sanzackes to fummon the city, more to proue the courage of the defendants, than for any hope he had to have the city delivered vnto him. But Alphonius Palacius then Gouernour of the city, terrified with the losse of Nicosia, no sooner saw the enemy, but that without any further deliberation or force vied against him, he delivered up the towne vnto the Sanzacke; couenanting only in reward of his cowardife. That he might in fafe. ty depart from thence with all his garrison souldiers : which was easily granted, and the city

Not long after, Mustapha leaving a thousand horsemen, and three thousand foot in garrison & in Nicofia, marched with the rest of his army to besiege Famagusta. And the more to tetrifie them of the city, he by a poore country fellow, whom he bad for that purpose set at liberty, fent vnto them in a basket the head of Nicholaus Dandulus, late Gouernor of Nicolia, and at the same time sent before him divers horsemen, who your their horsemens staves carried the heads of many of the noblemen flaine at Nicofia, wherewith they rid as in triumph about the wals of the city. Which thing he did, in hope that they of Famagusta terrified with such a spe-&acle, and the late ouerthrow at Nicolia, would for feare of like misery yeeld themselves. But deceived in this his expectation, he encamped his army about three miles from the city. Afterwards having taken view of the city, and well confidered of the scituation thereof, be with wonderfull celerity cast vp divers mounts against the same, and at the same time caused batte. I ry to be laid against the great tower which defended the hauen : he himselfe also in the meane while battering the gate that leadeth to Amathus. But perceiving by the desperatsallies of the defendants, their great courage, and that it was like to have much more to do in this fiege than he had in the winning of Nicosia, and Winter also now drawing fast on (being about the latter end of September) he thought it best betime to prouide, that by lying there he hazarded not the honour he had with so much labor and danger before gained; and the rather, for that it was commonly reported, that the Christian fleet was at hand whereforehe rife with fouldiers in the villages round about for that Winter. The Tarket at The Baffa's at fea, Haly & Peall, lying before Famagusta, doubting the comming of the Chris M. fer aductifed him fleet, which then lay at Creet, fent out fix galliots to diffeour the doings of the Christiof the Conflict ans : who returning with certaine prisoners taken in the Island of Creet, declared valothe feet , prepare Baffa's what they had learned concerning the Christian fleet, and that it was already upon the way to Cyprus. Vpon which intelligence the Bassa's put their seet in order of battell, and set his army, and retired himselfe further off into the country, where he shortly after bilited his

A forwards towards Limiffo to have met with the Christians who with a prosperous wind were comming betwire the Islands of Caprathos and the Rhodes:but there understanding by their chials, that Nicolia was loft, and that the Turks were come to beliege Famagusta, they called a Councell of all the chiefe Commanders in the fleet, to consult what were best to do in fo dangerous a case. Columnins the Popes Admirall, and then chiefe Commander in the fleet. with Zanius the Venetian Admiral, were of opinion, That it were best to hold on theer course for Cyprus, and to relieue Famagusta: for that it was like that the Turks proud of their late The commanvictory, were for defire of prey, for most part gon ashore into the Island, and so left their fleet flies fleet of disbut flenderly manned. Beside that, they alledged, That the Venetian Senat had expressly de acres plaint for creed, That they should give the Turks battell. But Auria the Spanish Admiral thinking it, giving of the as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficulty and danger, was quite of another mind, faying. That he could not but maruel, how the Venetian Senators fitting at their case in counsel. could before they knew their own strength, and power of the enemy, the nature of their country, and purpose of their foes, determine what were fit for martial men to do, vnto whose acions no certaine rule could be prescribed. All the shores (he faid) were kept with the enemies garrifons: fo that what need focuer they should have, they could neither get water or wood, or put into any harbor. Besides that, the enemy would give them battell at his own pleasure. and not at theirs: for that they were not of so much power, as to inforce him to fight. And that if the Senat, which vied to do al things warily, and with great aduisement, did but see the weakneffe of their gallies, wanting both foldiers and mariners, they would be of another mind. He C alledged further, That they were to wage war in the enemies country, where there was no port to receive their fleet, no peaceable place, no confederate city, nor King to friend: whereas the time of the yere grew every day worse and worse, when as they had neither harbor to put into, neither were able to abide the fea. And now that Nicofia was loft, for the relief whereof they were come fo far, there was no reason longer for them to flay, the enemy so frongly possessing the Island with his great army, as that there was not any hope to do any good against him: and that to keep him from victuall, and fo to diffresse him, was not possible, lying in a most fertile Island, and in the midst of his own dominions: wheras they, who were still to be relieued from far, should fooner feele the want than the enemy. He was victualled (as he faid) when he came from home, but for three months in hope to have made a (hort dispatch, & had now two thoufand miles home. He faid moreover, that he had expresse commandment from the king, to return to Messana before Winter, and that therefore so soon as the monthwas out he would depart. The Venetian Admirall desiring nothing more, than by battellat sea to overthrow the Turks, and fo to relieve the distressed Cypniots, viged the Spanish Admiral to proceed in the voyage: faying, That so great aid was not sent from the Pope and the King, only for the relief of Nicofia, but to deliuer the whole Island from the danger of the Turk. Of the same opinion with the Spanish Admirall were divers other great captains in the fleet namely Sfortia: who faid, That nothing was to be fo done, as might rashly expose to casualtie or power of the enemy, the publique fortune and majesty of the Christian commonweale, which was in that fleet greatly hazarded: That longer stay might bring futther danger: that in that fleet consisted the whole welfare of the commonweale, wherin more might be loft, if any mishap should chance thereunto, than was good to be gained by the relieuing of Famagusta. The great commanders thus diffring in opinions, the Councell was in a heat diffolued, and nothing concluded. Vpon fleet returneth which fo foule a disagreement, the fleet began now to return back again, but so, that it was not von the soule now as before, one, but three fleets, every Admitall by himself drawing after him his fleet. Au- difagreement ria the Spanish admiral, who first returned, after he had bin 2 daies wonderfully with tempest manders. toffed at sea, came at last to Carpothos, and departing thence, with much ado arrived with his fleet in the Island of Crete: from whence he by a messenger sent of purpose, requested leave of Columnius the Popes Admirall, that he might with his good will prefently returne home. Whereunto Columnius answered, That he would give him no such leave s but rather charged him, in the duty he ought to the good of the Christian Commonweale, not to depart, but to keep company with the rest of the seet untill it were past Zacynthus, that so with their united forces they might more fafely passe by the enemies countries: wheras otherwise, if any thing should by his hasty departure fall out otherwise than well, it should be imputed to the dif-

honour of him that had for faken his friends, and not of them that were fo by him for faken. G But to this Auria answered, That the welfare of the kingdomes of Sicily & Naples consisted in the fafety of this fleet:and that therfore having haft home, he could not flay to keep com. pany with their heavy galeasses & other ships of burthen, which must oftentimes be towed forward. This he openly pretended for his departure; yet secretly sought (as it was deemed) occasion wherby to withdraw himself (being as he accounted the better man at sea) from the to find an command of Columnia, whereunto he was full fore against his will subject.

After they had thus a while spent the time with reasoning the matter to and fro, Auria of himselse without surther leave hoised faile, and so at length came to Messana in Sicily:neither did Columnius and Zanius stay in those quarters long after him, but having endured much trouble at sea, arrived at last, Columnius in Italy, and Zanius at Corcyra, Thus this mighty fleet H which had all this Summer filled the Mediterranian with all the countries thereabout, with the expectation of some great matter, was by the discord of the Generals diffolued, having don nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thousands of right valiant men lost their liues, being dead of diuers diseases proceeding of change of diet, and vafeasonablenes of the weather in that hot clymat; among st whom was the valiant County His. ronimus Martinengus, fent by the Senat with three thousand soldiers for the defence of Fama. zanim the Fe. gusta, who also most of them perished in that voyage. The Venetian fleet was no sooner arrimetian Admi-vall discharged ued at Corcyra but Augustinus Barbadicus was sent from the Senat to discharge Zanius theadof bis office, and mirall of his office, and to fend him priloner to Venice: inwhose room was placed Sebastianu fent in bondito Venerius Gouernor of that Island.

The Turks Bassa's at sea certainly aduertised of the departure of the Christian sleet, were not a little proud therof; as by the confession of their enemies, their betters. Yet for a smuch as the seas began then to grow rough, and no enemy appeared, they thought it to no purpose to keep the seas with so great a fleet, and therefore resoluted to leave Mustapha with his army in Cyprus, the next yere to make an end of his conquest so haply begun; and seven gallies at sea before Famagusta, that no reliefe should that way be brought into the City, and so to depart themselves with the rest of the fleet to winter in more safer harbors: Piall with the greater part of the fleet to Constantinople, and Haly with the rest to the Rhodes. And because they would for their greater credit prepare some worthy Present for their great Lord and Master Selymus, they fraughted a great galliot of Mahumates the chiefe Baffa's, and two other tall ships, with g the richest of the spoil of Nicosia, and the choice of the prisoners there taken. But when they were ready to hoife faile & depart, as they were carrying out of the gallion, certain barrels of gunpouder which Mustapha the Generall had commanded for his better provision to belanded, a noble gentlewoman captive in the gallion, withing rather to die with honor, than to live dishonored, secretly fired the pouder; by force wherof the said gallion with the other 2 ships, were fuddenly rent in pieces, and all that was therin blown up into the aire. Of all that were in those three vessels, none escaped with life but the master of the gallion, & two Christian captiues, but perished together with the rich spoile. But the Bassa's following their former resolution, departed from Cyprus, and afterwards in fafety ariued at Constantinople: where both then and all the Winter following, such preparation was in making, as if Selymus had the next L yeare purposed some far greater matter than the conquest of Cyprus.

Whilst Schastianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admirall) yet lay at Corcyra, therude Acroceraunian people, more famous for nothing than for their theft and want of all things, by trusty messengers promised to deliuer into his power the strong castle of Chymera, keptby a garrison of 300 Turks, if he himself with a few gallies, and a convenient number of sootmen, would come into the bay of Ambracia: offring him good hostages for the better assurance of their promise. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a company of horsemen, three thousand footmen, and certaine gallies; who were no fooner landed, but that presently a thousand of those rough mountaine people came vnto them : with which power taking the hill, and repulfing the Turks garrison comming to the M The firms Ca- reliefe of the Castle, he so discouraged them that were in the Hold, that the next night they total by Pene let themselves downe with ropes into the valley below; but being descried, were there all elther taken or flain. And fo in a very short time was that strong Castle taken by the Admiralla and a strong garrison of Christians pur into it in stead of the Turks.

Not long after, Quiring the Vice Admiral a man of great courage, landed with 24 gallies Quiring 16in Peloponesus neer the Bay of Maine, and there vpon the sudden both by sea and land besie- teth a castle of neda strong castle, which the Turks but two yeres before had built to trouble the Chi stians le Turks in releasely. passing that way. Which castle he took in fine hours, and put to the sword fine hundred Turks which lay there in garrison; and razing it down to the ground, carried away with him four and twenty great pieces of Artillery into the Island of Zacynthus.

At fuch time as Mustapha before lay at the siege of Famagusta, Bragadinus gouernor of the town and Balconius a most expert Captain, from out of the high places of the city beholding the great army of the Turks (which couered the ground almost as far as they could see) with the cunning manner of their fortication, were therwith much moued : and therfore thought it good betime to give the Senat knowledge thereof, and in fo great a danger to crave their aid. And that their request might be of more weight, and have the better hearing, they intreated Hieronimus Ragazonius Bishop of the City, a reuerend and denout man, to take vpon him that charge into whom they iouned Nicholaus Donatus a noble gentleman of Cyprus. The Bishop at the first was very vnwilling to go, as loth in so great danger to leave his flock : but at length ouercome with the intreaty of the Gouernor, and tears of the befieged, suffered himselfe to be intreated: and embarked in a gally about the going downe of the Sun, loofing out of the hauen and hoifing faile, with a faire gale of wind paffed through the Tutks-fleet, which then lav at anchor before the city, and by the comming on of the night, and by the great way he made, C gothim quickly out of fight. After foure daies failing he came to Crete, and fo at last to Venice:where, as he had before vnto the Admirall, so there vnto the Senat he declared the dangerous estate of the City, the strength of the enemy, the weaknesse of the desendants against so great a multitude, and the wants of many things needful for the holding out of the fiege; and to be briefe, that except they fent speedy reliefe, the City could not be kept. Zanius at that time Admirall, carefull for the belieged, caused source all ships to be loded with all maner of victual and a great quantity of gunpouder, and put into them 1700 felect foldiers, al which he fent from Crete to the reliefe of them of Famagusta; appointing M. Antonius Quirinus with twelue of the best gallies in all the fleet, to conduct the same thither. This Quirinus was a Quirinua ve. most valiant and expert Captain, meanly descended, but by service grown to be a man both of than gentlemit. D great reputation and wealth: and therfore Zanius at his departure to Venice, although he knew the matter required half, yet prefuming upon his wisedome and carefulnesse, lest it to his diferetion, when and how to performe that piece of service. Quirinus (not without cause) doubting to fet forward, the feas as then full of the Turks gallies, staid until Winter was welfpent, and then fetting forward the seuenteenth of Ianuary, kept aloofe from the ships, which with a 1571 prosperous wind came directly before Famagusta; in hope that the Turks gallies which lav in the mouth of the hauen, might so be drawne farther into the sea, in hope of some good booty. he himselfe staying with his gallies in place convenient out of sight. Neither had the event deceived his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindered the fame: for the Turks you the dawning of the day descrying the ships, made hastily toward them: but Quirinus not able longer to flay himfelfe, and before defirous to fight with them, shewed himfelfe too foon in the Open fea, before the enemy was come neer the ships: whom as soon as the Turks had seen, and that there was no hope to withfland him, they flayd their oares, and with all speed retyred. But Quirinus following fafter upon them, they were glad for fafeguard of their lives, with all the power they could to run three of their gallies aground, and to run to shoare themselues ! which three gallies. Quirinus did with his great Ordnance beat all to pieces, and fore gauled the other foure. The hauen thus cleered, he returned again vnto the ships, and brought them with the fupply in fafety to Famagusta: vpon whose arrivall was great reioicing both among the garrison fouldiers and the Citifens: for the Turks thought nothing lesse, than that the Christian gallies durst at that time of the yeare have put into those dangerous seas: which Quirinus well knowing, came forth again with his gallies, and roaming up and downe at his pleasure, took two of the enemies ships richly laded comming to the camp, with which boots he inriched his fouldiers; and further incited by occasion, landed his men in divers places along it the fea coast in Pamphilia, and there did great harnic. So having filled the countre's with terrour and fame of his name, he returned agains to Pamagerka, where he notably Dddd 3 encouraged the garrifon fouldiers, perfuading them to remember their wonted valor; and fil. G ling them with hope that the Christian fleet would be with them in the beginning of thenext Summer, to deliuer them from their enemies, and to raife the fiege. So having in twenty daies diffeatched that he came for, and done what good feruice elfe he could, he departed from Fa. magusta, and within five daies after arrived at Crete.

Negligenco fe-nevely punified by Sclymus.

It was not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this late supply put into Famagusta, and of the harms don by Quirinus, wherwith he was so highly displeased, that he commanded thego. uernor of Chios his head to be struck off, and the Gouernour of the Rhodes to be difgraced. who fe charge it was to have kept those feas, so that nothing should have been conveied into Famagusta. Neither spared he Piall Baffa, but deprined him of his Admiralty, and placed Parsan Bassa Admirall in his stead, for that he had not the yeare before discomfitted the Christian H fleet at the Island of Crete, as it was supposed he might have done.

From the beginning of this warre, the Venetians, with Pius Quintus then Pope, who greatly fauored their cause, had most earnestly from time to time solicited Philip King of Spaine, to enter with them into the participation & fellow (hip of this war; which their request Randing indeed with the good of his state, he seemed easily to yeeld vnto: and therfore sent Auria, his Admirall the last yere, with his fleet to aid them, but with such successe as is before declared. As for to join with them in perpetual league and confederation (as it was termed) again (the common enemy, that he referred vnto the discreet consideration of the two Cardinals, Granwellaw and Pace, and Io. Zunica his Embassador, sent for that purpose to Rome: promising to performe what soeuer they should on his behalfe agree voon or consent vnto. At the same time, I and for the same purpose lay also Surianus the Venetian Embassadour at Rome: vntowhom the Pope ioined Cardinal Morone, Aldobrandinus, & Rufticucius, with certain other of the chief Cardinals, as men indifferent to both parties, to moderat and compole such differences & difficulties as should arise betwire the aforesaid Commissioners for the king and the Venetians, concerning the intended league: but these grave men, sent from so great princes about so great a matter(as well there could not be greater) were no fooner met together and fet in confulta. tion, but that forthwith they began to jar about the capitulations of the league. Necessary it was thought that a league should be agreed voon against so puissant & dangerous an enemy. but to find the way how the same might be concluded to the contentment of al parts, seemed a matter almost impossible: oftentimes these commissioners sat, but the oftner the farther off: y if one difficulty were by the difcretion of some appealed, in stead therof at the next meeting arise three others. The chiefe command of the army to be raised, the proportion of the forces, the maner of the war, with many other like circumstances incident to so great actions, made great differences among them:but most of al, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spanish-commissioners seeking to return the greatest part therof upon the Venetians, and the Venetians upon them: which was don with such earnestnesse and study of every man towards his own part, as if they had all there met for the bettering of the particular state from which they were fent, rather than for the common good. For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keep the frontiers of his large dominions in Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Corfica, Majorca, Minorca, yea and of Spain it self, with strong garrisons, for fear of the Turke; now that the war I was risen betwire the Venetians and him, and the danger thereof translated far office other mens territories; enioied now in his own an vnwonted quietneffe, to the great content of his fubie &s, and eafing of his own charge in maintaining of fo many garrifons as before wheref many were now thought needles. Besides that, he by the Indulgence of the Pope raised such great fummes of money upon his Clergy, as was thought by many fufficient to discharge the charge of the war : For which causes he cared not for entring in any further league with the Venetians, but as it were in courtesie to send them a yearely aid, to maintaine a desensue lingring war, and so to keep the Turks busied upon the Venetian, a farre off from his owne Territories. But the Venetians, in whose Dominions the fierce enemy daily raged, as well in Dalmatia as in Cyprus, were even for the same reasons mooved to hasten and shorten the war, M that the Spaniard was to protract its for beside the necrenesse of the danger, and the infinit calamities by them fustained, their yerely revenues arising for most part of their customes, were greatly impaired, and their traffick (the maintenance of their state) almost quite cut officialch caused them more earnestly to confederate themselves with the Spaniard. But hard it was

A evicyn in the, States for far differing in respect of their particular profit, and almost by nature contraty. Thus was all the last yere, and a great part of this alfo, fpent by the aforefaid Commiffioners in turbuleneand fruitleffe conferences, but nothing was as yet concluded concerning the league, which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themselves too weake for formighty an enemy as was Selyman, and yet no other certain ftrength from their friends to reft voor. But whilft they flood thus doubtful of the league with Spain; and quite out of hope of and attituement with Selymus; on the fudden when it was left expected, it was by good fortune lavd as it were in their laps, to make choice whether they would (as they had before most earneftly defired) ioyne in league with the Pope and the King of Spain, or els fall to agreement with Selymus : and that by this means.

Muhames the chiefe Balla, a fectet friend unto the Venetians, of whom he had been of long Muhames aga rime honored, had no great liking of the prosperous successe of Mustapha in Cyprus, and there was the Veneforedenifed night and day, how to crosse the rising of him, the competitor of his honor; and stan, puts the withall to help the Venetians, vnto whom he was much beholden. He by secret messengers in horse free had before oftentimes founded the mind of the Venetian Embassadour, and put him in hope. that if fuit were made vinto Selymus for peace, it would undoubtedly be granted; and further promised, to be himselse a helper and intercessor for the same. But finding the Embassador to cast many perils, and to give smal credit vnro their talke, who had before by trusting them deceined him: he did not fo give over the matter, but referring the further tempring with him vnto a more fitter time, for the present he took opportunity to enter into discourse with Selv-C mus himself concerning the Venetians, and told him that it was reported, That they weary of the long alteration they had had with the Spaniards concerning the league, & now deflicate of all hope and aid, would now haply of their own accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiving him not vnwillingly to heare so of them, he proceeded further in the matter, to know his pleasure what he would have done thering cunningly by the way of good counfell persuading him vnto that which he most wished himself to be don. Immediatly after he fecretly aduertifed M. Antonius the Venetian Embassador, That there was greathone of peace, and that therefore the Senat should under the colour of exchanging of prisoners, and redeeming of Merchants goods, send some fit man to Constantinople, with whom he would in secret confer of al such matters as might further the pacification. This vnn expected news from the Embassador brought to Venice, was well heard of the Senat: for they thought it much to concern their State, to have a way opened wherby vpon tolerable conditions to make peace with the mighty tyrant, if that the league betwixt them and the King of Spain could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one Iacobus Ragazonius to goe The Ventions Spain could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one incours ragazonius to goe an ambout the matter to Constantinople. This Regazonius was a man of great spirit and dexterity fador to saly of wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deep ividgement in the managing and so increase of with to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deep ividgement in the managing and so increase of him fello see that however therefore with him of therof and withall exceeding rich, and of fo good carriage of himselfe, as that he was therfore famous: al which things were thought of great moment to win the fauor of that couctous and barbarous nation. The Senat, although they had not yet made proof what men thought of the matter, yet doubted they not, but that upon the report of the fending this notable man, men would thereof diverfly divine, every man according to his own fantalie, and that many of the wher fort would indeed firmife, as the truth was, that he was fent for to intreat of peace, although the exchange of prisoners, and redemption of Merchants goods, were the only things were openly precended and the Senar, although they thought it not amiffe to hancit fo underflood, becapfe fuch a furbition was like enough to ftir vp both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of fuch conditions of the defired league, as they had before reieded; yet left the hope of the league" which they formany engles thought good to cherish) thereby cut off, might cause the Pope & the Spatilard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Christian beinces of the fending of Kapasmiss; yet of purpoile concealing the feeret drift of his going Melathius thioughly infuncted by the Senar, was in a gally conducted to Raguillonian the great Balls Washington, Gouemor of Liburnia) understanding military the frontiels told him; That he was fent by his father, both to meet him and fare condition hims which the injectial man, contrary to the maner of the Turks courteoutly performed honorably entertaining binn, & afterward fending him with a fafe controy till he was out of all daught. En assiste committing to Confiamtinople, was there by night feeredly received Regeronian the ued into the city, and at first brought into a little bale Inne, and a guard fer oues him that be G should speak with no man. But after three daies he was remooned to a much better place and beffedour commette to con. presented with divers kinds of dainty dishes of fundry kinds of mease. The effect of his mec. fage was to try the Turks minds, and after conference had with the Renbaffador to intrest of The conference peace. At length having accosse to the great Balla Muhamet, after he had delingted who him betwin Maba: (as he had in charge) his message concerning the exchange of prisoners and merchants goods. met the Great Muhamet asked him, If he had nothing in charge from the Senat concerning a pacification to be made ? Wherunto he answered, that he had, but that he must first speak with the Embassa dor without whose aduice and counsel he was not of himself to do any thing. At that first incounter the Bassa to terrisie the messenger, declared vnto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks horfmen and footmen, which no nation (as he vainly boafted) was able by force or policy to with stand; allo his great and inuincible fleets at sea, with whom all the power of the Christians joined together, was not able to encounter, and much other such like strength and wealth of his: and that the Venetians were now no more able to with fland Selymus than they were in times past to resist his father & his ancestors. Yet be discoursed of this master in such fort as not therby to cut off the hope of the pacification : but faid, That the Venetians (hould best have provided for the safety of their state, if at the first they had listned vnto him, friend. Iv & faithfully aduiting them not to have entred into arms, in which doing they thewed more courage than power; and that yet, as the case now stood, and that Selymon was in a most afford hope in fhort time to become lord and master of the whole Island, it should be to their great good to prefer the fauour and good will of the Turks before war, and by the voluntary veel. I ding of Cyprus, gain to themselues perpetuall peace and tranquility. As for the Isle it selfer it was not now worth the hazarding of so many dangers, being destitute of inhabitants, which were almost all either slain or fled, the cattell driven away, the townes sansackt and burnt and the whole country, of late most pleasant and beautifull, now so spoiled and unpeopled, that it could not of long time yeeld vnto him that should have it, any profit or commodity. Regazemim being a coole and aduifed man, and withall perceiving that the Baffa was not to be contraried in his talke, so tempred his answer, as that he shewed no token of seare, neither let any word fall that might offend his ears, faying, That he was right glad that he had found fo much fauor in his fight, as to have accesse and leave to talk with so great a Prince, who for wisdome and granity excelled all the rest of the Princes of the great Emperors Court, who so far as he might with his loyalty towards his foueraign, had alwaies most gratiously fauored the Vene. tian state:who also not ignorant of the vncertainty of worldly things, knew of all others best, that on both fides were both men & arms, and that most mighty Princes had oftentimes with small forces bin ouerthrowne, the euent of things neuer deceiving men more than in matters of war : no power vpon earth being fure, which could not within fome bounds contains the firength of it felf: and that therefore he was in good hope, that he fo worthy a man knowing, best what belonged both to peace and war, would devise some such course as might fort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian State and Turkish Empire , in which doing he should find sufficient matter for his eternal praise and glory, if by his discreet wildome a pacification might be made. Such talk having passed at their first meeting, Ragazanian had leque to speake. L' with the Embassador, who then lay at Pera vnder safe keeping, In passing over to Pera Assa. zonim might fee a fleet of Turkish gallies encountring one with another in manet of a fight sa fea, which the Turks had provided of purpose to thew yord him as a frange fight. And therfore doubting left Not Spain for peace, what colour focuer the Senat pretended to couer the fame. And therfore doubting left Not Spain for the Management of the M the Turkish Emperour hauting once made peace with the Venetians, should turn his great for wing test the Venetians, should turn his great for winning should ces already prepared, vpon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that make nace peace, now with all speed to hasten the league, which they had so long before delayed. For basten these tark, which purpose the Pope sent the noble Golumnius to Venice : who admitted into the Senat. Indication. declared at large how matters had passed at Rome concerning the league and afterward, what profit might arise of such a league concluded, and what harms might infue of the same, neglected. And to hasten the matter, set as it were before their eies, how much it concerned the common good, but them especially, to have the same with speed confirmed. As forto give anv trust vnto the Turks, was (as he said) not beseeming their deep wisdome and judgement feeing they fo often had bin by them rather deceived than vanquished. In conclusion, he requested them, That for his Holinesse sake, moderating in some part their hard demands, they would with speed ioin with him and the King in a most firm and Christian league. Although this freech of Columnius had much moued the minds of the Venetians, fo that many inclined to the league; yet were there many doubtfull therof, and could not be resoluted whether it were better to imbrace peace with the Turk, or the league with the Pope and the King, Peace pleased them, neither did the league displease them : it seemed a matter most difficult, whether to resolue vpon. They were searful of the league either received, or reiested: the hope of victory, the inconstancy of the Turks, their owne strength at sea, the large promises of the Christian Princes; the certain hope of the league, and uncertainty of the peace, perfuaded them to embrace the league. On the other fide, the bad fuccesse of the year before, their forces shaken, and almost spent in Cyprus, the suspected and doubtfull faith of the confederats, with the vncertainty of the successe, induced them to prefer the hoped peace before the league. So the Venetians in suspence betwixt both, gaue the Embassador daily, more doubtfull answers than other neither by promise binding themselues, neither by flat denial cutting off the hope of the league, by examples and arguments rather refelling what was by others alledged, than any way declaring what they themselves thought. Somtime they alledged such things as might make a man beleeue, that they were willing to join in league, and by and by again, they would feem neither to reject nor accept of the same. In which doubtfulnesse many daies passed. At n length the matter being propounded in the Senat; there found not valike disposition of minds that it had among the meaner fort: for some of the Senators inclined to the league; whose reafons were grounded not voon profit only, but voon eredit & honor alfo, which they wished to be chiefly regarded declaring alfo, what great fecurity, honor and glory, should redound unto them, by entring into fuch an honourable league. But the remembrance of former loffes, the firength of the Turk possessing a great part of the world, compared to their own, the terror of the enemies name, the feare of enill successe, the small hope of prenailing, induced others to like better of peace : whose opinion was also confirmed by this, That the confederation with those Christians was of no more assurance or continuance than the Turks peace; besides that, they alledged. That leagues were therfore of leffe affurance, for that confederations and amia tles were feldom or neuer fineerely. Sefaithfully kept on both fides, every man commonly fier. uing his own turn, without care of other men. They also set as it were before their eyes what great occasions euen small suspitions might give princes to break their leagues, what stanged effects the fear of the loller goods or tome part of their territory might work. After this for the Ventions weighty a master had binsthus with great contention throughly debated on both fides in the rejoint to a Senat, it was at last pure so voices sand to by confent of the greates part, the league was as more League with honorable received Bethe Turks page relected 181 a decree of the Senanto that effect made the King. A perperna B league conclu-

In the mean time the commissioners of Rome after long consultation concluded a leave which they would have to be perpetuall, as well for for invalue as defensive wars against the are Pope, the K. Turke: and was by folomic oath confirmed by the Pope, the king of Spain, and the Venerian of spaint, and Senat the 24 day of May, in the yeare 1571. For the execution of which league, it was agreed voon. That the sea and land forces should confist of two hundred gallies, an hundred ships fifty thousand footmen, and foure thousand fine hundred horsmen, with a proportionat quantity of great artillery, vi chuals, and other things necessary, to be enery yeare ready in Marchine at farthest in Aprill, to meet together at such a place in the East, as should be to them for the purpose appointed to be imploied as the Admirals saw cause, & as the present state of thinks The properties should require for maintenance of which charge it was agreed, that the king of Spain should defray the one halfe, and the other halfe to be divided into three equal parts, where f the Vawarres against netians should be are two parts, and the Pope the third, which if it should be too heavy for I the tarke: and him, then that remained by him undischarged, to be divided into five parts; where the King. relation of the was to discharge three, and the Venetians two. The charge thus proportioned, they tooke or der also for the provision of victuals, to be at a reasonable price taken up in any the confeder rats dominions, where the army or fleet should chance to stay : yet so, that it should bear the King of Spain his differetion out of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, first to take his prouision for the victualling of Guletta, Malta, and his own nauy. It was also agreed, That if the King of Spain (hould at any time, when as the confederats had no common war, inuade Algiers, Tripolis, or Tunes, that then the Venetiens should of their own charge, sid him with fife ty gallies well appointed: as alfo, that the king should in like manner and with like forces and them as oft as they should by the Turks be inuaded. But if it should fortune the Roman ter. ritory to be inuaded, that then the aforesaid Princes should be bound with all their forces, to: the remost of their power, to defend those places, and the person of the Pope. And that in man naging of the confederat war, the three admirals should confer upon all matters and whatfood uer the greater part agreed together upon, that to be reputed as agreed upon by themail: That Don Iohn of Austria, Charles the fifth his naturall son, and brother to the king, should have the chief command of the forces both at fea and land but not to display his own enfigne, but the common enfign of the confederats. Alfo, that fuch places as should be gained from the Tunk by the confederat army, should be divided among it the confederat princes, excepting Tunes; Algiers, and Tripolis, which should remain only to the King of Spaint That all continuaries arising among it the Generals should be decided by the Pope, to whom the Venetians should I lend swelve gallies; furnished of al things faving menund victuals, which the Popeshould of his own charge supply : Which gallies are he end of the war he fround again deliner, in finely cale at they then were. Whilst these things were in doing, the Venetians the more to intangle the Turke, thought The Ventian it good to make proofe, if they might by any means ftir vp Tamas the Persian king to take vp the more to tradic the armes against him: who as he was a Prince of great power, so did he exceedingly hate the Turke, firtus Turks, as well for the difference betwixt the Persians and them about matters of their vain supersistion, as for the manifold injuries he had oftentimes sustained. There was one Vincent to take type min Alexander, one of the Secretaries for the state; who having escaped out of prison at Constanti. egainst him. noole, was but a little before come to Venice, a wary wife man, and of great experience, who for his dexterity of wit; and skilfulnesse in the Turkish language, was thought of all others most fit to take in hand so great a matter. He having received letters and instructions for the Senat, and furnished with all things necessary, trauelling through Germany, Polonia, and the forrests of Mæsia, in Turkish attire, came to Moncastron, a port towne vpon the side of the Euxine or blacke sea, at the mouth of the great river Boristhenes : where he embarked him-felse for Trapezond, but was by a contrary wind driven to Sinope, a City of great traffique from whence he trauelled by rough and broken waies to Cutay, keeping still upon the left hand, because he would not fall upon any part of the Turks army (which was then marching towards Cyprus through all those countries) neuerthelesse he fell vpon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himfelf being taken for a Turke, and by blind & troublesome waies, through rocks and forrests, arrived at length at Erzirum, a strong city of the Turks, then vpon the frontiers of the Turks dominions toward the Georgians. This iourney of Alexanders was not kept so secret, but that it was vented at Constantinople by a spie, who under the color C. of friend ship, haunting the Venetian Embassadors house at Pera, had got certain knowledge of the going of Alexander into Persia. Wherupon certain courrors were sent out with al foeed to be set the three streit passages into Persia, wherby it was supposed he must of necessity passe with certain notes also of the fauour of the man, of his slature, and other marks, wherby he was best to be knowne. But he in so dangerous a countrey doubting all things, and fearing such a matter, leaving his company behind him, with incredible celerity posted from Erzirum to Tauris, and was a great way gone before the Turks currors came into those quarters : who yet hearing of him, followed after as far as they durst, but could not ouertake him. Alexander comming to Tauris, understood that the Court lay at Casbin, about twelve daies journey farther vp into the country; comming thither, the fourteenth of August of this yeare 1571, he chan-D ced to meet with certaine English Merchants, with whom he had before bin acquainted : by whose help he not only got to speake with Ayder Tamas the Kings third sonne, but learned of them also the manners and fashions of the Persian Court, and how to beare himselfe therein. The Persians by reason of the intollerable heat, do most of their businesse at that time of the yeare by night. Wherfore Alexander about midnight brought into Aider, declared vnto him Alexander ibe the cause of his comming; and the next night admitted vnto the speech of his aged father, de- balladour bath livered his letters of credence, and in the name of the Senat declared voto him, with what per-audience with fidious dealing Selymus the Turkish Emperour was about to take away Cyptus from the Ve-the Perfit king. netians, with what greedinesse and pride he had set upon the Christians, and that discharged of that war, he would of all likelyhood fet vpon the Persians, having the selfesame quarrel vnto the Persians that he had vnto the Venetians, that is, an ardent and insatiable desire of source raignty : a sufficient cause for the greedy Turke to repute cuery King the richer that he was. the more his enemy. After that, setting forth to the full the prowesse of the Christians, the wonderfull preparation they had made both at sea and land, he persuaded the King with all his power to inuade the Turke, now altogether busied in the wars of Cyprus, and to recouer again such parts of his Kingdome as Solyman the father of Selymus had taken from him. Wars he faid were more happily managed abroad than at home : that fince he alone (the Christian Princes all then at quiet) had with flood the Turks whole force and power, he needed not now to doubt of his most prosperous successe, the Christian Princes now toyning with him. That he was much vnmindfull of his former loffes and wrongs, if he thought he enjoyed an affu-F red peace; which he should find to be nothing else but a descring of war vnto more cruell times; and that the Turke if he should ouerrun Cyprus, would forthwith turne his victorious armes upon him: The end of one warre was (as he faid) but the beginning of another; and that the Turkish Empire could neuer stay in one state : and that he should observe not the Turks words, but his deeds, and how that the Otheran Emperous according to the opportunity of the times, vied by turnes, somtime force, somtime deceit, as best served their purpo- G fes: That no Princes had at all times by diffembled peace & vncerfain, leagues more deluded fome, vntill they had oppressed others, He wished also, that at length this his cunning dealing might appear to the world and that Princes would think, that being combined together, they might more easily ouercome the Turk, than being separated, defend their own: That in former times, fometime will, fometime occasion, was wanting to them to vnite their forcestand that therfore they should combine themselves for their common good against the common enemy : That it concerned no lesse the Persians than the Christians, to have the power of the Turk abated: and that this taking up of arms; should be for the good of the Persian king how. focuer things should sall out; if well, he should then recouer what he had before lost, with much more that was the Turks: if otherwise, yet by voluntary entring into armes to counted the nance himself, and to give the Turk occasion to think that he feared him not : which was (as he faid) the only way to preserve their common safety, which would be vnto at the confederar Princes casie enough, if they themselves made it not more difficult than the power of the enemy. The speech of the Embassador was willingly heard: wherunto the king answered, That he would confider thereupon what he had to do; and in the mean while, a faire house was appointed for the Embassador and his followers, and bountifull allowance of the Kings charge. He was also many times sumptuously feasted by the noblemen, whom he stil requested to be mea diatours to the King, to take that honorable war in hand. The King had at that time a fon called I finde, a man of great spirit, whom he kept in durance, for that he with too much insolence made roads into the frontiers of the Turks dominions to the diffurbance of the league his fa. I ther had before made with the late Turkish Emperor Solyman: unto him Alexander having ac. ceffe, was of him courteoully heard, who fretting and languishing for very griefe of revenge vpon the Turks, wished, that either the king his father had his mind, or he himselfe the power of a king; and faid, That if euer it were his good fortune to obtain the kingdome, he would indeed thew what he then in mind thought. But of him more that be faid hereafter. Whill this matter went more flowly forward in the Persian Court than the Embassador would have had it, news was brought to the Court, of the great victory which the Christians had much about that time obtained of the Turks at seawpon which occasion the Embassador solicited Tamas more earneftly than before, to make himselfe partaker of the victory of the Christians, by entring into confederation with them, and by taking up of arms, rather than to hold vicertaine w friend (hip with the Turks in their miferies, by whom he had bin fo often wronged. This he faid was the only time for the Persian king to recouer his former glory, the like offer whereof would neither often chance, neither long itay: and that if he suffered so fit an opportunity to flip away, he should afterwards in vain wish for the same, when it were too late. This so wholfome counsell was well heard, but prevailed nothing to stir vp the aged King; who then troubled with rebellion in Media, or weary of the former wars he had had with the Turk, and glad of fuch peace as he had then with him answered the embassador, That for a smuch as the Chris stian Princes had made a perpetual! league amongst themselves, he would for a yeres expect the event, and afterward as occasion served, so to resolve vpon peace & war. This improvident refolution of the King, brought afterward unprofitable and too late repentance to the whole L Persian kingdom; when as within a few yeres after, all the calamities which the Senat had by their embassadors (as true prophets) foretold, redounded to the great shaking therof. For the Cyprian war once ended, and peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the son of Selymus, succeeding his father in the Turkish Empire, inuading the Persian King, tooke from him the great countrey of Media, now called Siluan, with a great part of Armenia the Great, and the regal city of Tauris, as shal be hereaster in due place declared. At which time the Persian, who now refused to take vp arms, or ioyne in league with the Christian Princes, repented that he had not before hearkned to the wholfom counfell of the Venetians; and taught by his own harms, wished in vain, that the Christian princes would again take vp'arms and ioine with him against the Turke.

MuRapha Baf-

Mustapha the great Bassa and General of the Turks army, surnished of all things that could fa viturate to be defired for maintenance of his fiege; and fouldiers in great number dayly repairing vato him out of Cilicia, Syria, the lesser Asia, and the Countries thereabout, beside great supplies brought vnto him by Haly Bassa from Constantinople', insomuch, that it was thought he had in his army two hundred thousand men: began now that Winter was past, in the later end of Aprill, to draw neerer vnto Famagusta, and with incredible labour to cast vo trenches & mounts against the City, of such height, that the defendants from the highest places of the city could scarcely see the points of the Turks spears, or tops of their tents, as they lay incamped : which was no great matter for the Bassa to perform, having in his camp forty thousand pioners alwaies ready at his command.

The City of Famagusta is scituat in the East end of the Island, in a plain and low ground The description betwirt two promontories, the one called S. Andrews head, and the other the head of Gracia, of Famaguage. It is in circuit two miles, and in form foure square; but that the fide toward the East, longer and more winding than the rest, doth much deform the exact figure of a quadrantiit is almost n on two parts beaten vpon with the sea, the other parts toward the land are desended with a ditch not aboue fifteen foot broad, a stone wall, and certain bulwarks and parapets. Vpon the gate that leadeth to Amathus standeth a fix cornered tower: other towers stand out also in the wall, every one of them scarce able to contain six pieces of Artillery. It hath a haven opening toward the Southeast, defended from the iniury of the weather by two great rocks, betwixtwhich the fea commeth in by a narow passage about forty paces ouer, but after opening wider giueth a conuenient harbor to ships, whereof it cannot contain any great number, and was now thut up with a strong chain. Neer vnto the hauen standeth an old Castle with source towers, after the antient manner of building. There was in the city one strong bulwark, built after the maner of the fortification of our time, with palisadoes, curtains, casements, and such C like, in such manner, as that it seemed almost impregnable. All which, although they made shew of a strong and well fortified city, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought tooweak long to hold our against the great power of the Turk: but what wanted by reason of the scituation and weak fortification, that the Gouernour and other noble captains supplied in best fort they might, with a strong garrison of most valiant souldiers, the surest defence of firing places. There was in the city two thousand and fine hundred Italians, two hundred Al- The number of

Multapha with wonderfull celerity having brought to perfection his fortifications, planted n his battery of 64 great pieces; amongst which were foure great Basilisks of exceeding bignes, wherewith he continually without intermission battered the wals of the City in five places, but especially that part of the wall that was between the hauen and the gate that leadeth to Amathus. And with great morter pieces cast up huge stones, which from high falling into the City, with their weight brake downe the houses they light vpon, and fell oftentimes through their vaults, euen to the bottome of their cellars, to the great terror of the befieged. The wals Fanagulla afin divers places fore shaken, and the houses beaten down, he began to affault the city: which faulted and no the defendants (their forces yet whole) valiantly repulsed, and not only desended their wals by the chiffsand draue the Turks from the breaches, but furioufly fallied out vpon them, and having flaine and and wounded many wonderfully disturbed their fortifications, & abated their courage : neither did the enemy with greater fury, maintain the battery or affault, than did the Christians the defence of the city, still sending their deadly shot into the thickest of that great multitude; insomuch that in few daies the Bassa had lost 30000 of his men: and the captains themfelues wondring at the valor of the defendants, as if they had not now to do with fuch Chrifrians as they had before fo oftentimes ouer thrown, but with some other strange people, began to despair of the winning of the city. The Turks thus doubting, & almost at a stand, the Christians in the mean time made up their breaches with earth, baskets, wool facks, and such like, not sparing their very beds, and bed-cloths, chests, carpets, &what soeuer els might serue to fil vp the breach. Among many wants they feared, the greatest was the want of pouder which with continuall shooting began greatly to diminish: wherefore to referue some part therof against al extremities, they thought it best whilst yet some store was lest, to vie the same shore sparingly, and to shoot more seldome. But the Turks still drawing neerer and neerer the city, & casting vp mounts higher than the wals of the city, with earth & faggots filled vp the ditch: Famiguita as which dong they of the broken flones made wals on either fide, to faue themselves from the gan whatled flankring those of the Christians then giving a fresh assault they went any only their fide and by the Targe. flankring thot of the Christians; then giving a fresh assault, they vied not only their stot and

G Which manner of fight (as if it had been so agreed upon) they cuery day maintained for the foace of fix houres. And although the Turks by season of their multitude were divided into many parts, and fresh men still succeeded them that were weary; yet such was the course of the defendants, that every man requested to have the places of most danger, and from theme with couragious hand repulsed the Turks with exceeding great slaughter. But for all that the furious enemy maintaining the affault, not only by day, but by often alarms in the night alfo. kept the Christians continually in doubtfull suspence and readinesse, as if they should have received a present assault : and as soon as it was day, with fresh men that had slept their sleep. desperative assailed the Christians almost spent and megre for lack of sleep and reft. Bragadinus the Gouernour, more careful of the common fafety than of his own danger.ceafed not still to be going about from one place to another; telling the Italians, That now was given the fittest occasion they could defire, for them to shew their valor in, and to gaine great honour of their barbarous enemies: that it would be to their eternall glory, if by their onely means without any other help, the city fo far off from the roliefe of the Christians might be defended, and the great power of the Turks defeated: this (he faid) was the only time wherein it flood them most upon to play the ment for if they could keep that little was left, therest of the Isle would be easily recovered: and although the Turks army exceeded far in number, yet did they excell them in proweffe and valour; whereby a few, and as it were but an handfull of men, had oftentimes prevailed against most infinit multitudes: now all the eies of the world, K as well friends as foes to be fixed vpon them, so that if they held out against so great a power, both their enemies would admire their valour, and all Christendome extoll their inuincible courage and prowesse, and that they themselves should therby reap both great profit and honour: neither that any thing could be alledged, why they should not be compared with the worthy knights of Malta, who to their eternall fame deliuered themselues out of the mouth of the Turke, and left to the world a most faire example for men valiantly to stand in so good a quarrell vpon their own defence: Nicosia (he said) was lost rather by the cowardise of the defendants, than by the valour of the enemy. He also praised the sidelitie and courage of the Græcians, who for any feare or danger could never be removed from the Venetians, or induced to submit themselves vnto the Turks government; and persuaded them, with the same re- L folution to defend their owne city, that they faw in the Venetian foldiers, fighting for them, and for their own honour to striue with the Italians, in defence of their State, their countrey, their wives, and children, against the tyrannie of the Turks; forasmuch as aid would in short time come, and set them free from all danger. The Senatalso in like maner had sent letters to Famagusta, willing them to be of good cheere, and yet a while to hold out the siege, and that they should be in short time relicued. Baleoniss also Generall of the garrison souldiers, himfelfe in armes was prefent at enery skirmish, carefully forefeeing what was in enery place and at all times to bee done; and by encouraging of his fouldiers, and adventuring of his perfor, shewed himselse to be both a worthy commander and avaliant soldier. Neither did the soldiers alone, but even the women alfowhat they might, striuing above the power of the strength M borh of the minds and bodies; some bringing meat, some weapons vnto the defendants, and o thers, flones, beds, chefts, and fuch like fluffe to make vo the breaches. Thus whilst open force prevailed not according to the Turks defire, they began in foure The Turks feek places to vndermine the City, in hope to have found entrance: but the defendants doubting the undermine fuch a matter, by diligent liftning, and great vessels set full of water neer unto the wals, and drums laid vpon the ground, by the mouing thereof discouered their works, and with countermines frustrated those of the enemy : yet in sogreat a stir and hurly-burly all things were not possibly to be discouered; wherby it came to passe, that whilst the defendants were altogether busied in defending the wals, a mine not perceived was suddenly blowne up neer to the tower standing upon the hauen, by force wherof a great part of the wall thereabout was in a moment with a most horrible noise ouerthrown. With the fall therof the Turks thinking the City as good as taken, with an horrible (hout and outery mounted the wall, and in the breach fer vp B their enfigns, County Peter, who had the charge of that part of the wall, being not now able to defend the fame, fo fuddenly ouerthrown: which Neftor Martinengus quickly perceiving, came foeedily from his own station, to repulse the enemy now ready to have entred. The fight be- The briefred to came there most fierce and terrible, on the one side hope, on the other side desperation, inraged their minds: the Turks were in hope, that if they forced themselves but a little they should forthwith win the city; and the defendants propounding nothing vnto themselues but shamefull death and torture, fought as men altogether desperat. The Turks trusted to their multitude, and the Christians to their valor. In the mean time, Andreas Bragadinus with certain great pieces aptly placed, out of the castle slew a number of the Turks as they were comming to the breach. Baleonius hearing of the danger came in hast with a company of couragious foldiers, C to relicue them that were fighting at the breach, and cheering up his followers, thrust himself with the formost into the face of the breach, and there not only appointed what was to be donand with cheerfull countenance encouraged his foldiers, but with his own hand, having flain many, took one of the Turks enfigns, when as he had before flain the bearer thereof, and tumbled him headlong into the ditch. With the fight therof others incouraged, both on the right hand and on the left, made there a notable battell, as men fighting for their last hope. In fine the Turks were glad to retire, leaving behind them foure thousand carkafes of their slain fellows in the town ditch, with fourteen of their enfigns which were brought into the city. Neither was this victory gained without some losse of the Christians; about a hundred were slain, among whom were Robertus Maluetius, David Nocius, Celsus Feto, Erasmus Firme, all Captaines.

For all this, they in the city, took small rest, the Turks great shot still thundring in among st them; & that in fuch furious fort, as that in one day (which was the eighth of June) were numbred about five thousand great shot, shot into the city. With which continual battery, one of the round bulwarks of the towne was so shaken, as that a part of the front therof was fallen downe into the ditch, and another part flood leaning ready to fall, in such fort as that it was not longer to be defended: which the Christians perceiving, presently undermined the same bulwark, and in the mine placed certain barrels of gunpouder. The Turks comming to affault the place they had so fore battered, the defendans after some small resistance seigned themfelues to retire for feare, so to draw the enemy the faster on; who was no sooner come to the place defired, but that fire being put to the mine, blew up the bulwark with al them that flood They of Fame. thereon; of whom some were our whelmed with the earth it selfe, other some were blowne gulla blow up vp in the aire, and falling downe again, miferably perished; and other some shot (as it were) own battered out of a gun, fell down a great way off, and fo were rent in pieces: which was vnto the defen. balward; which was vnto th dants a most pleasant sight. The Turks inflamed with their loffes, were more inraged with the speeches and persuasions of Mustapha their general, who most carnestly exhorted them, with one consent to assaile their enemies, now driven into a corner of the Island, spoiled of al their country, trusting more vnto the strength of the place, than of themselves, intreating for nothing more, than with their liues to depart thence. ntes of the cowardife of the Christians, and the prowesse of the Turks? This day (faid he) wil G confirm your former labors & victories, which you before vndertook for honor, but here shall you have honor mixt with gold, and prey sufficient to make you all rich. The Turks incouraged with this speech of their General, as men forgetfull of all dangers, began a more terrible fiege than before, and having with incredible labor made three great mines, and firing them, ouerthrew a great part of the castle wall, the notable defence of the hauen. Which don, they with all their force oftentimes affailed the city, as if it should have bin their last labour, their ther ceased they so to do night or day. At which time also that part of the city which is beaten upon with the fea, was affaulted by them in the gallies also.

The poor Christians spent with deadly wounds, continual labor, perpetual watching both night and day, and now brought to small number, hardly withstood the surious enemy, assay. ling them in fo many places at once, and held out that tempest rather with courage than firength. In the mean while the enemies army increased daily, the Turks in hope of the like fpoil they had at Nicofia continually repairing out of the countries therabout, to the camp, The Christian captains seeing their men with continual assaults fore spent (insomuch that how many focuer they feemed to be, there was not aboue 300 found men left) but 7 barrels of pouder remaining, want of al things daily increasing, and hope of aid decreasing, & the Venetians, their only comfort, so far from them; the captains (I say) themselves began to quaile in courage: and the rather, for that the relief fent from Venice could not possibly be brought them, but staid at Crete; the Turks gallies stillying before Famagusta, so that nothing could in safety be brought thither. This fear of the Captains could not long be hid or diffembled. but that it was of the Citisens perceived who having neither power to hold out the siege, neither place left to fly vnto, ouercome with necessity, came flocking to the Gouernous, crauing of him aid and comfort; and with aboundance of tears befought him, in this Common desperation to take compassion of them, their wives, and children, a people that had always so wel deserued of the Venetian State. Their Walls (they faid) were beaten down, their Bulwarks ouerthrown, the foldiers that remained spent with wounds, watching, and famin; the Enemies strength increasing daily; so that they must needs in short time all perish with the fword, if the city were by force taken. Wherfore they befought him, that yeelding to necesfity, which no power was ever able to withfrand, he would at last whilst time yet served, prouide for the fafety of so faithfull and kind a people, and not to refuse any conditions, how hard K

The requests and tears of the Citisens of Famagusta, with the due consideration of the distressed state of the City, mooned Bragadinus to compassion; who comforting them up in best fort he could, persuaded them to be of good cheer, for that he had care both of them and their state, and would so prouide for them, as that they should never repent themselves of their fidelity and loialty toward the Venetian State. Hee in the mean time confidering the greatnesse of the danger which presently hung overall their heads, propounded the matter in a general councel called together for the same purpose; where after a little debating the matter, they all agreed to yeeld: only Baleonius at the first diffenting, as doubtful of the Turkes faith; but afterwards yeelding unto the opinion of the reft. So an herauld being sent unto the p Baffa, a truce was taken for certain daies to parle in, and hostages given on both sides, during which time not so much as a dart was thrown, or an arrow shot from either side. After a few They of Fama. daies parly the conditions were agreed upon, wherupon the City should be yeelded into the power of the Baffa, which were these: First, That the inhabitants in the city yet aliue, should in safety injoy their lites, liberty, and goods, with the free exercise of the Christian religion. That the Gouernour with the rest of the Captains and souldiers might in safety depart with bag and baggage; and at their departure to take with them five great pieces of ordnance and three horses, which soeuer it should please them to make choice of & that the Turks should fafely conduct them into Crete, finding them both victuall and shipping. All which things were with more kindnes promised, thanwith fidelity performed ; yet all these matters agreed M vpon and conceived into writing, as also by solemn oath on both sides confirmed; the governor sending a messenger before, requested that he might have leave to see the Bassa, and to deliver vnto him the keyes of the city. Leave being granted, Bragadinus the Governor, Balconius, Andreas Bragadinus, Laurentius Thenpolus Earle of Paphos, Io, Antonius Quirinus, Aloisius MarA tinengue with a great fort of other Captains came into the Campibut before they entred into the Basia's paullion, they were commanded to deliuer their weapons, which they all did. At the first meeting Mustapha entertained them curteously, and with many glorious words, as if it had bin in admiration, extolled their worthy valour and courage; faying, That he was alad now to know them by face, whose valiant minds he had before known by their most valiant deeds. Now prowesse and valor seemed not only in safety, but also honoured of the Enemy: when after a long discourse, the false Bassa revolved vnto the mischief and trechery he had before refolued vpons complaining, that certain of his men taken at the fiege, had bin afterward against all reason and order slain. Which the gouernor and the rest veterly denying thee start vo as in a rage, and with high words and stern countenance vrging the fact, commanded them The treader up as in a rage, and with high words and feeling of them out of his paulition, in the fight of the Baffa breakith all to be forthwith cast in bonds; and so bringing them out of his paulition, in the fight of the hu faith, and Army, contrary to his oath and promise caused them all to be slain. At which time Bragadi- cruelly mallanus and Theupolus were oft times commanded to lay down their heads to have had them ftruck eres Braggadioff: yet was their execution deferred, and their lines referred, not to faue them, but with others. more exquisit punishment and torture to satisfie the barbarous cruelty of the faithlesse and unmercifull Tyrans. The next day after, Bragadinus having his ears before cut off in despight, was brought forth to be wondred at , and tortured with the most extremest kind of torture that Tyrannie it felf could have denifed: for dispoiled of his jewels and attyre, and a basket laid upon his shoulders filled with earth, he was inforced oftentimes to carry the same, to repair the rampiers that were ouerthrown; and cuer as he passed by, the proud Bassa insulting C voon him, to fall down and kiffe the ground at his feet : and fo buffeted with the Turkes fifts, and sourned as a dog with their feet, was in great derision and despight asked, whether he hoped that Christ his God would come to helpe him or no? Which indignity of it self bitter and miserable, the dignity of the man made much more miserable whose comly and stately countenance, with his long and reuerend beard, euen in that extremity added vnto him a certain majesty and grace. In this so soul a sight of vertue troden under foot, the poor Christians could neither wel stay their tears, nor let them fall for fear of the Turks displeasure. But the forfworn Baffa, not only forgetfull of all humanity, but inraged rather with extream cruelty, caused that noble and worthy Bragadinus to be set in a chair, and his skin flain off from him quick: a punishment vnworthy of him that suffered it, but most worthy him that inflicted the same, Yet in so great & horrible a torture he was not heard to let fall any word not beseeming a faithfull Christian, and the honor of his country; only he called upon God for mercy, and detelled the Turks perfidious trechery, and so breathed out his life. But the Tyrant, worthy of eternall infamy, not fatisfied with the torture of the living man, caused the head to be cut off from the dead body, and vpon the point of a spear to be set vp on a high place for all men to look voon. His skin also stuffed with chaffe he caused to be hanged vo at the yards arm, and fo to be caried about; not fo true a trophy of his victory, as a testimony of his perfidence tyrannie. Two daies after County Theapolus, after he had bin most shamefully intreated, ful of the marks of the Turks cruelty, was (to make an end withall) (hamefully hanged in the market place. With what cruelty the Baffa had tyrannifed vpon the Nobility, with the fame he E alforaged vpon the meaner fort of citifens, of whom some he slew, some he chained in the galies, and carled away the rest into bondage: 300 Christians, some soldiers, some citisens, that came forth with the governor to see the Turks camp, were there also slain. Nester Martinengus a famous captain escaped the tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Bassa's Eunuchs, who by the help of a Greek fisherman got to Leptis, and from thence to Crete, and so afterwards to Venice; where he faithfully reported to Aloysius Mosenicus the Duke, the whole proces of that War, with the loffe of that City and that in the space of threescore and ten daies there was about a hundred and forty thousand great shot discharged against the city. Such Moblemen and gentlemen as escaped out of this so general a slaughter, banished their Country, and in misery, dispersed without hope of return, led afterward a miserable and vagrant lise, though F some of them euen at this day (as I have bin credibly informed) are by the Venetian State right wel maintained. The country people and artificers were generally by the Turks spared, for the peopling of the Country. This was the fatal ruin of Cyprus, one of the most fruitfull Cyprus 108.

Whilft Mustapha yet lay at the siege of Famagusta, the other two Basse's, Partan and Haly (the one the Admiral, and the other General of the foldiers appointed by Selymon for the keeping of the sea, that no relief should be sent by the Venetians to Famagusta: and surcher, as occasion served to infest their dominions) about the midst of May arrived in Euboea, with 230 gallies: whither Vluzales Viceroy of Algiers, with divers other the Turks notable pyrats reforted vnto them with their gallies. With this fleet departing from Eubœa, and failing a. longst the coast of Mysia, Ionia, Caria, and so directly toward the Rhodes, they were met with 30 gallies of the Turks adventurers. After that, having left certain gallies to lie before Fa-The Turk with maguita, they directed their course for the Island of Crete, and the thirteenth of June put in. H

The Island of Crete, now called Candia, is greater than Cyprus, but lesser than Sicilia or Sardinia: but for fertilitie comparable with any of the Islands of the Mediterranian. It was in antient time famous for many things, but especially for a hundred cities which stood therin, as witnesseth among ft others, Seneca, Vrbibus centum fectofa Creta: but at this time it hath only three, Candia a Colony of the Venetians, wherof the Isle now taketh name; Canes, and Rhetimo. The circuit of the Island is five hundred and twenty miles, ful of hills; for which cause people of the Country are much delighted in hunting, in it is no nauigable river or venimous creature. It is now most famous thorow a great part of the World, for the good Malmsey which there groweth, and is from thence in great aboundance sent into many far countries. Therin grows also great plenty of Cypres trees, seruing for shipping. It is at this day subject to the Venetians. The Turks being landed, and ranging vp and down the Country, did what harm they possibly could, burning and spoiling all as they went; vntil that at last they were vpon the sudden incountred by Franciscus Iustinianas, who but a little before their landing was come into the Island with a thousand souldiers, and now joining with the Island people, notably charged them, being altogether dispersed and seeking after prey, and having flain many of them, inforced the rest to retyre to their Gallies. The next day the Turks landing again in great number, burnt divers towns, and ramfacked Setia and Rhetimo, where they took a rich prey, and caried away many prisoners. But loded with their booty, dispersed, and fearing nothing leffe than to be at that time fet voon, they were affailed by Lucas Michael a K valiant Captain, two thousand of them slain, and with the losse of their booty and prisoners The Turks dri- glad to retyre vnto their Gallies. Departing thence, and failing along ft the coaft of Epirus, they came to Suppolo an hauen town in Epirus, which Venerius in the beginning of these wars had taken from the Turks, but was now again by them recouered. After that, they came to Dulcigno, which the Turks had but a little before besieged by land, for that the Gouernor therof and of Antivari (another town of the Venetians vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia) had compacted with three hundred [Epirots to stir vp the country into rebellion, and to revolt to the Venetians. For the effecting wherof the Epirots requested of the Venetians six thousand foldiers to make head, which the Venetians promifed to fend them. Wherupon the aforefaid Epirots forthwith took Arms, and raised most part of Epirus into rebellionivato whom was sent at the first a captain with a hundred Italians from Catora. But when the Epirots vainly expecting the promised aid, saw themselves on every side hardly beset with their enemies, dispairing of any good succes, they yeelded themselves to the mercy of Achmetes Bassa, Selymus his great Lieutenant in Grecia, (who to represse that so dangerous a rebellion was come thither with an Army of sourceore Africacefor thousand Turks.) So was a most fair occasion lost, when as the rest of the Epirots, inflamed with the hope of liberty, were ready to have come vnto their friends already in Arms, and by M their example like enough to have raised all Grecia into rebellion. But now deceived of their expectation, they bewailed their mifery, and trufting to the promise of the Venetians, they had cast themselves and al theirs into most manifest danger. They of Dulcigno seeing them felues hardly befet both by fea and land, fent to Partau Baffa, and covenanting with him, That

Which his beastly cowardife the Senat suffered not unpunished, but confiscating his goods, and remooning him cowardife sufrom the Senat cast him into exile. From Antivari, the Turks following their good fortune, wified. departed with their fleet into the Bay called Rizonicus, but now the Bay of Catharo. and both by fea and land layd hard fiege vnto the strong Town of Catharo, called invantient time Ascrivium : against which they cast up two great bulwarks, and planted theron nine great pieces of Artillery, wherwith to have battered the Town and Castle. Whilft these things were in doing, Pluzales and Caraco Za, both men of great account and name among the Turks, got leave for ten days of the Admiral, with 80 Galifes to fooile the Islands neer therabouts subject vnto the Venetians. Which Anthonius Contaronus the goner-C norther of perceiving, in the dead time of the night fled for fear out of the town, into the rocks and places of more fafety, after whom the townsmen followed also: so that in the town were not left aboue 20 men, and about 80 women , who with weapons in their hands, after the roft Curela forfawere fled, came to the walls, as withing rather there to die, than to fall into the hands of the in defended by barbarous enemy. At such time as this great fleet (the terror of that part of Christendom) first put into the Adriatique, Penerins the Venetian Admiral then lying with fifty gallies at Coreyrs, and fearing if he should longer stay there, to be inforced with so small a power to sight against so frong an enemy, orels fo to be thut vp., that he could not joyn his forces with the Spanish fleet, which was daily expected; vpon the comming of the fleet departed thence to Meffans, H there more commodiously and more safely to attend the comming of Den Jelm of Austriage. The forces of neral of the Spanish forces. At his comming Columnian met him with 1.2 gallies (which the great Duke of Florence had fent in the aid of the Confederats) and three gallies of Malta. who only were yet come thither, and with great honor received him. Not long after, M. An. tonim Quirinm and Antonim Canalis came thither alfowith 62 gallies, before appointed by the Venetians for the relief of Famagusta, but now called back again to join with the rest of the fleet : and in short time the gallies of Sicily arrived there also. At last after long expectation in the later end of August came Don Iohn with his Spanish fleet; aman then about 24 yeares old, in whom wanted no honorable parts, his mothers blemith only excepted: who although he was most dear unto his father Charles the fift, yet left he him nothing by his Wil, but only commended him to his fon Philip as his brother. The Venetian and the Popea Admirals heazing of his comming, went to meet him, and that with such triumph and joy, that all the former beauines before conceined of his long staying, was turned into gladnes; with most affured hope of triumphant victory; their doubled forces, and two great fleets joined in one; encouraged them about measure, filling all the West with expectation of some great matter. The Venetian fleet confifted of 108 gallies, fix galliaffes, two tall flips, and a great number of small galliots. Vnto them were joined $2 gallies of the Popes of whom Gelianniu was admiral, And with Don Iohn the General, and Auria the Spanish Admiral, came 81 Gallies, of whom three were from the Knights of Malta. In this fleet, befide mariners, were reckoned to be twenty thousand men, an, Army notionly beautiful for thew (as confishing of most choice K bodies) but indeed ftrong and puissant old beaten souldiers almost throughout it, inenery place intermixed with others of leffe skil : many known to be men of great experience, tich and lufty bodies; were by name called forth to this fo honorable feruice; and divers others of greet nobility, as well old men, as yong and lufty gallants, for the naturall batted they bate against the Common Enemy, came, and as voluntary men cheerfully thrust themselves into that religious War, enery of which Noblemen as they were greater by birth or power, so had they drawn after them a greater number of their fauorits and followers, frong and able bodies of their own charge brauely armed, who fought for no other pay for their pains and danger bur by some notable victory to eternise their names, or honourably to spend their lines in so iust a quarrel, as for the defence of the Christian faith and Religion. Among these most ho- I notable and refolute men were three of greatest mark, Alexander Farnesim Prince of Parma, in time to be the honor and glory of Italy, his native country; whose votimely death in the low Councries even his honorable enemies lamented; and being dead, is not without cause; and worthy defers accounted among the most politique and famous leaders of our age. The secondwas Francishe Maria prince of Vibin, a yong manhonorably descended and of an innincible courage. And the third P. Isrdam Vrfinm, an honorable gentleman of the family of the Primi in Romalaista standing sported through

All the power of the confederat princes thus met together at Messana, and al things now in readinesse, a Councel was called by the General, to resolve what course to take in those most dangerous wars; against so puissan enemywato which Councel were admitted onely Den M Isom the General hithfelf, and Alolium Reches grees, of some called Requeserim; great Commendor of Castile, the Generals lieutenent; or rather director of his actions a Sebastianum Francium the Venetian Admiral, and Augustinus Barhadidus General proueditor, of equal authority and repuration with the Admiral sand one Secretary. Maron Antonim Columnia the Popes addiA ral, with Pomperus Colenna his kinfman. The chief point wheron these great Commaunders were to resolve, was, Whether they should adventure the general fortune of a battel against so Arong an enemy or only feek to defend the frontiers of their own dominions. Which queftion (as all others of like fort) was of divers diverfly fanfied, every man pleafing himfelfe with his own reasons. Requisering, Don John his chief Counsellor (without whom he willingly did norhing and vindoubtedly a man of great valour and experience) speaking first, faid, That the Enemies ftrength was necessarily to be known, before they committed all to the fortune of a battel; and that therfore delay was to be vied, left improvident hast overthrew all. Matters of War that were to be decided by the fword, were (as he faid) with great and found aduice to be administred, for that the errors of battel, wherby all was to be put in hasard, were not again B to be amended. He highly commended Scipio Africanus, who counselled great Commanders not to fight with the enemy but vpon some great advantage, or els therunto forced by necesfity. But as things now stood, what opportunitie could be ministred or advantage taken, the enemy keeping himself close within the bay of Corinth, and no apparant means how to draw him out from thence. Neither that he for his part was of fo great spirit, as within the harbor in place of disaduantage, without hope, to set upon an enemy in common estimation stronger than himself. For what dishonor should they incur, if having received some notable losse, they should be inforced with shame to give over the enterprise begun? And to besiege Orichus, Dirrachium, or Castrum Novum, frontier Towns of the Turks, so to draw them out to battel; what were this more, than to shew a certain fear & distrust in themselves, and to dis-C courage the minds of the fouldiers ? For as well the Enemy, as the common fouldior, would forthwith deem such a poor attempt to proceed of a meer fear, as to make a vain shew of som. thing doing, when as they durst not incounter the enemy in his ful strength. As for the other reason drawn from Necessity; What necessity had they, so desperally to set upon the enemy, who voon the approch of Winter must needs in short time lay up his Gallies; and being already in fafe harbor, would neuer be drawn to the hafard of a battel, especially like hope, like strength, like danger appearing on both sides ? Wherfore it were best in his opinion, only to make a great shew of their forces, so to terrifie the barbarous Enemy; but in no case to hazard the hope of the whole Christian Commonweal vpon the fortune of one battell. He further also propounded vnto him the vncertain events of things, the common chances of War, D the strength of the Enemy as wel by sea as by land, with whom they themselves were not (as he faid) indeed comparable. Then what an infinit heap of miseries was like to ouerwhelm the Christian Commonweal, if they should in any thing misearry. And that therefore safe aduice was in this case to be preferred, before that which was attended vpon with great and imminent danger.

On the other fide the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to The Venetians their State, were far of another opinion. Where Venerius and Barbadicus not only vehement. vrgebattell. ly persuaded, but most instantly requested the Generall, with the rest of the great Commanders, That as foon as opportunity ferued they would commit the matter to the trial of a battel, and not make that Councel, which their couragious minds might make most glorious & E fortunat, by declining of battel to become dishonorable & frustrat. If defire of honour (fayd they) moone vs not, that neither these things moone vs 7 the losse of so great and chargeable a preparation, the spoiling of our frontiers, and the insolencie of our enemies, which we increase by delay . We defend our selues and ours, we inuade not them : We go not about to drive the Turk out of his Empire; but that we our selves be not by him driven out of our own countries. Wherfore we ought fo much the more readily and speedily to think of battell, by how much the necessity of him is greater that repulseth a danger, than of him that offreth the same. What are our weapons blunt, or our hands benummed? Shall the Turks so often prowoke vs, & we still be varenenged ? Shall we alway shew our weapons, & neuer fight? One fortunar battel is able to blot out the infamy of former time, & to fil vs with hope of future happines. If nothing els, let the very indignity of the matter stir vs vp to battell. And what doubt is there but that the Enemy (welling with pride, wil come forth with his fleet and give vs battel ? Think you that a small discredit wil insue to our honour and reputation, if contented with a vain brag, having not once skirmished with the Enemy, or so much as seen him, we shall return home, to the generall shame of Christendom ? See how many pestilent inconucniences will infue, if we shall take this course. This manner of proceeding wil fillinens & minds with dispair; the people wil murmure, That they are to no purpose oppressed with exactions and tributes. The confederat princes (carefull of this war) will lay That they have in vain wearied themselves with often embassies and care therof. The proud enemy will accome our departure, or declining of battel, for a manifest victory. The next year we may looke free him again with a greater and ftronger fleet, which wil not only make a more heavy War, but destroy and bear down all before it. At which time who can affire ve that the Christians will haue the like preparation, if we shall now delay to fight. What labor is to be taken what cost to be bestowed, to fer forth again fo great a fleet? Ynto these causes which impose spon we a necessity and force to fight, is adjoyined not only a fingular regard of our honor, but a most no table opportunity also offered. We never had a greater fleet, nor better furnished with men. munition, and all things els to be required for the gaining of a notable victory: & who knows not the Christian gallies are far ftronger than the Turks ? Besides that, the greatest partie their best soldiers are in hope of prey gon into Cyprus, who there seeking after spoil & for getful of the enemy, without controlment glue themselves with the pleasures of that rich Island, wherby their fleet is so much the weaker. All which things, as they promise no hard victory, fo do they propound vnto vs honor, glory, fame, and most honorable rewards, & open unto vs the way both for the defence of the prefent, and recovery of that hath bin before loft. What then stand we stil looking for for why dowe not in Gods name ioin that battel which is vnto vs not only necessary, but profitable also.

Thus much faid, they began to intreat and befeech the General and the rest, not longer to fusser the Christian commonweal to receive losse vpon losse, but to repose their only hope in the good fucces of one worthy battel; and never to look for the like opportunitie if they let flip the present. This matter of so great consequence thus thorowly debated among the great tell commanders, they thought it good to hear also the opinions of other noble Caprains of no leffe experience than themfelues (then in the fleet) before they would conclude shy thing. cornes or Ser- Among the reft. Antonius Cornes and Gabriel Serbellio, both Spaniards, and for their greats wife dom and valor had in general reputation of all men; beeing demaunded their opinions, with most substantial reasons declared the necessity of giving battel; and that it was not so dangerous as so be therfore thunned or delaied, for formuch as that violent enemy was far eafier to be dealt withall at fee than at land, where he must fight without his great multitude of men, the R Turks chief hope, and onely means wherby they have obtained to many victories against the Christians. And so concluded their opinions with an effectuall persuasion to set forwards to Corcyra, and without delay as occasion served to give the enemy battel. Which their opinio on being generally wel liked, was (hortly after by the General and the rest appropried, & arefolution let down for the giving of battel. Which was no sooner known but there was a general rejoicing through the army, every man cheerfully preparing himself to lay down his life in defence of the Christian Commonweal and that with such an ernest defire of battel, that euery day now feemed nothing els but a delay of a most affured victory.

Yet before they should come into the fight of the enemy, the three Admirals thought it good to bring forth the fleet into the feg, and there to martial the fame in fuch for, as if they I should even then presently have joined battel; to the intent, that by such orderly disposing of their fleet, and by appointing to enery man his place he was to keep, they might feacquains them with the order of the battel as that they should when time formed of themselves with our further direction, martial themselves, and so more readily enter into battel. The next the the Admirals brought forth their fleets into the open fear in the right wing (which confided of fifty three Gallier) was Auria placed in the left wing was Angustions Barbadiens with abo like number of Gallies alfo and in the middle battel food the General himselfmith senenty gallies : on the right hand of the General food Columnius and on the left Venerin this affor ciats. Thus with equal front the fleet for forward, as if show should even presently have joines battel. Betwixt the wings and the middle partel was lefe no more space but for three gallien M to row in the rereward behind the General followed Requisionius, their reat Communder of Castile, with his gallies. After Columnius sollowed the Admiral gally of Genod, wheriawas Alexander Farnefius Prince of Parma; and behind Vanerine camo the Admiral gally of Sarby and in her the Prince of Vrbin : in the space betwite the middle bassekand the left wing,

A placed Paulus Iordanus: and betwixt the middle battel and the right wing was Petrus Instinianu with the gallies of Malta: vpon the left wing attended Anthonius Canalis, and Quirinus on the right. About half a mile behind all the rest followed Alvarus Bacianus Marquis of Sancrace, and Admiral of the Neapolitan fleet, with 30 gallies; a man of great experience in matzers at fea, and now fo placed, to be at all times ready to relieue this or that part of the fleet, as the fortune of the battel, or impression of the enemy should require. The Christians had reposed great hope in six galliasses, which furnished with great store of ordnance, & certain select companies of most resolute soldiers, seemed rather like castles than ships. These galliasfes conducted by Francifcus Dodus a most expert captain, were placed about half a mile from the fleet, two of them before each wing, and the other two before the middle battell: fo far di-B stant one from another, as that with equal space they answered the whole bredth of the front of the fleet, which was almost the space of fine miles, and served the same in stead of most frong bulwarks. The gallies throughout the fleet kept not close together, but such a convenient distance one from another, as might serue for them at liberty to discharge their Ordnance when time should require. In the wings, as also in the main battel, were the Popes, the Kings, and the Venetian Gallies indifferently intermixed, that by the quality of the danger they should have more care to relieve one another than if they had served apart. loannes Cardonisu a most valiant captain, with 8 gallies of Sicily and 2 galliots, was appointed to go ten miles before the fleet, to descry what he might of the enemies doings, and in his return to join the one half of his gallies to the one wing, and the other half to the other.

. In this fort they departed from Messana, with purpose to seek out the enemy, and not long after came to Paxo, where of a small broil at the first had like to hauerisen a great mischief: for the next day, whilft Don Iohs staied there to take a view of the Venetian Gallies, and how they were furnished both of men and munition; he finding them but weakly manned, for supplying that want, appointed 4000 Spaniards and a thousand Italians to be put abord into the Venetian gallies where most need was.

Amongst these souldiers was one company under the commaund of Mutius Tortona their Aspanibles. Captain, a man of an unquiet and furious nature: who going aboord the gally of Andreas Ca. tain railets a lingus, fifth fel to words with the Captain of the gally, and after much ftir into plain fight; fo that in a trice they were altogether by the ears, as wel the foldiers as the captains: of al which stir Mutius was the only author. Venerius being not far off, and hearing of the matter, sent the captain of his own gally to appeale the tumule; who thrufting himself into the midst of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his fury fouly intreared, and divers of them that came with him (hrewdly beaten. Which thing Venertus (himself also of an hot nature) taking as don in diffrace of the Venerians, and therwith exceedingly modued; to the terror of others caused Mutius and his Ensigne bearer to be hanged up at the yards arm of the same gally, to He and blidge the great offence of all the Spaniards. The Generall also taking this execution in euill part, tient banged. ful of choler and indignation grieuously complained, that he himself as General was therin Diffention benota little wronged, and that it became every man to know what belonged to his place, and ween much and renging. not to incroch voon his betters : so should the conditions of the league be better kept, if cuc-E. ty Commander could keep himself within the bounds of his own authority. Venerius (he said) whose authority was inferior to his could not of right without his command determine any thing against Mating Spanish captain: and that therin his honor was impaired. For which if he had not a publique and honorable amends, he threatned by force of arms to redreffe his wrong, and the league being broken, to carry away with him the Kings gallies. Neither wanted there some, who fauoring Don tolons quarrell, and angry with the Venetians, laid still more coles on the fire that was already too great. Hereunto Venerine fent word unto the Generall, That he should do wel to moderat his anger, and at leisure to aduise himselse, and better to vaderstand the matter; so should be plainly see, that there was never more just and wholsom execution don upon any, than upon those mutinous persons. But if he, carried away with the F hear of youth, should attempt any more violent course than stood with the common quiet, it were not to be martielled if he afterward repented. He (as he faid) was also in Arms, and ready to shew himself a man. The matterwas grown to that heat, that it was not onely not far from the breaking off of the league; but even at the point to have fer all on a broile, and to have put the whole fleet in great danger. Had not Columnius the Popes Admirall, against this tempest opposed himself:he with al his power labored to cure the wounded mind of the & General, and to appeale his anger; telling him, That the Common enemy would hardly he withflood by them all, being at vnity and concord among themselves: but if vato the forein danger were also ioined domestical discord, then were the Christian commonweal vadon, Bur if he would moderat his anger, and more regard the honor and credit of the Venetian Admis ral than the punishment of a seditious man, euen they which were vnto him friends, and ene mics vnto the Venetians, would highly commend his moderation & staidnes. Yea, that howfocuer the matter was don, it could not be now undon. But what focuer Venerius had don, was in his opinion inftly don. That it was alwaies fo accounted and observed, that when princes joined their forces together, in matters that concerned the common mannaging of Warney thing was to be don without the command of the Generall; but in matters belonging to the privat government of every mans regiment, every General had power of life and death over them that were under his command. Which to be fo, was as he faid herby to be understoods King Philip was King of many kingdoms, and that he might long so be he heartily wished Now if any Millanois had committed any capital crime worthy of death, in the kingdom of Naples, should the judgment of that crime be of right to be referred vnto the King him felf, as the chief Soueraign? or vnto the Gouernor of Millain, where the offendor was borns or rather to the civil Magistrat of Naples, in whose inristing the fault was committed and fo of right there to be executed > What difference was there then, but that Mutius might juff. ly feem to have bin rightly punished by Venerius, who although he were a Spanish Captains had vet raifed a mutiny in a Venetian Gally which was under the commaund of the Venetian Admiral. Beside that, the discipline of War somtime required a severe and exemplary kind of punishment. For which cause it was both notably and truly said of Clearchus, That a Ge. neral was to he more feared of his foldiers, than the enemy. And that among the antient Ro. mans it had bin the custom even for privat men with more severe punishment to restrain the factious Citifen, than the most cruell enemy. That the fact was not so much to be regarded. as the intention of him that did it. That it was the duty of Commanders to withfland the madnes of the mutinous. The author of fedicion and tumult, he faid, had suffered but condign punishment of his fact: who if he had escaped unpunished would but have bin the more difordred. But now his exemplary punishment would deter others from the like infoluncies Beside that, the external danger was such as ought to reconcile them were they never so great K enemies. That such men as they were should aboue all things regard what might profit or hurt the Common cause; in contemplation wherof all privat injuries were to be remitted: and the rather, for that the honor and dishonour of the good or bad succes of such an important action (hould redound vnto themselves, but especially to the General. His own duty be had as he faid discharged, in dealing so plainly and faithfully with him, and could do no more but pray vnto God, with mercifull eie to behold the troubled Christian Commonweal in fo dangerous a time.

Don Jobn fill

Thus was the mutiny at Pako by the great labour of Columnias hardly appealed. Neverthelesse Don John could not afterwards endure to participate with Venerim his Counsels, or so much as to come into his company : but all was don by Barbadiene the Venetian Provideror. [This Barbadicus was not inferior to Venerius in courage and valor, but far beyond him in diferetion: a man of a tall and goodly personage, wel coloured, his beard grizy, though not for age for why he was not aboue fifty years old: besides that, in his cies and countenance appeared a vivacitie or liuelines of spirit: in his very gate and comly motion of his body liee carried certain grace and majefty; his talk and speech was alwaies calm and temperate; his council grave and found; so that he was greatly honored and beloued of all men. His chief endemos alfo was, to further the hope of attonement betwixt the Spaniards and the Venetians, fowell begun by Columnia. And fo all things brought into some reasonable good rearins, they do parted from Paxo and came to the Island of Corcyra, the spoil middle worlder lared the Base mics late being there. From thence they departed vnto Cephalonia, whereathey by Letter M. from Pan. Contarenus Gouernour of Zacynthus, were aduertifed, That the Furks deet of theet hundred and three and thirty fail, of one fort and other, lay in the gulf of Corinth, which is now called the gulf of Lepanto. Wherupon they thorstly after removed, with full purpose to have gon to Petala, an haven lying opposit over against the Islands (or rather tocks) called Echinades,

A Echinades, but now Corzulares, and so to the bay of Corinth, to draw the enemy forth to bat. telibut staved with coatrary winds they put back again into the vally of Alexandria, another port in the Island of Cephalenia; from whence they afterward departed to the Islands Corzulares, where by the way they understood by letters out of Crete, That Famagusta was lost. With which bad news they were no whit discouraged, but rather inflamed with defire of reuenge. From the Islands they went to Galanga, a good harbour, where they staied one night, purposing the next day to have gon to the mouth of the gulf of Lepanto, there to dare the Turks to battel.

The Turks Bassa's Partan and Haly, who then lay in good safety within the gulf, hearing of the comming of the Christian fleet, began to consult with the rest of the most expert Cap-B tains. Whether to give the Christians battel, or to keep themselves stil within their safe harbor : vpon which doubt they were among themselves of divers opinions. Among st the rest, chiroche dif. Chireche a man of great years and authority, and with all a most noble Captain, exhorted the faster is sain.

Bassa's, in no case, when no need was, upon a vain-glory to aduenture all to the fortune of an ite (building).

uncertain battelit was, as he faid, the part of wife and worthy commanders, to moderate with battell. reason their happy fortunes, for that therunto were incident many accidents, wherby their former felicity might be diffgraced. They had already run along the enemies coast, spoild the frontiers of his countries, and were with much honor & greater spoil safely returned, having increased the Turkish empire with many strong towns of the enemies. The Island of Cyprus was with wonderfull good fortune brought under the Turks obeifance, the enemies great pro-

C uision at sea frustrated, in such fort, as that having lost divers of their gallies, they were never vetable to draw their swords: they had with their fleet at their pleasure romed vp and downe the Adriatick, and displaied their victorious ensignes almost vnto the very City of Venice. What could they then deuise or wish for more honorable or glorious, than with the fasery of their fleet, yea without any losse at all, to have performed so great matters? Now the three General commanders of the enemies fleet to be fo at difcord among themselves, as that they were ready to fall in funder of themselves; who now upon the approach of winter, and for want of victual must needs in few daies return home again, neuer herafter to meet again with like firength at sea. And therfore to what purpose were it, by force of arms and vncertain battell. with danger to feek for the foueraignty and command of the fea, which would forthwith of it D felf without any danger fal vnto them? neither should they by the doubtful victory so much increase their honour, as by the vincertain euent of a battell blemish the same, if any thing should fal out otherwise than wel. And that therfore they should do well to take heed, that in feeking to augment their former victories, they hazarded not their honor already gained ;

but wholfomly to delay the War, and keepe themselves in safety with their fleet within the gulf, and not to go out at the enemies pleasure, but when they should see good themselves, at fuch time as the enemy was not sowel prouided. So should they (he said) without any great labor or danger attain to the full of their own defires.

Partau Baifa was of opinion, that the Christians would not at all offer him battel. Which Partau Baifa opinion the Christians had also of him: and in this question, for giving or not giving of battell seemed neither to approoue or dislike that Careche had so gravely spoken, but as a man in time to approoue or dislike that Careche had so gravely spoken, but as a man in
time to approoue or dislike that Careche had so gravely spoken, but as a man in different, loth to incur any blame, shewed himself ready either to stay or set forward, as should be thought fit by the greater part. But Haly Baffa, a man of a hoter spirit, and the great Champion of the Turks, could not indure to hear of any delay, but of present battell. The pleasure of Selymus, the hope of victory, the remembrance of the displeasure of Pial Baffa had the last year incurred, for not giving the Christians battell, induced him now in no case to refuse bartel, but forthwith to go out of the gulf, and to accept therof if it were offered. In which opinion he was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracoza a famous Pyrat, and in great account among the Turks, who in a swift galiot taking view of the Christian fleet, had reported it to be much leffe than indeed it was deceived as it was afterward thought by not taking ful view therof, by reason of his posting hast, or els blinded by the Island, which lying behind the fleet, suffered him not perfectly to descry the same. Vpon which report there was great rejoycing among the Turks, who now after their accustomed maner dreamed of nothing but victory and spoil. So that Haly, vainly persuaded that his fleet was both the greater and stronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Christians vpon first fight of the Turkes fleet would G either retyre and saue themselues by shamefull flight, or els in aduenturing battel at so great ods, by their foolish hardines receive a notable overthrow. This opinion of the Bassa was alfo not a little confirmed by the persuasion of Cassanes, Barbaruss's son, Vluzales, and Chais Beo Gouernor of Smyrna, all men of great mark and experience, especially in sea matters. And although Partan the other Bassa stood wavering as a man in doubt, and Chirache Gouernor of Alexandria, with Carabuzes Gouernor of Cilicia, and Mechmet Gouernour of Euboea, menof no lesse worth than the other, vpon better consideration were of a quite contrary mind, for not giuing the Christians battel. Yet such was the authority of Haly, or rather his importunities foluctogine the forced to his own destiny, that his opinion prevailed; so that now out they must needs and fight. Albeit that two other Spies sent out after Caracoza, and having more perfectly viewed H the fleet returning with speed told the Bassa's as truth was, That the Christians very strong and wel appointed, were comming with enfignes displaied, of purpose to fight, and that their fleet was in number much greater than was before supposed. With which news so far contrary to their expectation, the Bassa's were exceedingly troubled and demaunding whether the formost gallies were all Venetians or not; and being answered that they were intermixt, some Venetians, some Spanish and of the other Western countries, they began to doubt the worst. and became exceeding penfiue. Neuertheles knowing themselues to be of all things wel furnished, having now victualled in the bay of Corinth, and there also taken in 12000 lanizaries and Spahies, drawn out of the garrisons of Ætolia, Acarnania, Peloponesus, and the countries there by, all resolute men, and four thousand other common soldiers, and that they could not now with their honor thrink back, they heldit still for the best to on hold their former resolution for the giuing of the Christians battel. Yet before their fetting forward, calling together the captains and chief commanders of the fleet, Partau the more to incourage them, spake vnto them as followeth:

l'artan Baffa incourageth

We are to fight (faid he) fellows in arms, with that kind of men whom our ancestors have driven out of Euban the Rhodes, Mitylene, Pelopone [us, and Tripolis, and we our selves but yesterday out of the famous Island of Cyprus : whose cities and strong towns, in number infinit, our Emperor hath as the reward of his wars ; whom we have alwaies vanquished as well by sea as by land : and shall it then now repent you that you in this war imbrued in the Christian bloud, have funk or taken many of their ships and gallies? K. That you have caried away great and rich spoils? that you have taken whole Islands and cities at the first affault? That we have by proof shewed unto the world, what force there is in the Turk to subdue strong cities and towns? and what little power is in the Christians to defend the same? What direction brought vs victory before, the same shall also at this present give vs the like. Not to speak of that, that we far excell them both in number of men and gallies; this is more to be reckoned of that we excell them in valour and proweffe : for you being old expert foldsers, from your infancte trained up in the wars, hardned in infinit battels, and full of courage and strength, shal fight against weak fresh water and effeminat soldiers; who entertained for pay (of the refuse of all Nations) know nothing belonging to the warres; or forcibly pressed out of Cities, serue not because they would but because they can neither will nor chuse. But to seath no more of the maner of the Christian soldiers, who are nothing els than the perpetual exercise of your re- L nowned proweffe; and to come unto him under whose fortune and conduct they serue: What should I say? Should I compare either of vs (who have spent our lines in victories and triumphs : who born & brought up among st arms have with our right hands gained unto our felucs honor and fame) with this stripling and half moneths captain, who never faw battels but thefe ? Who in a leffe matter never shewed proofe of himself, why should he be accounted of in a greater ? who in so mighty a cause needeth atutor ; and such a one as indeed bears the name of a General, more for his honor, than for any worth in himself. A for the Christians, whether by sea or land : and (that we have alwaies wished) Italy, faire Italy (wherein these matters are plotted against us) shall be in our hand and power : wherefore let us with such courage Affaile our enemies, as befeemesh most wittorious conquerors, men fo many simes conquered : And fo let forward as if you faw our Emperor himselfe encouraging you, and giving you the lignall of battell; of bis bounty and the present victory, expecting all felicity and bliffe.

This comfortable speech with great gravity delinered by the Bassa, so encouraged the Turks, as that they all with one voice and mind feemed to defire nothing more than battelifor they fill possessed with the first report of Caracoza, a couraged by the Bassa's speech, were in good hope to haue fought the battell vpon great advantage, and therfore thought vpon nothing but present victory. Whereupon setting forward with great cheerefulnesse, they came The Tarte states out of the gulfe, and shaped their course for the Islands Echinades, about mid way betwixt the gulfe of Lee Leganto and Patras, before little Islands, or rather obscure rocks, scarcely appearing in the sea, said. but now to be made famous throughout the World, by the most notable battell that ever was Lebinade, or

The Christians also comming still on towards the enemy, the seuenth of October in the afternoone understood by their espials, that the Turks fleet was comming, and even now at hand:whereupon the Generall commanded the great Enfigne of the confederats (the appointed fignall of battell) to be forthwith displaied, and a great warning piece to be shot off out of his Admirall gally. And himselfe glistering all in bright armor, with Cardona Admirall of Si-C cilia, and Soto his fecretary, in a long boat went to all the fquadrons of the fleet one after another, exhorting them with cheerefull countenance to follow their leaders, and to play the ment remembring, that they that day carried in their hand the wealth, honour, glory, and liberty of their countries, yea, and the very religion of their forefathers; and that that daies victory would bring vnto them and theirs perpetuall felicity : whereas otherwife, if they should as cowards fuffer themselves to be overcome and vanquished, it would be vnto them the beginning of all manner of most wofull calamities. To which and other his like speeches, the Captaines and fouldiers (before of themselues cheerefull enough) in euery place where he came gaue such applause with the joy full cry of Victory, Victory, so often and so cheerefull in all places refounded, as that it was taken as a lucky aboadment of the glorious victory shortly af-D terensuing. In like manner Auria in the right wing, and Barbadieus in the lest (for the fleet kept the same order that they had appointed before at Messana) ceased not by all comfortable speeches to encourage their followers: shewing vnto them, That now the time was come they so long wished for, wherein they not oppressed with multitude, might at length shew their true valour against the false and faithlesse enemies, who being indeed nothing els but base & contemptible flaues borne to bondage, and having lost their owne liberty, came to impugne the liberty of others, bringing with them a greater terror of their name, than valour of their perfons; and that therefore, it ever, they would now shew themselves valiant and couragious, and that day, wherein of all others true force was to be seene, to abate the pride of the barbarous and cruell enemy, and to make their rejoycing for the conquest of Cyprus short, before E they had well tafted the pleasures thereof. At which time also, the Captaines generally thorowout the fleet, with cheeerfull countenances and couragious speech encouraged their souldiers; leaving nothing vnfaid that might hearten them on; or vndone, that might further the victory.

Neither were the Turks wanting to themselues (although it was fallen out much contrary to their expectation, to see the Christians, who they before thought durst not have showed themselues, now ready to dare them battel!) but encouraged with their former victories, and furthered with a faire gale of wind, came on proudly with their fleet orderly and gallantly fee after their wonted manner in forme of a Croisant or halfe-Moon, their fortunat ensignementthelesse in their comming on they were much troubled with the brightnes of the Sun, which F then thining full in their faces, with his bright beams to dazled their eies, that they could not well fee how to their most advantage to dire & their gallies. In this fleet of the Turks were two The mamber & hundred and fifty gallies, fifty gallors, and twenty brigadines & other small vessels: all which a order of the far off shewed like a thicke wood, but cumming neere hand, presented (as we faid) the forme of The hart. a Croifant. The middle battell in number much like the Christians, was conducted by the great Bassa's Haly and Partau, attended vpon with Agan Master of the Turks Arsenall; Musta. G pha Zelibi the Treasurer; Achmat Bay, with Mahomet his wounger brother, the sonnes of Haly Achmat Aga Gouernour of Teuthrania : Asia Caiga Gouernour of Calipolis: Caracoza, Caffines the sonne of Barbarusa; Malamur Gouernour of Mytilene: Dely Solyman Gider Captaine of Chios; Cassambeius Gouernour of the Rhodes; Prout Aga Captaine of Nauplium; Gisper Zelibi Prefident of Calabra; Dordagnan, Dondomeni, and many others, whose barbarous names I purposely omit; all men of great account and place, and for their experience at fea the chiefe strength of the Turkish Empire. The right wing was by the appointment of the Bassa's commanded by Mahomet Be h fifty fix gallies, with whom were also many worthy Captaines; and in the left wing was Wluzales the old Arch pyrar, but now the Vice Roy of Algiers, with ninety five gallies, accompanied with Cariolo and Arabey his two fonnes, H with a multitude of pyrats, men of his owne profession, but most valiant and expert souldis crs. In the rereward came Amurathes Dragut, with thirty gallies, and divers other small vessels.

The event and the battell of Libanto.

Now was the day well spent when both the sleets were ready to give battell the enemy notable battell ftil comming on almost in the same order that the Christians did: for their middle battel came directly against our middle battell, and their wings against ours. So the fignall of battell on chriftians, com- both fides given by the shooting off of certain great pieces; the Turks after their maner comming on with an hidious cry, first light upon the fix galiasses, which lying at anchor almost a mile before the fleet, as most strong bulwarks, out of their forecastles poured out thier murthering shot voon the Turks, now come within their danger; and in their passing by so plagued them, by discharging their whole broad sides, first the one, and eftsoons the other vpon them. that having received great loffe, and divers of their gallies funke, they were inforced to breake their order, and to fall further off. Which so much the more troubled the Turks, for that they had before supposed, those great carts and unserviceable ships (as they accounted of them) to haue carried little or no great ordnance on their fides, after the manner of their gallies; for the vie of the galeasses was not vnto the Turks known, vntil now that they had received from them most notable harme: which as it was the beginning of their misery, so was it vnto the Christians of greatest importance for the gaining of the victory. At which time also the wind, which all that day had much fauoured the Turks, was now (God no doubt fighting his own battell) come about to the West, and with a pleasant gale in the time of the fight carried the smoke K of the great ordnance vpon the Turks, to their no small disaduantage. Yet for all this losse and disorder in their fleet, the fierce enemy with wonderfull pertinacie passing by these galeasses, quickly repaired again to their places, and made good their difordred squadrons, and with all Atterrible onfet their force affailed the Christian fleet. The trumpets, drums, and other instruments of war had scarcely wel founded, when all shook with confused cries, flames of fire, thundring of artillery, and other noise of the mariners and sea men; wherewith many were so astonied as if they had bin both deaf and blind, having upon the sudden almost lost the vse both of their sight & hearing. At which very instant a man might have seen the whole showers as it were of arrows and darts mixt with the deadly shot, flying from the one fleet to the other; the masts broken, the saileyards strucke downe, the tackles rent, and all confused with horror and seare. Haly beholding g A dreadful and the Admiral gally (which was easie to be known by the flag) & ving the furpaffing cherfulnes of his mariners & rowers, ran upon her with such violence as if he would have presently stemmed her: but being with like force incountred by the Admirall they met together with such violence, that both their beaks were with the feaze broken off, and so fell into the sea. There began a most cruell fight betwixt these two great commanders, who had before drawne vnto them the strongest gallies in their fleets, and the choisest men in their armies. In the Admiral gally of the Christians were 400 select men pickt out of the whole army, most of them Captains & antients, men of approued valor; who not only valiantly repulfed their furious enemies, but with greater courage inforced them to shrinke backe, and pressing hard vpon them, entred the gally even to the main mast; where the enemy strengthned with new supplie, sought cou- M ragiously, repulsed the Spaniards, and cleered again their gally. Many were there wounded on both sides, and many slain. Don John seeing his men give way, sent in new supply; wherewith the other encouraged, bestirred themselves more lustily than before, and hardly charged the Turks, who with like hope and like courage encountred them. The battell was like vnto the

Venerius perceiving the danger of the General, was about to have affailed the poupe of Haly Venerius comhis gally, so to have indangered her, being set you both before and abathe: but in comming little ben the whither he was encountred by Partau the other Baffa, who with a company of gallies opposed is incommend himselfe against him, and that with such celerity, that having made shew as if he would have by Partin # 15charged him afront, he by and by fer upon his fide. Which unexpected manner of fight fo fuddenly fashioned, at the first much troubled the Christians, who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themselves . Venerim (vpon whose valor the Venetian State rested) gallantly B armed not only incouraged his men, one while with intreating, another while with threatning, but was himself in the midst of them fighting, whose great honour much moved the minds of his fouldiers, but his reverend yeres more; to fee him (being aboue 77 yeres old) to performe all the parts of a braue youthful commander, in the very face of the greatest danger. The sierce enemy having flain many of the Christians, pressed on more furiously, & fighting close together, entred the prow of Venerius his gally now bared of defendants, and with their multitude Venerius is rather than true valor oppressed the Venetians; who had there no doubt bin ouercome, had not danger. Ioannes Lauretanus and Catherinus Malipetra, two valiant captains, and lying not far off, fpeedily come to their reliefe. By whose comming in the fight was in the turning of an hand quite altered; fo that they which a little before fiercely affailed the Venetian gallies, were now glad C to defend their owne: fo for a space the fight stood indifferent, but in processe of the battell. those two worthy captaines, whilest they also performe the parts of most resolute souldiers. were both flain, fhor through with small shot. The fall of these notable men did rather enrage Laureignus than discourage the minds of their soldiers: so that blinded as it were with fury, and suddenly and Malipebecome other men, they desperatly pressed in upon the Turks so that whilest they on the one fide kill and wound them, and Venerius more hardly chargeth them on the other; the terrour of the battell was turned from them that was even at the point to have been vanquished, upon the vi Aors; and our men after great flaughter of the Turks, tooke two of their gallies: Parian the Bassa in a long boat escaped the danger, and so got him out of the battell. Not farre off thence, Columnius the Popes Admirall, as a valiant Chiefetaine hardly affailed other of the Turks gallies, and made among it them great flaughter: one fingled from the reft, he took, and disordred the other. Lignim the Admirall of Genoa with like courage thrust himselfe into the thickest of the enemies, and there made a notable fight. Many an enemy fell about the Prince of Parma, Rueres, Vr sinus, Cornea, and Iustinianus; who for their present honor, and future fame, fought most couragiously. At which time Chiroche or Sirocke (of some called Mahomet Bey) with his right wing with great confidence came forward against the left wing of the Christian fleet, but falling before be was aware into the danger of the galeasses, was from out of them miserably beaten with the great ordnance, having many of his men flaine, and divers of his gallies funke and torn, few The right wing of the huge and deadly that falling in vaine into the fea, by reason of the thick standing of the of the Turks E Turks gallies: where also divers of the enemies were burnt with pots of wildfire cast into their by the galeasies. gallies out of the tops of the galeasses. Chiroche to avoid the danger of the galeasses, & to shun the dangerous shelfe betwixt him and the main (which the river Achelous running betweene the borders of Acarnania and Ætolia, and there falling into the sea, maketh) sent a great part of his gallies under the conduct of one Alis a notable renegat of Genoa, to cast about aloofe upon the right hand, and so to come vpon the backe of Barbadiess the leader of the left wing of the Christian fleet. Which he perceiuing, forthwith turned his gallies, & with their prows receiued the first onset. The great ordnance first on both sides discharged, divers of the gallies gra. Among the reft, the fight of two of the Christian gallies was most notable; in the one was Barbadiem himselfe, in the other Marem Ciconia, vpon whom fell fix of the enemies Gallies, and voon Barbadiem fine : who although they were on every fide distressed with a most doubtfull and dangerous fight, yet did they most valiantly with worthy resolution endure the euen there where most danger was, was hit in the left eie with an arrow, and so strucke into the G braine almost thorow the head: wherewith falling presently downe, he was taken up for dead. howbeit he died not thereof vntill three daies after. The supposed death of this worthy man much troubled the Christians, and both the armies felt his fall (such force there is in the valour of one worthy man) for the Turks now as conquerors lustily boorded the gally, troubled with the losse of the Captaine; and the Venetians as men discouraged gaue way; the galler there had vindoubtedly bin loft, had not Fredericus Naniss and Sylvius Percia with their gallies speedily come to her reliefe: by whose comming in such an alteration was made, as that the gally before halfe taken, was not only cleared, but divers of the Turks gallies also boorded and some of them taken, not without the great slaughter of the Turks. In this so hard and mortall a conflict, Sylvies was grieuoully wounded in the thigh and in his right fide, It is to. ported of Barbadiens, That lying that evening at the point of death, the battell then ended he like another Epaminondas, asked which part had got the victory : and being told that the Christians had got it, and that the Turks fleet was most part taken, and the rest sunke or burnt, he with his cies cast vo to heaven, gave vnto God immortall thankes therefore, and not long after joyfully departed this life, to live in bliffe for ever.

The death of Barbadiens.

Ciconia in the meane time hardly befet with fix of the enemies gallies, (as we have before befet, and in faid) was himselfe fore burnt with wild fire and hurt in the face, and having indured slong beere loft, wire and terrible fight, was now even at the point to have been loft, when fudden reliefe comming in, he was now contrary to all hope faued, and therewith fo much encouraged, that with his weary and wounded fouldiers, as men from death revived, he afresh charged the enemy, and tooke one of the principall gallies, with one of the Turks faireft enfignes, which in the Venetian Armory is yet there to be seene: of his worthy valour, his honest wounds in his face and the fore part of his body, were most certaine and vindoubted witnesses.

Not far off, in the same wing Joannes Contarense an honourable and valiant gentleman, did with his great shot exceeding much harme among st the Turks gallies: which Chiroche perceiuing, and therewith inraged, ran so fiercely upon the side of Contarenas his gally, that with his beake he had wel neer stemmed her. & presently grappling fast with her, was like to have boorded her; whom nevertheleffe the Christians notably repulfed, with greater flaughter than was thought possible for so small a number to have made:neither did the enemies fall vnreuenzed. but all imbrued with the bloud of the Christians. Seldome hath bin seene a more cruel fight. or more resolute Captaines to encounter hand to hand. But after the battell had of long time stood doubtfull, the hope of the Christians increased upon two causes, for which the courses of the enemy quailed : first, for that many of the Turks being slaine or wounded, they were brought to a small number; then, for that both parties saw Chiroche himselfe slain: from which time the enemy as well destitute of a leader to conduct them, as of fresh supplies to relieue them, began to be cut down right or taken; which their danger was the more increased, because the gally bulged with the great shot, was now leake, and in danger to fink: wherfore the Turks in that wing ouercome with despaire, began to thinke rather how to saue themselves by flight than by fight, repoling their trult in nothing more than in the neernes of the main. But as they were turning about toward the shore, they were preuented by the Christians; who entring the I gally, and having flain and driven overboord almost all that were lest, took Chiroche, yet breathing, but halfe dead, and feeing small hope of his life, with fresh wounds made an end of him.

Divers and doubtfull was the whole face of the battell: as fortune offered vnto every man his enemy, so he fought; according as every mans disposition put into him courage or feare, or as he met with mo or fewer enemies, so was there here and there sometime victory, and sometime losse. Many fights were in fundry places scene mingled together: some gallies whiles they run to stem others, are themselves by others stemmed : some, which you would thinke were flying away, falling by fortune vpon one victorious gally or other, suddenly take them: other some, as if they had binof neither part, row vp and down betwixt the battels. The chance of war in one place lifteth vp the vanquished, and in another ouerthroweth the victorious: all M was full of terror, error, forrow, and confusion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Christians at length began to appeare much superiour both in courage and strength: and the Turks seemed now rather to desend themselues, than to assaile their enemies.

Hatsands in the rereward intentinely marked all the whole fight, and enter as need required. fent in prefent aid, without respect whether they were the Popes galles, the king of Dorines. or the Venetians, that were diffressed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turks feeing the Christian General's gally hardly charged on the prow by Hall Buffs, to be almost hared of defendants in the poure, all the foldiers having their hands full bufore, wore about to have boorded her abathe, and to that purpole were fetching a compassed bout her. Which Hacianus quickly perceiuing, glistering in bright armour came speedily in with bertaine gallies. and by oppoling of himselfe against them stated their course. In all the barrell was not seene a more cruell fight; for having discrarged many volleys of shortand attowed and dares without number, they grapled at length together, and came to the fword, where with the formoft. Baria B and not only with words, but with his prefence and valour wonder fally edecurates his four diers having received in his targuet of proofe two small shots Many were on both sides slain. Now had Don John with like courage and firength, but with doubtfull victory, fought three A terrible feb. houres and more with Haly Baffa; when after fo dreadfull and dangerous's fighty and many a busine Haly deadly would on both parts given and received; our men began to faint, and brought to the Long. vetermost of their devoire, were in danger to have beene overcome, had now Don Ishin betaken C himselfevato his only and last refuge. The Bassa deadly wounded in the head with a short, and all imbrued with bloud, was taken, and as a joyful speciate brought to Don John, who feeing him ready to breathe his last, commanded him to be desposled of his armor and his head strucke off. Which presently set upon the point of a speare, he for a space Haly saffa fisin D held up aloft with his owne hand, as a trophy of his victory, as alfo with the fight thereof to strike a terror into the minds of the other Turks, who in the other gallies fall by fought yet

Great was the joy conceived of this victory, but to none more welcome, than to the poote Christians fast chained to the Turks gallies, of whom twelve thousand were thereby delive red from most miserable thraldome, and contrary to all hope restored to their antienbliberty. El

Two daies after this victory, Venerius fent Humfredus Iustinianus with newes thereof vito ber, by shooting off of certain great pieces, gave warning ynto the city of his comming, which at that time hung in a great suspence betwirt hope and feare. The civisens generally awaked with the report of the great ordnance, came flocking by heaps to the port, every their longing to heare the first newes. There they might see Iustinian comming a far off with his wally, but when he was come neerer, they might perceive all the mariners attired like Turks; and foure of the Turks enfignes hanging behind at the poupe of the gally, which filled their minder with the hope of good newes, deeming it to be (as indeed it was) part of the spotlerof the enemy. But after that Instinian was landed (which he had much to do for the presse) and was M gone to the court, with a world of people following after him, crying one for newes, and had there delivered his letters, and at large discoursed of all the successe of the barrels (which was forthwith blowne into the City) and that the mariners also after his departure had to ported the victory, and that the enemy was in a great battell ouerthrowne I good God, how

A the people as men ouerjoyed, ran vp and downe the streets, doubling and redoubling the joyfull name of victory. The Senators also rejoycing together, gaue thanks to God with publike praices and joy full hymnes in every Church: and afterwards by ringing of bels, peals of ordnance, bone, fires, & other fuch like things, shewed all the tokens of joy possible. And to make this joy the more generall, all prisoners were set at liberty, and all debts that exceeded not the fumme of fine and twenty crownes, payed out of the common treasurie; which was generally done through all the Venetian Seigniory; and a decree made, That that day whereon the victory was gotten, which was the feuenth of October, dedicated to the memorial of In. flina, should for ever be kept holy-day; and for the perpetuall remembrance thereof, a great maffe of mony was coined, with the impression of Iustina upon it, and an inscription decla-B ring the victory. Many also their neighbor Princes sent their Embassadors congratulatory to Venice, namely, the Dukes of Sauoy, Florence, Ferrara, Parma, Mantua, and Vibin, and the Knights of Malta. In which so publike joy no man was seene to put on any mourning garments, or to shew any token of heavinesse, although many had lost their dearest friends and neerest kinsemen; whose lives they reckoned not lost, but given vnto the Christian Commonweale. The like rejoyeing was also made in Rome, in Spaine, Naples, Sicilia, and Malta, especially at such times as Embassadors from their neighbour Princes, came to joy them of this victory: yea, and afterwards in other countries further off was like rejoicing and fignes of joy. as with vs here in England.

This is that notable battell, commonly called the battell of Lepanto, fought neere vnto the C Island Curzolari, the seuenth day of October, in the yeare 1571, the like whereof was never fought at sea against the Turke, wherein he lost his chiefe strength at sea, with most of his best sea captains: and might thereby well perceive what he and his successors were to seare, if the Christian Princes at unity among st themselves, all discord set apart, should in zeale of their religion joyne their inuincible forces against them.

In the middest of all this joy, generally conceived of the late victory, one of the chiefe prifoners of the Turks, hearing it compared with the loffe of Cyprus (for that Selymus had there-made by a Turk in loft his fleet, his best men of war, with great store of ordnance) by a fit comparison shewed it selection not to be so, saying, That the battell loss, was unto Selymus as if a man should shaue his beard, less of signal which would ere long grow again; but that the loss of Cyprus was unto the Venetians, as the shaulting of D losse of an arme, which once cut off, could neuer be againe recoursed. Declaring thereby the Levanie.

The rich spoile taken from the enemy in this most glorious victory, was thus divided a. The poile of the mongst the princes consederat. Vnto the Pope were allotted 19 gallies, two galliors, nine great entmy distinct pieces of ordnance, two and forty leffer pieces, and fourescore and one prisoners. Vato the king confideration of Spaine eight and fifty gallies and an halfe, fix galliots and an halfe, eight and fifty great picces and an halfe, eight great murthering pieces & a halfe, an hundred twenty eight leffer pieces, and a thousand seven hundred and thirteen prisoners. Vnto the Venetians were assigned for their share nine and thirty gallies and a halfe, foure galliots and a halfe, nine and thirty great pieces and an halfe, flue great murthering pieces and a halfe, fourescore and six lesser pieces, E and athousand one hundred threescore and two prisoners. The rest were bestowed upon such other Princes as had given aid or otherwise well descrued in that service.

The joy conceived of this victory was not fo great among ft the Christians, but that the forrow thereof was amongst the Turks far greater. Selymus himselfewas then at Hadrianople, where eight daies after the battel, news was brought voto him, That his fleet was ouerthrown aud almost all taken or funke by the Christians. Which so foone as he heard, he was strucken with exceeding griefe: and ouercome with melancholy, would not that day fuffer any man to speake with him. And the rumor of the ouerthrow fill increasing, had in short time filled all places with feare, teares, mourning, and heavineffe: fome bewailing their parents, fome their children, some their husbands, some their friends or kinsmen, there lost. But that which most F grieved the Turkish Emperor, was the losse of somany worthy and expert captains, of so many skilfull mafters and notable fouldiers; who brought voall their liues at fea, were not thought inferior to any then living: besides the perpetuall ignominy and vnwonted disgrace, thereby inflicted vnto him and his posterity for euer. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation he was found the old Admirall Venerius, with no leffe care prouiding for all things, than if he should G himselse have still continued the war. Of which great care Fuscarinus at his comming eased him, by taking it wholly vpon himfelfe.

Whilh Fuscarinus thus lay making his preparation against the next Spring at Coreyra, Sa. invariationper ra Martinengus, who had the charge of the Adriaticke (by the counfell of Venerius, who was now returned to Venice) vpon the sudden landed his men, & besieged Castro Novum, a strong towne of the Turks in the borders of Istria, whereat his first comming he tooke the suburhs and had in short time brought the towne to great extremity. But in the height of his hope to haue woon the towne, hearing that the Beglerbeg of Grace was with great power comming thither he was glad to raise his siege, and with all speed to get him againe to sea. The Turke in like manner, to diffresse the strong town of Cataro, holden by the Venetians in the borders H of Dalmatia, built a great and strong fort vpon the passage from sea to the towne, wherein they placed great store both of men and artillery; in hope by keeping them of the towne from all reliefe by fea, at length to gaine the towne which they had many times in vaine attempted by force; for by land it was already invironed with the cruell enemy, possessing the country round Superantimere- about it. Iacobus Superantius the great Providetor, then lying at Corcyra with the Admirall teath Cataro, understanding how Cataro a town of no small importance, was thus both by sea and land by erest fort of the enemy diffrested: with twenty gallies manned with the most choice souldiers could be pickt out of the whole fleet, tooke vpon him the rafing of the fort, and relieuing of the towne. Superantius with this felect company, and certaine other gallies which met him by theway. came by night before the mouth of the bay of Cataro, and there dividing his fleet, left the 1 one part thereof at anchor before the fort, and with the other himselfe couragiously passed by the fort, further into the bay: at whom the Turks out of the fort made divers shot, but (by reafon it was darke) to finall purpose. In passing by, Superantius tooke such view as he could of the fort, and by and by began on that fide to batter the fame; as did also the other gallies on the other fide: and withall landed their men on both fides; who you fignall given, ran refolutely to the fort, and by plaine force entering the same, prevailed voon the fearefull Turks. and nut them to the sword every mothers son; so that of all that great garrison, was not one left aliue to carry newes of the flaughter. This fort was in length five hundred paces, but not strong towards land, from whence no such feare was doubted. In it was taken seventeen great pieces of ordnance, with much faire armour, and great abundance of victuals: and feuen galli- K ots which lay at anchor under the fort. Cataro thus relicued, Superantica with victory returned againe to Corcyra.

Fuscarinus the Venetian Admirall with all things in readinesse, having long lien at Corcyra, expecting the comming of the confederates, as was before appointed; feht Superantim the Providetor with five and twenty gallies to Messana, to hasten the comming of Don John, and to attend upon him by the way. But comming thither, and thinking to have found a great fleet and a strong power in good forwardnesse to have set forward, he found such small preparation, as well shewed the Spaniards small care for repressing of the Turke, and that they would not be very forward in the feruice intended. Which filling him with griefe and indignation, caused him to complaine unto himselse of their unfaithfulnesse, and to bewaile the state of his L country, with the whole Christian common-weale: for Don John had before solemnely promised vnto the Venetian Embassador, that all things should be in readinesse against the appointed time: but now a great part of Summer was past, when scarce some sew companies, and about fifty gallies were met together at Messana; and when Auria would come with the rest, no man could tell. So that the carefull Providetor sood now no lesse in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turks fury.

Selymus, after the great ouerthrow he had received at the Islands Corzulares, for feare he should be driven quite out of the sea, was aboue all things carefull for the renuing of his nauy:and having partly new built, partly repaired two hundred gallies, commended them to the conduct of Vluzales; with expresse charge, That by how much things had fallen out worse the M last yeare, he should with so much the more care now beware of the like danger; and not goe out of the bounds of the Archipelago, or to aduenture battell but vpon aduantage, or at leastwife vpon an euen hand.

This Vluzales (otherwise called Occhiall) was an Italian borne in Calabria, who in his youth taken at fea by the Turks, and obgined in the gally, and afterward renouncing his fairh. by many degrees grew unto the highest preferments amongst the Turks, and so became an exceeding plague as wel to his own sountry as all other of the Christians bordring on the Mc dicerranian. He now Admirall for the Tutk, after the manner of the proud Barbarians, threat, Plazales a rened with fire and fword so be reuenged ypon the Venetians; which knowne at Venice, much negat chiffien troubled them, as well acquainted with the futy of the old Archpytat, Beside that, Autorise Turks Admiral Rarbarus their Embassadour, all the time of this war kept in fafe custody at Constantinople. had by letters certified them, what a great fleet, and what a ftrong army Selymus had provided against them : and that he bimselfe told 250 saile of gallies when they fer forward from Constantinople, beside some other that were to meet with him at Calipolis: and that therefore B they (hould beware how they incountred with the Turks fleet but vpon equal frength, It was also at the same time commonly reported. That king Philip chief of the Consederate derelesse of the wars against the Turk in the East, was about to turn his forces vpon the Kingdomes of Tunes or Algiers, neerer vnto him a se indeed he did the yeare following. The Venetians intangled with someny difficulties were even at their wits end, and day by day the Sonat face from the rising of the Sun to the setting of the same, consulting how all these mischigsswere to be remedied. But for a funch as the greatest danger was to be forced from the Turks fleet, as then houering even over their heads, they by Letters commanded Fuscarinus their Admiral. That whether the Confederar's came vnto him or not, he should forthwith take his course towards the East, and there according to the enemies designes, and his own discretion and va-C lour, to do what he should think best to be done for the common good of his country, and not to refuse to ioyn with the enemy in battell, if he saw any good hope of victory. Neither ceafed they at the fame time, both by their Embassadors and letters, earnestly to call both upon the Pope and the King, to haften their forces to incounter the enemy before he should come out of his own feas; and to carry the terrour of the war home to his own doores, rather than to receive it at their owne. The like message was also done to Don John, putting him in minde what his place, what the time, and what the danger of the time required; intreating him (if it were possible) of himselfe to adde somthing vnto that hast which the necessity of so important a cause remired. Who neuerthelesse, for all the messengers and letters to him sent (which were many) went still on faire and softly, delaying from day today; telling, That he would D by and by come, and that the Spaniards would alwaies be fogood as their word. Which was fo far from his thought, that afterwards finding one excuse after another, he not only staid his comming, but called back again Requiserius also, whom he had fent before with twenty gal- superantus lies to Corcyra. Now were two months (fittelt for the wars) vainly spent; when Superautius hastness bank Dan grieued to fee time to no purpose so slip away, and fearing lest the rest of the Summer should to as small effect in like manner passe also, with great instance importuned him to hasten his journy. Then at length Don Iohn answered, that the Venetians requested but reason, neither that he wished for any thing more than to satisfie their desires, but that a greater care hindred the leffe, which was first to be preuented: He was aductifed (as he said) that the French King pretending the suppressing of certain pyrats, had assembled a great sleet at Rochel, with pur-E pose indeed to inuade Spain, now that the king was busted in these wars against the Turk; and that therfore they must pardon him if he preferd the regard of Spain before others, being exprefly commanded from the king, not to depart from Messana vntill he had other commandment from him. But whether this excuse by France proceeded of a true fear or otherwise, the Venetians much doubted, and the rather, for that the French King understanding thereof by the Venetians, was therwith (as reason was) exceedingly offended: protesting, that he was ever fo far from that purpose of hindring any the confederat princes in that their religious war, that if the troubles of his own country would have fo permitted, he would gladly have given them aid therin. Many there were also that thought, Bruy the antient enemy of vertue and valor, to have had a great power inchis delay; doubting whether the Spaniards would more relovee of the victory well hoped for, if they should ioin with the Venetians; or grieue if the same should by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantins weary of discourses and long expectation, and almost our of hope of any help in time from the Spaniard , how entowardly foeter things wone, thought better you warily to moderate his griofe, than in fo dangerous a time to give any occasion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet spake he not fauningly os flatteringly of the matter, but with a certaine modely granicy declared. That he had chought heaven & would fooner hane fallen, than that Don tolin would not at the appointed time have come to Coreyra. And withall befought him, and withed him to beware that he brought nor the common flate into forme great danger: if they had to do with first in section as might be delaied with, then he faid he could caffly abide delay? But now for that the war and the enemy was fuch, as wherein, or with whom never any General! had delated without loffe, to what end did he longer defer or trifle out the time for what other fleer did he expect ? If they flould di. nide their forces, then were they all too weake, but vnired together, frong enough to defend the common caufe. The necret the enemy came, the more half were to be made to joyne with the Venetian fleet. And what could be (as he told him) whore honorable or glorious, than for him a noble young Gentleman royally discended, of whom the world had conceived a great the hore. That he would in mattiall honour exceed the glory of his most famous ancedors, again to vanouish the proud Turk, the greatest and most mighty Monarch of the worldsto fight the battelf of the Highest, to assure the Christian commonwealth against so puissant an enemy, and to burchase vnto himselfe immortall glory and renown. As for the French, there was no fuch thing to be feared as was pretended, who with fuch flender proparation, not worth the name of a fleet, was not fo vnaduifed as to fet upon a Kingdome of fuch frength and power as Spain. Furthermore he faid, that it concerned not the Venetians more than the King him. felfe, to have the Turks repressed whose Kingdoms of Naples, Sicilia & Spain, wetero lesse than their territory, exposed to danger by sea. The good successe of their affaires in the East would open the way to the conquest of Africkibut if the Turk should preuaile, then were they I to despaire, not of Africk, but of all Italy, Sicily, yea and of Spain it selfe. The time (he said) and necessity of the war, with the extremity of the danger of the whole and common state, required that he should with all his power and speed possible, take upon him the desence of the common cause, or to say more truly of the Christian commonweale, then so dangerously impugned. These reasons drawn from the common good and the truth it selfe, much moved the Generall: but the Kings pleasure was to be preferd before all reasons or dangers that could be alledged. But hearing afterward, what refolute command the Venetian Senat had fent vmo their Admirall, he became exceeding carefull: for he feared lest if the Admirall and with out his help fight the battell and gain the victory, he would convert all the glory therof vnto himself:but if he should chance to be overthrown, it would turn to his veter reprochand perpetual infamy, that in fo necessary a time he had withdrawn himself from the common cause. Wherefore as a man perplexed, and in doubt what to doe, he flood for a while as one at his wits end; yet at last, he voon deliberation resolved to take a middle course, and so neither without the command of the King (by whose prescript order all was to be don) to depart with the fleet from Messana; neither altogether to frustrat the Confederats of the expected and. And He fendeth Life to that purpose sent two and twenty gallies under the conduct of one Lilly of Andrada (ano. ly of Andrada, ble Gentleman) to the Venetian Admirall at Corcyra; with whom went also Columnius with the Popes fleet. Now was Pins Quintus the late Pope dead, and Pgo Bancompanius, by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his stead; who vpon the same conditions with his predecessour, had entred into the league, and liking very well of Columnius, kept him still for his !! Admirall.

Long had Fuscarinus expected the comming of the Confederats, and albeit that the years was far fpent (August being then come) and no such aid sent as he had expected a yet desiring to do fomthing worth the remembrance, and befeeming their honour, he carneftly perfusated Columnius and Lilly to fet forward with him toward the East, and with their united forces to give the enemy battell:telling them, That if they were all of like courage; they should go not only to the glory of the present battell, but to the great honor and advancement of the Chris stian commonweale. After that, he extenuated the power of the enemy, faying, That he could not but maruell from whence such a number of gallies as was reported; could so suddenly be gathered, or whereupon fo great confidence and boldnes was grown vatothem, follately outer M thrown and put to flight: the enemies fleet (he faid) was the yere before cuercome and different fed, the Captains and mariners flain, and that therfore in was not credible; that fo many gab lies could with fuch celerity be built, and fuch a number of mariners and mafters as was peods full in fo thort time provided : That the provision of the enemy was thy flying fame made fact

A greater than indeed it was or possible could be : for why, they might casily guesse what the enemy was able to do, by the Christians themselues, who could not without much adoe and great labour build their fleets, and train up their Mariners and Masters : and that therfore letting fame flie, which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadfull than they are, he was verily perfuaded, that the enemy was glad to vie most viskilfull and ignorant as well Mariners, Masters, as foldiers: who suddenly taken up in the inland countries, and put into the gallies, knew not fo much as the very names of the ropes and tacklings, and other equipage; and then those gallies which they had were like enough to be the cake, as of them which were the last yere rent and bruised, & now again botched which they built of green timber, could not be nimble or greatly seruiceable. Wherefore he exhaust them, as valiant men to set for-B ward against the enemy, and that with the greater courage, for that the last yeares victory had opened vnto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it should so fall out, as good hope there was, they (hould therby take from the proud enemy both power and hope (but in long time) to beable to recouer his strength at seas so that they in the mean time without fear, might at their pleasure take the rich Islands in the Archipelago. Now if the Turks declining battel, should retire themselues into the Hellespont, then might they with fire & sword spoil all the frontiers of their dominion on this fide the ftreits, and open away vnto the Christians to do great matters. Hardly were Columnius and Lilly persuaded by the Admirall: neither did they thereunto giue their consent, untill it was decreed. That they should not in any case ioin battell with the C. enemy but with their gallions & galeasses first placed in the front of the battel, in whom confifted the greatest hope of the victory. So fetting forward toward the enemy, & come to Commentitia, letters were brought unto them from Don Iohn, certifying them, that he was now by letters from the King commanded to come towards the East, and to ioin his forces with the confederats; but yet that for certain daies he could not come, vntil he were better prouided of all things necessary: and that therfore they should in the mean time carefully looke vnto all things, promifing fo foon as he possibly could to come to them. Voon these letters Columnism and Lilly began to doubt, whether to go on further, or to expect the comming of the Generals yet forafmuch as he had not expresly written any thing concerning their staying, and Fuscarinus vrged them forwards, on they went, with their fleet divided into three battels. The whole D fleet confisted of 155 gallies, fix galeasses, and twenty tall ships: in the right wing was Supe. The number of rantim; in the left wing Canalim; and in the middle battell, Columnius, Fuscarinus, and Lilly 3 and christian feet. in the rereward followed Quirinus. Before each battell went two of the galcasses stil in readines for present battell. In this order they came first to Zacynthus (commonly called Zanto) & so to Cerigo: the next day after to Colubraria (commonly called Dragonaria) ouer against Cerigo. Here Angelus Surianus a valiant gentleman, sent before to discouer the enemy, & what firength he was of, returning vnto the fleet, declared vnto the Admirall, That the Turks fleet, confishing of 160 gallies, 60 galliots, and four great ships, lay about Maluasia, in the entrance of the bay called Sinus Argolicus, vpon the borders of Peloponesus, about fifty miles off from the Christian fleet. Shortly after, the same fleet was again discouered making for Maleas E wherupon the Christians, before resolued to fight wheresocuer they should meet the Enemy, forthwith our themselves in order of battel, and so with their galcasses in the front, made with what speed they could toward him. These two fleets were thought for many respects almost equalithe enemy was in number moe, but inferiour in strength. The Christian scet by reason of the heavines of the galeaffes, made but smal way; and the enemy afraid of the great store of The Christian Ordnance the galleasses carried, durft not come neer them. The Turks fleet was rather nimble Turks and the than strong but ours more firm and forward. Look wherin each exceeded the other, therwith equal. they endeauored to help themselves and annoy the enemy. The Christians searing to be circumuented by the multitude of their enemies, opposed their ships and galeasses before them as a most fure fortresse: and the Turk, by how much he had had the worse successe the years before, was fo much the more carefull to beware how he indangered himself within the reach The Tarke was of the galeasses. The Christians desired nothing more than to fight and to come to handy bases, blows : but the Turk who thought it sufficient for the present not to be overcome, somtime made away as fast as he could, and by and by stayd again, if haply he might have taken the gallies separated from the galeasses; neuer seeming willing to adventure further than reason Gggg ≰

and discretion were. The enemy seeing the Christian sleet comming still on, and ready to G giue battell, first seemed as if he would have don the like, but afterwards turned his course you on the right hand, and kept aloof along it the coast of Malea: At which time the Christians although they were very defirous to have followed them, yet the Turks with their nimble fleet were quickly too far gon for the Christian fleet to ouertake them, especially with their heavy ships. That day almost spent as it were in the chase of the enemy, towards the going down of the Sunne, the enemy put into the current of the fea betwire Cerigo and the Harris Island, in bredth about ten mi the ad there dividing their fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expecting the committee the Christians, with the prowes of their gallies turned, as if you the confidence of the place, which they had filled overthwart, they had purposed nothing more than to fight. Yet both fleets feemed resolved; the one not to fight without the galeasses, and the other not to come neer those hot ships, from whom they had but the yeare vingilis mea- before received fo great harm. And although the enemy, as was afterwards known, purposed ning nothing nothing lesse than to fight, but vpon great advantage; yet fearing by open flight to dishonor hew of batter. his lord and master, and by granting as it were of victory, to increase the fame of the Christian ans, the crafty pyrat made a great shew of that he lest indeed purposed. For pretending agrees defire to fight, he indeed deluded the Christians hope: who although the wind had failed them, yet in hope the enemy would abide them battell, with much labour and rowing came fo neer him, that the great shot began to fly too and fro on both sides : but when the matter should have come to have bin tried by dint of sword, then it plainly appeared what the enemy The Turk! self. had indeed purpose: for still keeping the prowes of his gallies upon the Christians, he by let. I tle and little (hrunk back, and befide that the shadow of the night began then to approch he caused all his great Ordnance, charged only with pouder, to be shot off, and so in the thick of the smoake retired unseen; colouring his subtill departure also, by certain lights lest in their cock-boats, making shew as if the whole fleet had still there staid. By this means the Turks with great celerity escaped, being also holpen in this, that the Christians hindred up the heauinesse of the galeasses, could not but faire and softly pursue them: for these galeasses, as they are veffels of great feruice, to are they also heavy and vnweldy, and not fit for chace. The departure of the enemy at length known, the Christians also vnwilling to fight by night, returned to Cerigo. Two daies after, the Turks stayd in the bay of Tenarus (now called Metapan) & the Christians at Cerigo; contented in that, that the enemy was the cause that the battell was not fought, and reckoning his weary and couert declining of battell, as a fecret confession of the victory. The third day after, the Christians desirous of nothing more than to love in battell with the enemy, in their former order fet forward from Cerigo, and failing all the night, were in the break of the day descried from land by the Turks: whereupon Plazales by shooting off of certain warning pieces commanded all his men to go abourd, and to put themselues in readines for battell. And now the Christians were not far off, when as the Turks (lest declining of battel, might reproue them of scare) came out of the hauen, with their sleet divided into three battels: whereof the left wing was extended a great way into the sea, the right wing still keeping neer vnto the maine, and in the middle battell was Vluzales himselfe: who came all on no faster than the tide draue them, staying their course of times of purpose, L to have drawne the gallies of the Christians from the galleasses and ships. Vluzales seeing his fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the galliasses, commanded both the wings of his fleet (having in each of them four core gallies) to fetch a great compasse about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, aloofe off from the galleasses, and so to assaile the wings of the Christians on the sides or behind: in hope so to have disordered their battell, and without danger to have drawne the gallies from the galleasses and the other heavy ships. Which their intent the Christians perceiuing, in their wings turned about their gallies also, in manner of the new Moone, their maine battel still facing the middle battell of the Turks. The wings of the Turks fleet thus farre separated from the middle battell, seemed to present vnto the Christians a great advantage: which Fuscarinus (intentine to all the offers of good fortune) quickly perceiving, and calling vnto Columnius and Lilly, and shewing them the enemies main battell at hand, and the wings gone a great way off, requested and persuaded them, That not staying for the heavy Ships and Galleasses, they would with him vpon the sudden assaile the enemies middle battell now destitute of the wings : not doubting but so to overthrow

A the enemies greatest strength there, before the wings could, now they were so far gone, iowne themselves to the battell again. What could (as he said) have hapned more wishedly, than to have their battell divided. So that they might at more advantage fight against every pare therof, now separted, than against all three parts at once. If they had thought themselves not only equall, but too strong for the whole enemies fleet, should they not the better ouercome them apart and dispersed. The opportunity, as he said, was but short, and therefore to be forthwith resolued upon. If they would take the present occasion of victory then offred, and as refolute men charge their enemies, little fearing any fuch thing, they should by their celerity and valor, teach the Turks what the Christian discipline of war and power was able to do but if they would therein vie delay, they should ere long in vain wish for the like occasion they B had let flip, when as their battell was again ftrengthned with the wings. This the Admirals speech was of most that heard it joyfully received, and his counsell well liked; and that with fuch a generall cheerfulnesse of the souldiers, as shewed in them no want of courage to have given the enemy present battell. But Columnius and Lilly being of the same mind they had bir alwaies, said it were dangerous so to do, for fear of drawing the whole three battels of the enemy at once voon them, against which they should be too weak, without the help of the galeasfes and heavy thips: and therfore faid flatly, That without those wessels so much feared of their enemies, they would in no case hazard the fortune of a battel. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion for that they so thought, or were so charged by Don John (of whom they altogether depended) not to fight in his absence, many doubted. The wings of the Christians C in turning about to confront the enemies wings, were a little difordred: which the Turks perceiuing, and taking the present opportunity, with 15 of their gallies were about to have charged the stragling gallies: which Superantius perceiuing, to stay their course, went out couragioully against them with foure gallies, and made with them a great fight; in the heat whereof. Superantius feeing forty more of the enemies gallies comming towards him, and doubting to be inclosed, with all speed sent for relief, which came presently in namely twenty gallies, with two of the galeaffes: which forthwith fent their thundring that for thick and furiously among their enemies, that in a little time eighteen of their gallies were by them al rent and torn; and the Turks therwith difmaied, were glad in such hast to returne, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius having at that fight but one of his gallies that through, returned again to D his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would have bin the event of the whole bartell, if the opinion of Fuscarinas had prevailed. Both the fleets falling again into their order. although the Christians could not fo fast follow, as the Turks went before them , yet came they so neer them, that oftentimes they changed bullets, as well with their small shot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many figns gathered, that neither the Turks would abide present battell, neither the Christians longer delay, if by their enemies they somight. The Christians had agreed (as is before said) not to joyn in battel without their galleasses and tal ships: which Pluzales wel understood, both by the fugitiues and his own espials, as also by their maner of failing. And he himselfe, although he had no great desire to fight, yet to be the better able to frustrat the endeuors of the Christians (who with great labour drew with them the E galeasses and other heavy ships) sent his chargable great ships to Maluassa, there to be vorigged, wherby he discharged himself of a great burthen, & made himself able at his own choice and pleasure to leave or take to fight or not and also with such soldiers and other necessaries as were in the same great ships, supplied the wants of his whole fleet. By which policy the matter was brought to that palle, that if the Christians would needs draw the enemy to battel, they must of necessity for sake their galeasses, their most affured strength or if they would not leave them, then they could not by any means inforce the ready enemy to fight. The day now declining, the enemy supposing himself to have done enough for that time, both for the abating of the heart of the Christians, and encouraging his owne people, in seemly order, as The Turks But one not afraid, failed with his fleet to Corona. The Christians in like manner retiring them- arcorona, and selues to Cerigo.

Whilst things thus went, Don John by a frigot sent of purpose, gaue knowledge to the fleet, at Certico. that he was come to Corcyra, harply blaming the great commanders for their departure, and deth word to that they stayd not for his comming: and further commanded them as their Generall, all bimat Zasya. Other things fet apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to refolue of all matters. 16ml.

Columnius wholly devoted to the Spaniards, and preferring the favour of Don Iohn before the G rest. hearing his message, was in such hast to have returned, that he would have persuaded Full carinus to haue left the heavy vessels and other weak gallies at Cerigo; and with a hundred of the best gallies with all speed to have returned to the Generall. Of which opinion was also Lilly: but Fuscarinus more careful than the rest, as he whom the danger more concerned, would not yeeld to that persuasion: for that in so doing, they should (as he said) leave the ships and galleasses, the chiefe part of their strength, in danger to be spoiled by the enemy; whom they now kept at a bay without the help of their general; and should, as he wel hoped, by often pronow acpt at a bay which are on other draw him to battell, and have over him a notable victory. And therefore requested them for the loue of God, and the zeale they bare vnto the common good of all Christendome, not to depart farther off, nor to fuffer the enemy to escape out of tr their hands, neither by their departure to leave the Islands of the Venetians subject to the fury of the enemy: whereas the Generall might at his pleasure and without danger come vnto them, they lying betwixt the enemy and him. But Columnius and Lilly resolutely set down han what hap should, to do what Don John had commanded, would not listen to the reasonable perfuafions of the Venetian Admirall, but told him flatly, That if he would not in that they had faid veeld to them, they would forthwith leave him to himself, and with their gallies present. ly return to Zacynthus, as the Generall had commanded. Whilst they were yet thus discour. fing, news was brought, that the enemy was come with his fleer into the fret of Cerigo, which caused them all with one consent to resolue in such order to passe by the enemy, as if they should have given him present battell; wheras before, they were determined by the persuasion I of Fuscarinus to have gon to Crete, and there leaving the ships and galeasses in safety to have afterwards returned to the General. In such order the Christians passed by the enemies fleer. which lay still in the fret of the sea without mouing, standing as it were rather vpon the guard of themselves, than resolved for battell. In three days failing they came to Zacynthus, where they found not Don John, but two of his gallies, & commandment, that they should there leave Don Ishn few their heavy (hips, and with their gallies come to Cephalenia, where they should not faile to meet him. Hereupon the Venetians were exceedingly grieued, and muttered through the leads, where he whole fleet. That the Spaniards bearing themselues you their wealth, were too proud, and in comparison of themselves, regarded neither the conditions of the league, neither any other mans credit, but troad all men under foot; & would now vie the Venetians not as their friends and confederats, but as their flaues and vaffals, feeding them in the mean time but with vaine hope. Yet for a fmuch as the time and necessity for required, they were content to be overruled: and so leaving the ships and galeasses at Zacynthus, went with the rest of the sleet to Cepha-Don John com - lenia: whither Don John was not yet come, and fent word thither, That if they had any defire to ioin their forces with his they should yet come further back vnto him to Corcyra. This meffage (which they had rather feared than expected) much troubled the Venetians, who readier to suspect every mischiese, than to hope for any good, began to fret and complain, That the Spaniards could very wel tel the Venetians what they had to do, and forgot in the mean time, what was on their own part to be performed. A hard thing it was to fay, and yet to be faid, that now they had more to do with those their dallying friends and confederats, than with their e- L' nemies: for with their enemies they were to fight but in time of battell, but with them they were to wrestle at all times and in all places. They were by them (as they said) drawn from the fight of their enemies, when as they might have bin overthrowne: not to the intent that with their vnited forces they might more fafely fight against them, or vnder the conduct of Don John gain the victory; but rather lest any thing should have bin don which might be to the honor or profit of the Venetians: and that time which was to have bin bestowed in the managing of the war, spent in lingring and delaying, and vain going forward & backward to no purpose. One only way there was (as they faid) to have difpatched with the Turke, which was by ouercomming him in another notable battel, & so to have vtterly broken his strength at seawhich course the consederats made no lesse difficult by their ofwardnes and delaies, than the enemy M by declining of battell: That they had long ago by many fecret figures probably coniectured, that the Spaniards had more care to hinder & croffe other mens doings, than to do any thing of themselves: That their endeauors were to frustrate those great hopes which promised we to the Christian commonweale the greatest felicity and happines, together with immortall

A glory; and, That the Turks of late discouraged with the fortunat proceedings of the Christians, might again reioice at their milhans.

The Venerians, notwithstanding all these their murmuring speeches, loth to sall off from the Spaniard, kept still on with the rest until they came to Don John at Corcyta, who then lay The Christian with 53 gallies, and 18 (hips at Spilea, in the vtmostend of the Island. At their first meeting. See Alexandre Don John shewed himself not a little offended, that they had not with more duty before atten- tele forward ded his comming : and they againe not a little complained of his long stay, with many other againtowards their grieuances, which were tedious here to rehearfe. The fleet now all with much ado at the enemy. length met together, which confisted of two hundred gallies, nine galeasses, and thirty fix tall thios: it was by generall confent agreed, That they should again set forward toward the Enemy. They were not yet under faile, when two of their espials brought them news, that the enemies fleet (weakly furnished both of mariners and fouldiers) was come to Nauarinum: which filled them all with good hope, that the Turks fleet fo euill prouided, might in that place yoon the sudden be easily oppressed, and the rather, if they came vpon them vnexpected. Wherfore because they would not be descried, they kept not their course on right forth, but fayling by night, kept aloof vpon the right hand: & having passed Zacynthus, came with great silence unto the Strophades, where they lay at anchor all that day. In the euening they loofed thence, fo casting their course, that the more to terrific the enemy, they might before day fall voon him, and be feen in the mouth of the hauen where he lay, before there could be any report made of their comming thither. But this course so well set, the time was so cuill cast, that it C was fair day long before they could come to the appointed place; when the Turks out of their watch towers discouered afar off the comming of the Christian fleet, gaue warning therof vnto their fellows: wherupon an alarm was presently raised in the towne, and all men in armes ran headlong to the wals and to the hauen. But the Turks out of hope with their enill rigged fleet to be able to with sand the Christians, and not daring to trust to that weak harbour, they all now in a great hurly burly ran confusedly hand ouer head, soldiers and mariners, aboord: and whilft they had yet time, got them in haft out of that harbour, and as men chafed by their enemies, got them into fafe harbour at Modon, a frong town of Peloponefus, about fix miles off. Columnius was sent before the rest of the fleet to have pursued them but they were got so far before him, that they had recoursed the harbor before he could ouestake any of them. The the chiftians D Christian fleet comming before the harbour, and leaving a space as it were of purpose for the offer the Turke enemy to come out into, there lay in the face of the town, daring the Turks battell. But when they had so lien almost all that day, and no man durst come out; and now towards the evening certain signes of tempest appeared, the Christians searing to be by force of weather driven on ground, put farther off again to fea. Then at length Vluzales fent out certain light gallies to follow in the taile of the fleet, when the Confederats suddenly staying their course, and turning their prowes vpon them, draue them headlong again into the harbour: and afterwards retyred themselues with the whole fleet into the Island's Oenusa, now called Sapientia, right opposit against Modon. The next day wanting fresh water, they removed to the bay of Mesfana, there to water in the mouth of the river Pamisus, which there falleth into the sea : where in paffing by Corone, they were oftentimes shot at out of the town; and landing their men to water, were encountred by certain troups of horfmen, fent for that purpose by Vluzales. There

Methone or Modon (for it is by both names known) standeth almost in an Island stretching The description far into the fea, where toward the West runneth out a long point of the land a great way into Medon. the fea; in the vetermost part whereof standeth a great round tower. The towne it selfe, is on the one side inclosed with the sea, and toward the land so strongly fortified, as that it seemeth almost impregnable: Towards the South commeth in a faire bay about three miles wide, safe from all winds except the Northerly wind only; and flut up by a little Island in the mouth of the bay, maketh a safe & quiet harbor, with two entrances therinto on either side of the Island, Within this bay lay the Turks fleet, with the sterns of their gallies toward the land, and their prows toward the sea. At the Southerly comming in of the bay standeth an hil, which the inhabitants call Albus:on the top whereof, the enemy had placed fix great pieces of Ordnance, was water deerely bought with the lives of many there flain on both fides : in the end, the Christians prevailing, watered, and so returned againe to the Oenusa from whence they

wherwith to keep the Christians from entring that way. So had they also vpon that point of G the main, which (as we faid) runneth out from the town, and vpon S. Bernards rock, planted on ther great pieces of Ordnance to defend that passage also. The Christians comming unto the mouth of the bay, there lay with their fleet divided into foure parts, but yet doubtful what to do: for beside that the entrances of the bay were but narrow, they were also far more dangerous to be entred, by reason of the great Ordnance planted upon them. Neuertheles, the Venetian Admirali in hope of good successe, and loth to let the fearfull enemy so to escape our of their hands, would fain have perfuaded the General with his whole fleet to have entred the bay, and there in the harbor to have oppressed the enemy; which he shewed to be no matter to do for that the enemy was too weak in strength, and could not be from land relieued. In which doing they should indeed ouerthrow but one fleet; but in the ouerthrowing of that one, cut H. in funder all the finews of the Turkish Empire by seasand raising a tumult in the bay, and file ling all with a generall feare, should vindoubtedly at the first onfer put the enemy to flight. Which don, what should let, but that carrying about with them the terror of the victory, they should with their victorious fleet, take from the Turke all the Islands of the Ageum? The truly and wifely it was faid of Themistocles, That who foeuer had the command of the sea must needs also prevaile in the rest, and at length carry away the victory by land also, It was fashe faid) the part of good chieftains, not to be wanting vnto themselues when occasion was offe. red : besides that, they were the same Turks, whom they had but the yeare before vanquished. and what had that one yere either taken from them, or given vnto the Turks ? or what should they feare fix pieces of Ordnance mounted upon a hill, who if they should undertake the battell, were not to fear the great store of Ordnance in 260 of the enemies gallies and galliors > I my felf (faid he) will be the guid and leader, in what soeuer shall seem most di fficult and dan. gerous; and will in person my selfe be the first that shall enter the harbour, and adventure the first danger. Great victories (he said) were not to be gained but with great aduentures. & that therfore the matter were to be hasted, before more aid should be sent vnto the Turks. Wherefore they should as resolute men attempt that, the Turks thought the Christians durst not to have attempted; and with the same courage brake into the bay, wherewith they had but the yere before broken the strength of the same enemy; and by the power of God carry away another notable triumph of the vanquished Turks:who ouercome in a second battell at sea, must Don't to be referenced and a state of the Spaniards was the g Venetian Admirall heard: and Don Iohn the Generall, deeming both the time and place vnfit for the attempting of fo great an exploit; rehearfed on the one fide, the strength of the enemy, the disaduantage of the place, the difficulty of the bastell, with the manifold and great calamities received by the overhalty & rash atempt of their enemies: That the enemies strength was not to be so much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reason; and that many inseeking to increase their former glory, had in so doing ouerthrown the same: That the Christians in entring and aduenturing the harbor, should on the one side be beaten with the Artillery from the hilland on theother, with the artillery out of the castle of Modon: and that it was not like that Vinzales should if need require, lack aid from land : who but the other day had fent great troups of horsmen to have kept the Christians from watring: that a matter of so great importance was (by Fuscarinus his leave) not rashly to be take n in hand, vpon an heat and hautinesse of stomack, but vpon grave and mature deliberation: for if they should in a place of so great disaduantage, hazard the fortune of a generall battell, it should seem that either he knew not that kind of fight and force of the enemy, or els would make the bay of Modon more famous by the ouerthrow of the Christians, than was the Curzulari by the slaughter of the Turks. Then what a shame would it be, if they which were about to oppres the enemies fleet, should themselves be overthrown, and that in their own device. He had rather (as he said) preserve his own fleet, than to take 600 of the enemies gallies, and to acount the same for a greater honor. Which he determined not, for that he would not have any thing don; but that vnripe occasions should not be too much hastned, and as it were thrust headlong forward:wheras time M would give opportunity for the overthrow of the Turks fleet, fo that they ran not blindly on headlong: 82 that in future time the Venetians would rejoice that they had so moderated their defires. The Christians (he said) had sufficiently prevailed, if those things should fall out wes which were warily and aduifedly confidered and resoluted vpon.

The matter thus on both fides debated, and nothing don, they returned with the fleet in: the port of Nauarinum. This proceeding, as it diverfly moved the Spaniards and the Venetians, to brought it forth divers speeches, every man speaking in favour of his own nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, That he had most wisely resolued, for that how deer the counsell of the Venetian Admirall would have cost if it had bin followed, the thing it self (as he said) shewed, by the extreme danger therof presented, not in the doubtfull opinion of men, but laid open before their eies. The Venetian on the other fide more defirous of battell, the negret they had feen the opportunity to have prevailed upon the enemy, the more impatiently they endured fo affured a victory, to have bin let flip out of their hands; and thereof foake accor-

The Christians lying at Nauarinum, confulted of many things what they were best to take The Callest fage into the bay, and defended the Turkish fleet; they returned again thither, & landed 7000 chissians. of their best soldiers, to besiege the castle. And at the same time, appointed the galeasses with certain gallies to batter it also from the sea: which the more commodiously to do, they joined two of their greatest gallies together side to side, which they made fast with masts and strong ropes and so bourded them clean ouer, wheron as on a platform, they placed gabions al affront; filled with earth, and great Ordnance betwixt to have battered the Castle. But when this Engine(in maner of a floating fort) should have performed the setuice for which it was deuised. it proued unferuiceable, after it had with much ado bin brought thither, being ready to finke with the weight of the great Ordnance and other things wherwith it was overcharged. For which cause, and for that they understood a great number of horsemen to be come into the town they gave over the fiege vainly begun, and put again with their fleet to fea. It fortuned at the same time, that a tall ship of Venice departing from Zacynthus, and comming alongst the coast of Peloponesus, with provision for the fleet, was descried by the enemy; who thinking to do the Christians a great dishonor, if they could almost in the fight of their fleet furprise her, they sent out certain light gallies to have taken her, Vlazales in the mean time with the rest of his fleet, lying in the very mouth of the bay, ready to come out if the Christian fleet should once stir to relieve her. Which the Christians perceiving, and wel hoping that so the enemy would be drawn to battell, fent out Columnia with his gallies to refcue the thip; and o-

D thersalfo which lying aloof, might get in betwixt the Turks gallies & the bay; Don lohn and the Venetian Admirall lying ready to have given battell, if Vluzales should have come forth: but the Christians comming on with a small gale, the enemy being afraid, by shooting off of certain warning pieces within the bay, in time called back the gallies that were already gone out of the bay:who all forthwith came in excepting Mohomet the nephew of Barbaruffa, a most famous captain amongst the Turks, who as one of great courage, and defirous of honour, staid a little without the bay, with greater courage than discretion, expeding who should affaile him. Him the Marques S. Crucis fet vpon, and had with him a great and terrible fight : but in the end the Marques prevailing, flew Mahomet with all his Turks, and with honor caried away Mahomet flain the gally. So the dishonor which Vluzales would have don the Christians, fell upon himselfe.

having in his own fight lost one of his best captains with his gally. The next day because the yeare should not passe without somehing don, nor the hope of so great a preparation come to nothing, the Christians determined to be fiege the Castle of Nauarinum (which was in antient time called Pylus) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the native place of old Neffer. The City of Navarinum standeth upon a rising ground. Aretching formwhat into the featwherinto it hath a large prospe a, and a faire large hauen, but fubie to the North wind. It is defended with a point of the main, running compaffe into the fea, whereon standeth an old Castle. The Prince of ploit, was committed to Alexander Farnessus Prince of Parma, whom the Venetians furnished besires to have besired by the leading with a gentlement of Parma is vain with munition and victual. He landing with 2000 Italians, a thousand Spaniards, and 500 warinum. Germans, began with twelve great pieces to batter the castle, And albeit that the battery was planted fo far off, as that it did the enemy no great harme; yet haply the enterprise had taken effect, if by taking the streight and troublesome passages through a rough and thick

enemy cunningly opposed policy against force; for falying out of the city they gaue the Chri- A friens an hot skirmith. And in the mean time whilft the Christians were so busied, by a pore toward the forrest on the other side of the City received in great number both of horse and foot. The report of this new come aid caused the Prince to raise his siege, and to go again a boord. And now rested all the hope of gaining the town in the strength of the fleet, and than not small, for that the Turks not relieued with victuals by land, were now by the confederate kept from them also by seas for at that time the Turkes were troubled with two great mis. chiefs the famin and the plague. For no provision had there bin made, as in a thing never fee red, and that little being spent that was in the Towne, they were inforced to feek for victuals farther off:which comming but sparingly, as in time of dearth, was oftentimes by the way in tercepted by the fouldiers which lay about in the country villages, wanting victuals no leffe H than they in the city. And the more men the Beglerbeg of Greece brought down for defence of the sea towns, so much the more the wants of all things daily increased. So that no man doubted but that in short time all would be brought to extream penury. What a dearth the mortalitie had made, the want of men in gallies wel declared : for many of the gallies for lack The weather of Of mariners and foldiers were fent away into Euboea, or left at Malualia, or carried away to the Turk feet. Constantinople. Those which staid in the bay of Modon were scarse an hundred gallier and forty galliots, and they fo flenderly manned, that the greatest gallies had not about a hundred and twenty men in them, and they so megre and faint, as that they could scarsly hold up their weapons. The Christians understanding of these things, were in good hope, that by continuing the fiege, they should without danger gain a notable victory. For which cause Fuscaring 1 persuaded the Spaniards (of whose constancy he doubted) to hold it out as men of resolution. Shewing them, That in the event of this action reflect for them for ever to be feared or contemmed of the Turks: who except they should be changed into fishes or into birds, could not (as he faid) without a notable ouerthrow escape their hands out of the Bay. But vnto this his hope and counsel the event was not correspondent: for the Spaniards, whether it were for the tediousnes of the siege, or for want of victuals, or for the approch of winter, or els moued with fome other reasons, began to think of the matter diversly: and at the first a report was raised. That the Christians giving over the siege, would shortly return home; and the reason was, for that they wanted bisket, and had scarsly victuals lest for fifteen daies, which was to be referued for their long journy home. Besides that, the approach of Winter did call them from the K action; and that having don what they might, they could never draw the enemy forth to battell. And therfore having fufficiently, and as far as was possible, already discharged their duties, they were now also to regard their safety, and to foresee, that their fleet, wherein the wellfare of them all was reposed, were not too far indangered. At the first these speeches were divulged by the common fouldiers and mariners of small credit or reputation; but asterward by more, and they also men of better place and fort. 'Yea Don John himselse, whether it were to some other purpose, or that he so spake in good earnest, began to lay the fault vpon others, why he, so lately come from Messana, should in so short time want victuals and all things els necessary.

The Venezians gainft the Spa-

With these vnexpected reports, and so far different from the Confederation, the Venetian I Admiral with the rest of the Venetian Commanders were exceedingly troubled, and griented aboue measure: for it seemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the most fertile and plentifull cuuntry of Sicilia, in all ages the most fruitfull and abundant granary and store house of Italy, both in peace and war, could so soon want victuals. Could eighteen tall ships, which ought by the capitulations of the league to have come loded with bisket, victuals, and other warlike and necessary provision, be come empty a or but to become brought so much as might suffice but for a moneth only? If this were don without the know. ledge of Don tohn, where was then the care of a Generall? If he winked thereat, where was his zeal to the confederation, or to what purpose came he to Corcyra? Was it to meer the Chile ftian fleet (having once or twice met with the enemy) from doing any good woon him? Could M it come into any mans head (besides that in so doing he was therin to excinguish the glory of a most certain victory, like to work the Turks confusion) by the infamy of a voluntary remains to increase the glory and renown of his enemy, and to bring a perpetual ignominy & disgrace vntothe honour of the Christians ? Verily the Spaniards therein not to thew themselses &

A willing to have the power of the Turk's abated, as the strength of the Venetians not increased. Thefe things Pafearines and the Venerians formtimes fretted at among fe themselves i and The Postion otherwhiles the Admirall himfelfe expostulated the same with Don John and Columnia Pand Admirall prein the presence of the greatest counsellors shewed, not only how profitable, but also how ne spaniard in we cessary perseuctance was in all martiall affairs: That it was an old and visuall matter for mere safe to return in besieging of their enemies, to suffer many difficulties : if they should, having performed from the enemy nothing, return with the fleet, who would doubt burthatboth their labour and charge was at gain the next yeare to be renewed? And what could this delay be elfe, but a propagation of their further calamities. That therfore it much concerned the Christian Commonweale although they had not all things in abundance, yet refolutely and with patience to endure the B fearfity of victuals. If want of bisket were feared, the Generall might cafily remedy that marter. by speedily sending for those ships which lay laded with victuals good store at Tarentum: which thing might in short time be performed. In the mean time he promised to supply the Spanjards waters with part of his own flore : and that he had rather his men should line with roots, than to let the enemies fleet coupt vp, so to escape his hands: That the defire to protect the honour of the Christians, would overcome all difficulties. Besides that, the matter would he but short, if it were done at once, in one continued course; and would undoubtedly be by them performed, if they gaue not ouer the thing they had so well begun, till they had accomplished it. They(as he said) might in good safety lie with their fleet in the ports of Nauarinum, Sapientia, and Capraria: wheras the enemy, lying thut up in the bay of Modon, thould C have but a bad and dangerous Winter harbor; and October being now begun, should in shore time be in danger to perish with blushring storms and rage of the fea, familiar vnto that time of the yeare, or els inforced with the extremity of the weather, and with want, to aduenture into the open fea, and with their weak forces to join battell. What should therfore let, why they should not for 10 or for 15 daies continue the siege, as best beseemed the honor of themselves. the valour of their fouldiers, and worthines of the Christian name ? What a terrour it would be unto the enemy, to fee the Christians ready to endure all extremities and wants, to gaine the victory ouer the Turks? Again, what dishonour and discredit would be vnto themselves. if they should suffer the enemy (shut up and not daring to fight) to escape: especially, when as they might fitting still, end the war? The Senat of Venice, he faid, most rested upon the valor I) and courage of Don Iohn, and therefore he requested him not to deceive the great hope they had of him conceived: for how much should he himselfe blemish his own honour, if when he had before relieued the afflicted state of the commonweale, he should now, when it was most of all to be holpen, for sake the same ? Which should not be much valike, as if a man should with great labour purchase great store of pretious pearles, and vpon an humorous passion cast them all into the fea: That men generally held a great opinion of him the General, an honorable remembrance of his victory, and regard of his valour; all which, how much the more pregnant and honorable (hould they be, by the second vanquishing and subduing the most mighty monarch of the world : and that if the action well begun, should be effectually profecuted by the goodnes of God, the direction of the Commanders, and the resolution of the souldiers, in short time the Christians should carry the victory from the Turks, and make him their general equal not only with the great chieftains of the present time, but even with the most famous commanders of all former ages. Wherunto Don lohn replied, That the action then in hand no Don lohn replied, That the action then in hand no Don lohn replied, leffe concerned the Spaniards than the Venetians: and that he had in his life defired nothing the woon the more, than to stand the Christian Commonweale in stead: That he pointed at the same mark mirallo with Fuscarinus, and in zeale to do good to the Christian commonweale, gaue place to no mane but indeed to perform it, was a thing much more difficult than to fay it: leffer things (he faid) were to be ouerpaffed, to referue themselves for the performance of greater and therfore maruelled that Fullarinus alone could not fee things most manifest before his cies, who otherwife could with his piercing wit fee through the deepest matters : could he think by any cother means to abate the power of the Turkithan if they kept their fleet whole; that it was cuter the maner of the greatest & worthiest commanders, rather to shun present dangers, than to increase their territories: that nothing was so wel purposed, which might not be of some wrongfully suspected: but his faithful meaning to be pure & without spot; and albeit that the opportunity served not for him to shew it, yet was his defire & endeuor nothing lesseand that Fufe-

rines, should do well more intentinely to consider, what the cause, the matter and the time te. G quired: That the maner of war at land and at leaswere much different; and that although wars of both forts were to give place to the most vnscasonable time of the years, white totany kind of war, yet might men at land, better endurothe winter florms in their tents and cabbins than at (ea in their gallies, where oftentimes will skil wildome, nor valor help not but that (except it be so provided and foreseep, that the seasonable time of the yere, and commodious for say. ling, may be taken) al must sogether perish by shipwrack. What, would be haugthen to stime about their power with the winter ftorms, and famin, the greatest extremity of nature; Belides that he was verily perfusded, that the Turks injoying the commodities of a good harbor and of a rich city, would there in fafety winter, the country of Peloponesus relieuing them with al necessaries: when at the Christians in the meane time, except they in time returned home, H should lie exposed to the rage of the sea, standing as it were in a continual watch, not laying away their weapons in the depth of Winter and dead time of the yese, which in reason ought to give rest to all men. And that therefore every man ought for the present to bear his own grieuances, and not by the harms of his friends or confederats, to feek his owne smalle. And that he, bearing himselfe woon the inward integrity of his good will toward the Venetiane. would this fay, how focuer Fulcarinus should understand it, That if the Kings fleet should be long flaying, there perish, it would no lesse concern the Venetians, than the king himselfaund taking God towineffe, would folemnly promife, Nothing to be vnto him more leifer or religious, than to be preft fo foon as the time of years would give leave, and by his endeauour to make al men know, that he had no leffe care of the Venetian state, than of the kings affairs neither defired any thing more, than to be accounted, & indeed to be a most constant pholder of that most Christian league, and that beyond al expectation, even in the judgement of the Venetians themselves:but for the present they must pardon him, if he gave place vnto the needfity of the time:as for the offer of the communicating of their vi@uals, that would not be any help, but the destruction of both the fleets ; for so they should both sooner feele the want: wherefore it were much better to preserve the fleet, which they might vie in the next yeares wars, than wilfully to cast away the same by famine, and the rage of the sea. In briefe, what an indignity should the Christians sustain, if they themselves should by the same meanes beauerthrown, whereby they had thought to have ouerthrown others.

Now the Spaniards were so resolutely set down for their departure, that not only without K about to return the consent of the Venetians, but even without their privity, their departure was resolved on, and fecret command given to the masters of the gallies, with all the hast that might be, to dethe Ventilans, part thence to Messana. Which the Venetian Admiral understanding, and therwith troubled as with an vnexpected matter, came aboord the general, & greatly complained of his purpole for fo sudden a departure requesting him a while to stay, until the two gallies made falt together in the harborof Nauarium (as is before faid) with the Ordnance voon them might be put in good fafety, and neither they, or any thing els left for a prey to the enemy. With muchado, Fuscarinus persuaded him no stay that night, that those gallies might be brought out of the harbor, and all things put in order for their departure. The rest of the night was spant in debating of the matter too and fro : where Don John would needs have it conceived into a pub- L like instrument in writing. That the fleet by the generall consent of the three Admirals returned for lack of victuals; wherunto the Venetian Admirall hardly consented But when the instrument should have bin made and confirmed, Don John better adulfed by one of his Secretaries, That the same would redound vnto the great dishonour both of the King and himselfe, that the fleet comming out of the fruitfull country of Sicilia, should in a months spacewant victuals, changed his mind for the writing, and only requested the Venetian Admirallancedit him and Columnius, in that they had faid concerning the want of victuals : promising him, that if voon the way he should meet with the victuals that were sent, for, he would forthwith return& giue him aid, as the time and occurrents should require but in the mean time to proceed by common confent, to do that which was most needfull. Hereupon they returned and M comming to Corcyra, they met the expected ship laded with victuals. Now is not Falcation varnindfall of his duty, but comming to Don Iohn, put him in remembrance of his promiles That it was not vnlike, but that the enemy fo foon as he waderfrood of their dela come out of the bay, and returne with his fleet towards Conferminople sale

A being but weake manned, and worse furnished of mariners, might easily be ouertaken upon the way and ouerthrowne. But Den Iehn was not by any meanes to be thereunto perfuaded: pretending, that he was by the King commanded forthwith to return, So the expectation of great matters to have bin this yeare done, came to nought, but vanished into smoake: and nothing performed worth fo long a discourse, more than to see with what difficulty great actions are managed, wherein the hands of many great ones are required; who jealous of their own honor. or enuying at others, corrupt with delaies the fairest opportunities, and by their crosse dealing, no lesse than the enemy, hinder the common good, whereat they would all fainest feeme to sime. From Corcyra Don John departed to Messana, and Columnia vnto Rome. Fuscarinus with greater honour than successe returned to Venice, where he was with great joy received. B both of the Senat and the citisens in generall : and so (no lesse famous for his patience and moderation towards the other confederats, than for his policy and valor) with the good liking of all men gaue vp his charge, in few yeares after to receive a greater.

About this time, Amida King of Tunes (of whom much is before spoken in the life of Soly. Amyda the eximan) being but a little before driven out of his kingdome by the Turks (who had of long by lid King of Tulittle and little increached upon him) and as a privat man lived in exile with his swo fons at of Don Iohn. Guletta with Franciscus Tonares, Gouernour thereof; hearing of the great overthrew of the Turks at Lepanto, and of the good successe of the Christians, sent Embassadours to Don Iohn Generall of the confederat princes, then lying in Sicilia, humbly requesting his aid for the recourry of the kingdome; promising to defray the whole charges of the war, and for ever to C hold his kingdome of the King of Spaine, as his vaffall and tributary. Which his request well considered of, and the matter thought of no small consequence for the safety of the Christian countries lying over against that part of Affricke, to have so dangerous an enemy removed s Den John the yere following (in the beginning of October) by the commandement of the king of Spaine his brother, departing from Drepanum in Sicilia, with an hundred and five gallies and forty thips, arrived the next day about noone at Guletta, where the gallies of Malta came vnto him, and thorrly after John Andreas Auria the Admirall with nineteen more, and Columnim the Popes Admirall with foureteene moe, all well appointed. At his arrivall at Guletti, he understood by Amida and the Gouernour, the whole estate both of the city and of the kingdome of Tunes: and that the Turks and Moores, terrified with fo greet a fleet, were about to D fortake the city. Wherefore having well viewed the place, he the next day after landed his forces about foure miles from the city, and sent two thousand fine hundred footmen before the rest of the army to the city; who found it all desolate, the Turks and Moores being before for feare fled, some to Carauana, some to Biserta: who entring without resistance came to the cassle, wherein they found two hundred Moores, who said they kept it for Amida their King; but yet would by no means suffer the Christians to enter. All which was forthwith made knowne to Don John, who then because it was almost night, would not mooue, but early the next morning fet forward with his whole army; and entring the city, before abandoned by the inhabitants, and so comming to the castle, found nothing therein but great store of oyle, but-

Amida the late King by the commandement of Don John all this while stayd at Guletta. But whilest Don Iohn was yet at Tunes, newes was brought vnto him the 13 of October, That the Turks garrison before fled out of Tunes, with divers Moores, comming to Biserta, were there kept out by the citisens, and not suffered to enter: for which cause they began to burne and spoile the country thereabout. Whereupon the Generall sent Touares the Captain of Guletta thither with part of the army, who encountring with those Turks ouerthrew them, and had the city by the citisens peaceably deliuered vnto him.

There was before departed out of Tunes forty thousand Moores, who now came and offer red their supplication to Don lohn, that they might again returne and line with their new king. which their request being easily granted, they in great numbers every day returned into the city. Shortly after, fifteene hundred Turks, with 3000 of those wilde people which some call Arabians, some Alarbes, sore troubled all the passages about the city who were at last by the Christians whom they had taken prisoners rescued. After that, Don John by the advice of his most expert and skilfull captaines, comman ded a strong castle to be built in the middle way betwixt Guletta and Tunes: and for the performing therof left Gabriel Serbellio with two thousand Italians; and Calazar a Spaniard with other two thousand at Guletta. And so having performed that he came for, and disposed of all things as he thought best, returned againe into Sicilia.

A griefe of griefs it is, and forrow almost unconsolable, when worthy actions most happil begun, fort not to such happy end as was in reason hoped for. The greatest and most famous via ctory of all ages gained against the Turke, seemed to have lightened a Christian Commonweale, and great hope there was, that the Christians falling into vnity amongst themselves, would by an happy exchange make the Turkish empire the seat of their wars, and to turn into the Turks dominions, the terrour, flaughter, and other calamities of war, which had so many yeres afflicted the Christian commonweale. But by how much the more the joy was amidden fuch daily calamities and teares; so much greater was the forrow so great an hope to be come to nought, and men to be so blinded with the darkenesse of enuy and disdaine, that they could g not fo much as think, with what dishonor and danger of the common state, they should shrink from so just, so honorable, and so needful a service, including in it selfe the generall good of all Christendome. When posterity shall consider what things might then have bin don, and the deuises whereby the common causes were ouerthrowne; it will worthily blame and greatly lament so notable a victory and fit opportunity, sent as it were from heaven for the effecting of The Venetiant greatmatters, to have bin let slip & passed over so lightly regarded. This made, that they who weary of the de-layer and croffe before had reposed all their hope in arms, had now no other confidence or hope of their weldealing of the fare, but in concluding of peace. Truly the Venetians both spoke & thought honorably of king Spaniards, re- Philip, as of a most faithfull, just, deuout, and honorable prince: yet greatly blaming his officers is the Turker and others of great authority about him, as men more regarding their owne private, than the 11 good of the Christian commonweale. In these perplexities of the Venetians, king Philip promised them to set forth a greater and stronger fleet against the next yeare, and to be sooner in readinesse with all his forces and warlike prouision, and so to help them in all he might. Who for all that gaue small credit to those promises, for that with the like they had bin oftentimes before deceived. And therefore as trusting most vnto their owne strength, they with all carefulnesse and expedition entertained moe soldiers; of whom some they put into their sleet, the rest they placed in their garrisons in Creet, in Dalmatia, and their frontier townes in Episus. Neither were the Turks then idle, as the report went; yet were they thought to manage that war with greater fame than ftrength : for they had of purpose given it out, That they would the next Spring with divers armies inuade the Venetian Territories; in Creet, in Dalmatia, M in Epirus, yea, and in Italy it felfe; and with their innumerable multitude both of horse and foot so ouerwhelme the Venetians, that they should not be able possibly to hold out. This and more too they brauely vaunted of: but indeed Pluzales comming to Constantinople, had brought his fleet fo shaken and so weake, as that it seemed not possible but in long time

A. to be againe repaired and furnished with soldiers and mariness, in stead of them that had bin loft forme in fight but moe by the contagiousnesse of the insection. But how socuer the matter flood the Venetians carefull with the expectation of great matters, and in small hope of good fucceffe comparing their own frength with the frength of the enemy : yet were they no leffe discouraged with the delaies and crosse dealing of the confederats, than with all the provision of the enemy. It flucke in their minds, how that the Spaniards at such time as Cyprus might haue bin defended, delaied their comming so long, that Nicosia being lost, it was time to reemmineither could they forget that lingering delay to have bin the cause of the great mortality among it their men dying in the fleet at ladera : They remembred also, that the commodities which of fo notable a victory were most plentifully to have bin reaped, were by the flender profecuting of the same, so sparingly taken, that the former dangers still remained : And that Don John, who ought by appointment to have bin at Corcyra in the beginning of Summer. was scarcely come thither in the latter end of August: And that he in the third yeare of this wat at fuch time as their fleet was with great labor and charge again repaired, would not or li-Red not to adventure to have againe overthrowne the enemies fleet, but in the very action to hauealwaies trifled away the greatest part of Summer, before his Spaniards could set forward and when he might fafely have come to Cerigo, to have called backe Fuscaring and the reflethen facing of the enemy, and even ready to have given him battell: It was then fecretly suffected, the Spaniards to have staied of purpose, and to have dallied on the time, that the Venetians having spent their forces, might be the more exposed and subject to their injuries: It flucke fast not in their minds also, but even almost in their eyes, what things had happened of former times in their confederations with that nation: they were gricued in the space of three veres an hundred times, twenty hundred thou fand duckate to have bin to little or small purpose spent in that war; Besides that they doubted lest the Flemings with their confederate should so intangle the king of Spaine in defending of his owne territories, as that he should not be at leifure to fend any aid into the Baft : in which cafe, what hope or helpe were they to looke for ? How should they then defend the rest of their Seiginory in the East : How should their empty coffers suffice to maintaine so great armies both by sea and land, as might withfland fo puffant an enemy? Long were the discourses, and effectuall the persuasions, that the Venetians had among it themselves, to induce one another, and all in generall, more circum-D spect to consider, not only what had already passed, or was presently in hand; but also more warily to forefee what would be the courfe and what the euent of a matter fo important: and betime to breake off the confederation, which they had alwales found to have flood them in fmall flead. In revoluing of these things, only one remedy seemed most effectuals for the curing of their afflicted State: which was, by defifting from war, to conclude a peace with the Turke, how focuer: which they were the rather in good home to attaine, for that duers foceches concerning the same had passed at Constantinople, and were from thence againe reported at Venice. All men thus inclining to peace, the Senatreferred the proceeding therein vnto M. Antonius Barbarus their Embassador, (who all the time of the sewars had lien in safe cuftody at Constantinople) willing him therein to vie the helpe of the French Embassador, who

R had alwaies beene a perfuader of peace. Selymus having got the Island of Cyprus and divers other places from the Venetians, & yet Selymus blankle well wearied with the harmes and losses he had himselfe received both by sca and land, was also desirous enough of peace. So that the French Embassador might, as it was thought, haue got a reasonable and indifferent peace, if he had but expected the opportunity of time: But he (whether moued with the common harmes, or fome other fecret causes to him best known) in making too much halt, & feeming too defirous of peace, much hurt the common cause of the Venetians which he most desired to have furthered. Selymus having found him, resolved with Muhamer the great Baffa, what he would have done: who at fuch time as the fame Embaffador Muhamer sat. any defire he had thereunto of himfelfe. For certaine daies at the first the Prough Embellidor G was most curreously heard, and the Basile with faite & counting speciels promised that the table ter of pacification should easily & in shore sime be composed and to as their articles and things passed rather in generall termes, than that any condition of peace were particularly at greed vpon : only this was on both parts obnfented wite. At the first intreaty of the peace, the Bassa seemed to put the Vens tian embassador in good hope, that the Venetians according to his request should enjoy their territories in Dalmatia in as ample manner as in former times, and bounded with the fame bounds, wherof they had in the fewars loft fome part about Iadera; But when the matter flegild haue come to the flutting vp, the Turke began to flrinke from that he had before promifed, I refuling not only the restitution of the territory they had indeed by treason got but by caute. lous expositions of his meaning, framing the conclusion of the present peace water the former of their former leagues, required, That as the Turks had now yeelded to them Malualis, and Nauplus, so now they should redeliuer vnto them two other places of like worth and impostance: As for not reftoring the territory they had taken about ladera, to colour their decire they pretended that they might not by their law reftore vnto the Christians any town or place where in were any church or temple dedicated or connected vnto the Maliometan religion, as was there:and further, That the fame territory was already ginen by Selymus in reward vnro his fouldiers, men of defert, from whom without great injury it might not be againe taken, Hereupon the French Embassador complained. That promises were not performed and the Vene- T tians fo fretted, that they were cuen about to have returned as men shamefully deluded, with A practionalist out concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained (the Turks fill flanding vpon fuch hard termes) the Embassadors by the appointment of the Senate concluded a peace with the Turke, whereof these were the chiefe capitulations: first, That the Venetians should give vnto Selymus three hundred thou fand duckats, one hundred to be prefently paied, and the other two hundred by equall portions in two yeres next following then. That the merchants goods should be indifferently on both sides restored and lastly. That such places of the Venetians as the Turke was already possessed of, should still remaine vnto the Turks; but that fuch towns or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turks dominion, should be again forthwith restored. For the first payment of the mony the Turke were earnest, thereby as by a fine L for an offence committed, to make this league vnto him more honourable.

This peace at Constantinople concluded the eleventh day of February in the yeare 1574, The peace pro. was by the decree of the Senat confirmed and afterwards the x2 of Aprill following folemnclaimed at Pe- ly proclaimed at Venice, to the great wonder of the other Confederats. For the better fatilifying of whom, the Popes Nuncio, with the Embassador of Spain, were sent for into the Senat house. And although there were many things that grieved the Venetians, yet did they for beare all hard speeches, and of that their moderation received so much the more honor, as it is more difficulty for an angry man to ouercome him felfe, than others. The duke with calme and temperat speech, framed to the purpose, declared vnto them, That anger and hope, two cuill counfellors, being fet apart, he had concluded a peace with the Turke : not for that he was defined M of the Turks friendship, which what account it was to be made of he right well knew; but for the loue he bare to the State, which was not onely with loffe, but even with death it felse to be maintained. How he had been spoiled of the kingdome of Cyprus, he further declared : and that the Venetian state grew every day weaker and weaker by the continual was

and that therefore, before it were by loffe vpon loffe come to the vttermost of extremity, they not able to maintaine folieatly a war, were to take fome better course for the preservation of that which was yet left of their Seigniory : for that the fafety of the Venerian State should at all ranies be a fure fortreffe und defence of the Christian common-weale against all the furious attempts of the enemy, and vncertaine cuents of time.

The fame of this fudden and vnexpected peace was for the just and common hatred of the Christians against the Turks, generally euil taken; and the Venetians for the concluding therof hardly spoken of, as if they had betraied the whole Christian common weale, or at leastwife their Confederater. For men were for the most part of opinion, that the Turks peace would be but feigned and deceitfull; and that having gained time to fet things in order, accorn ding to his defire, he would for the naturall grudge he bare vnto the Christians, come to his old courfe and as he had alwaics done, breake the league and take up armes. Some faid, That the Venetians for faking of their friends and confederats, would in their owne deuises perish : ver fo, as that their destruction would turne to the generall harme of all Christendome: and these men were of opinion. That in that case, and against that enemy, a dangerous warre was to be preferred before an vncertaine and dishonourable peace. Neuerthelesse the Venetians The peace by exbesides that they for the presenteased themselves of many an heavy burthen, so have they persent found thereby enjoyed the fruits of a long and happy peace, and found the same unto their State the Ventiant. both wholesome and profitable untill this day. It was thought by the sequel of matters. That Selymus was the more willing to have peace with the Venetians, that hee might the better C recover the kingdom of Tunes and the strong castle of Guletta from the Spaniards: who with the knights of Malta now gaped more after Tripolis and the other port townes holden by the Turks upon the coast of Barbary, than how to defend the Venetians their Consederats. Thus with the loffe of Cuprus and some part of the Venetian territory in Dalmatia, ended the mortall and bloudy war betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the course whereof is well to be seene, what great matters the vnited forces of the Christian Princes were able to do against this most mighty enemy, if all discord and contention set apart, they would in the quarrell of the Christian Religion joyne with heart and hand against him, and fight the battell of Christ

Selymus now at peace with them who before most troubled him; to keepe his men of war D bulied, shortly after converted his forces against tohn Vayuod of Valachia, & foat length jovned all that Province to his Empire. This country of Valachia was in antient time called Dacia:it hath on the East the Euxine (now called the blacke sea) on the South the famous river Danubius, on the West Transvluania, and on the North Rassia. It is divided into two parts, the one called Transalpina, & the other Moldauia (of the river Moldavus running thorow the middest thereof) but far passing the other both in greatnesse and abundance of passure. That part called Transalpina, Mahomet, syrnamed the Great (which won Constantinople) made subject to the Turkish empire; but voon Moldauia, the other part he only imposed a yerely tribute of two thousand duckats. After which time the Vayuods of that country, aided sometime by the Hungarians, and sometime by the Polonians, risevp oftentimes against the Turks, and refused

B to do their Homage. It chanced, that Bogdanus Vayuod of that country, fauoring the Poloni. Selymuschaferb ans, and joyning in league with them, lived much in Rassia, as purposing from thence also to Bestdamusus of have taken his wife. Which Selymus suspecting, with a great power chased him into exile, and placet John challed of his countrymen Ivan, and of some Ivania) the supposed Payadanhia state. fon of Stephanus fomtime Vayuod of that country : who with Ieremias Czarnieuieczaus (a Mol. ficad. dauian, who afterward notably betraied him) having of long time lived among ft the Turks, to be the more gratious amongst them, renounced his faith, and being eircumeised, turned Turke; and following the trade of merchandife, became amongst them a merchant of such same, that he became very familiar and well acquainted with the great Bassa's of the Court, and at length with Selymus himselse. He understanding by his friends necreabout the Turkish F Emperor, of his purpose for the remouing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Basfa's, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commended by them, he might be preferred to be Vayued of Moldania: still increasing the suspition Selymus had conceined of Bogdanus. and telling him, That he supported by the Polonians, was like enough in short time to reject his obedience to his Imperial! Majesty. Selymus at the instance of the Bassa's nominated this

In which his fute he spared for no cost, neither ceased by malitious suggestions to increase the suspitional. ready conceined of Iohn the Vayyod: who having rejected the Mahometan Religion, and againe embraced the Christian Baith, would (as he said) in short time, as had Bogdanus; joyne hands with the Polonians, and cast off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whom he had beene so highly promoted. Besides that, this malitious man offered, That his brothes I, Peter for such his preserment, should pay yerely vnto Selymus twice so much moreas did lehn; namely, an hundred and twenty thousand duckats by the name of a tribute.

The Bassa's before corrupted, and moued with the greatnesse of the Tribute, persuaded Selymus, by an Embaffadour to fend for Iohn the Vayuod, to come vnto him himfelfe in perfon. and to command him to give place to such a man as he should fend thither in his stead; which if he should refuse to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. Hereunto Selymus, who had even then much emptied his coffers with the loffe of his fleet in the battell of Lepanto, and the chargeable wars against the Venetians, was easily induced : and to that purpose sent his Embaffador to the Vayuod: who having audience the one and twentieth of February, at the fame time that Henry Valoys (afterward the French King) was crowned at Cracouia, deliuered K his meffage as followeth:

Solymus the Great Emperor of the Turks sendeth me unto thee John, Vayuod of Valachia, his Triding feech of butary; with this command, (whereunto his pleasure is, that thou flouldest without delay send him anthe Turki Em-bassador totaba swer:) first, he chargeth thee to send him not such a tribute as he was wont, but twice so much more so wit, an hundred and twenty thousand duckats. If thou shalt refuse so to do, there is another ready to give it both for himselfe and his posterity. But Selymus mindefull of thy constancy, fidelity, and valour, will not be troublesome unto thee in thy gouernment, if thou forthwith send the aforesaidtribute. Which if then shalt refuse to do then his will is that thou shouldest give place to another, and thy selfer eturne with me to Constantinople, there to answer the matter: otherwise, I amin his name to denounce all hostility and the 1 calamitics of war both unto thee and thy country.

> This proud message of the Embassador strooke farther into the minde of the Vayued than any would have thought: yet diffembling his griefe, he commanded him to be brought to the Lodging appointed for him; telling him, That in a matter of fo great importance, and fo much concerning the whole State of his Country, he could not give him so present answer as he required; but that vpon mature deliberation had with his Nobility and Counfell, he would in short time answer him accordingly. The Embassadour being gone to his Lodging. the Vayuod forthwith began deepely to consider of Selymus his demands; and that in the Turks Faith was no assurance, which he kept or brake with the Christian Princes as bell fit M ted his owne turne : and besides that, That if he should grant to pay that so great and heavy & Tribute in fo great pouerty of his Kingdome, fore wasted with civile war, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, fo long as any man would give him more, but happily would the next yeare exact a greater, and in the end such an one as he with all his subjects should not

A be able to pay, which it should not be safe for him at any time to resuse, so long as any man would give it. Wherefore calling together the Nobility and States of his country, he brake with them in this fore:

If ever you were to confult and deliborate of a most important and difficult matter, this verily is that The Beech of time: for Selymus the Turkish Emperor, enflamed with infatiable awarice, and I know not by whose per- to bis Notility Cuafion not contented wish his wonted tribute, exacteth of vs twice fo much more. If you fhall grant it, and jubich. it shall not much concerne me, as not to be paied by me your Soueraigne, but by your selves and your postsrity : if we dony it, forthwith he denounceth unto us fire and fword with all the calamities of war. And in this bareneffe of our Kingdome, almost spoiled by civile wars, how shall we be able to pay it him? where-B fore declare your minds. Verily I forefee, that if you hall in this yeeld with Selymus, and grant him so great a tribute, he will not therewith long hold himselfe contented, but every yeare extort a greater, wntill he have altogether eaten vs up. Wherefore it were better for vs (in mine opinion) to lafe our lines toocther with our wives and children, than to suffer fo great an indignity: neither is it mine own estate that troubleth me for why, it is you that are to pay it and not I. Wherefore if you lift not to endure this fo dishonourable andbase a servitude, let me forthwith to understand from you: and I will for my part to pronide, as that I wil not only not pay unto the barbarous tyrant the new and heavy tribute he demander b, but. not formuch as any tribute at all fothat you be not wanting both to your selves and me, I know right well (beloued and fellows in armes) what I ows both to you and the common weale, for whose good and welfare I am alwaies ready to lay downe my life.

He had no fooner thus faid, but that a fecret fortow and vinwonted filence had as it were oppressed the whole assembly. At length, as men awaked out of an heavy and dead sleepe, they murmured among themselves, that the Turkish Empetor should so without reason oppresse them, with doubling and redoubling of his tribute: and were generally of opinion, That the Vayuod had not so planly as truly spoken of the intollerablenesse thereof: and that therefore they had rather die, than to indure to great dishonor, joyned with so soule a slauery. And therupon offered vnto the Vayuod to ferue vpon their own charge, and with him vpon the banke of Danubius to meet the proud enemy, and there in defence of their lines and liberty, to fight it out vnto the last man. The Vayuod in few words commending their fidelity, and taking of D them an oath for the faithfull performance of that they had fo resolutely promised, sent for the Turks Embassador, and gaue him this short answer:

1, for the antient fidelity and allegiance which I owe unto my Lord and dread Soueraigne, the mighty The antwere of Emperor Selymus, would willingly geeld onto him the tribute he requireth, were it not that I know the the Vayand inminds of my people to abhorre the same: wishing rather to endure all calamities, hap what socuer hap may, Embassedone. than to yeeld unto fo di shonourable and shamefull slavery. Wherefore sithence I cannot by any meanes extort the same from my subjects, tell my Lord Selymus, That I most humbly request him, not to take the Same in euill part, whose amity I wish to be unto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than disgrace or hin. derance. And that upon that good hope I both asked, and for my fingular fidelity obtained of him the B Vajuodhip of Moldania: which my good hope I most heartily befeech him may not deceive me.

With this answer he dismissed the embassador vnrewarded, and with a safe convoy brought him unto the banke of Danubius: which his homely vsage of the Embassador, caused him not a little to be suspected to be in mind changed from Selymm. The Embassadour sent away, the Vayuod not ignorant of the fudden inualions of the Turks, forthwith began to raife his army : and at the same time, sent Embassadors vnto Henry King of Polonia his neerest neighbor, certifying him of the dangerous state of Moldauia, the surest bulwarke of the Polonian kingdom, which once ouerthrown, opened a faire and easie way for the common enemy into Polonia: and therefore requested him, that as the Kings of Polonia had of antient time, even for the F fascty of their owne State, protected that country; so it would please him now in like manner in fo dangerous a time, to give him aid; or at leastwife to give leave vnto such of his subjects as were willing to serue for entertainment, to come vnto him, whom he would with all honour and bounty vse according to their place and quality. Whereunto the King answered that for a much as he and his prediceffors the kings of Polonia, had for the space of more than G an hundred yeres bin in league with the Turkish kings and Emperors he could not either fend him aide, or yet giue leaue to any of his subjects to serue against the Turke, as he defired. With this answer the Vayuod was much troubled, as there deceined where he most hoped The Paymeden for reliefesyet hearing of certain companies of the Polonian Coffacks which Batthic long lien tertaineth the in hope of prey vpon the fide of the great river Borysthenes, were returning empty home he by fit messengers sent of purpose, offered them great entertainment to serve him in his water against the Turke; of which his offer, they (as men living for most part by service) gladly recepted; and so without the knowledge of the King went vnto him, to the number of twelve hundred, with their captains, men of great courage and valor, of whom Suiercentus was chiefe who were by the Vayuod honorably entertained, and did him in these wars right worthy see. H nice. These Cossacks are light horsemen, lying most commonly upon the borders of the polonian kingdome towards the Tartars: an hardy and valiant kind of men, whose best liging is the spoile they take from the enemy; and their best lands, their horse and launce. For albeir that the Turks and Tartars are most commonly in league with the Polonians, and seeme never fo defirous of peace, yet do they oftentimes in great numbers, ypon the fudden break into the countries of Podolia, and Rassia, part of the Polonian kingdome, and there do great harme, if they be not in time repressed or cut off by the aforesaid light horsemen, who for that purpose lie alwaies in wait for them, as doth the Hawke for the prey.

Selvmm understanding the answer of Iohn the Vayuod, was therewith exceedingly enraged. and the more by the bitter complaint of the Embassador, who angry with the Vayuod, that he was of him no better regarded nor rewarded, spared not to the vetermost of his power, to incense the angry Emperour against him, as if his honor had bin in the person of himselfe contemned and violated. Wherfore without delay, he sent thirty thousand Turks, and two thoufand Hungarians vnto the Palatine of Valachia Transalpina, that joyning those forces to his owne, he might take Iohn the Vayuod, and fending him in bonds to Constantinople, to place Perer his brother, Vayuod in his place. The Palataine glad of this command, and having raifed his owne power, together with the Turks and the Hungarians, fwam ouer the river Moldayus. having in his army about an hundred and two thousand fighting men: a power, not only sufficient to have driven the Vayuod out of Moldauia, but also to have shaken a right puissant king in his kingdome. The Palatine in the midft of so greata strength, little fearing, & leffere. K garding the fudden comming of the Vayuod, fuffred his men with their horses to lie disorderedly here and there, dispersed in the large medows and pastures all along the faire river side. so the better to refresh themselves, weary of their long travel. In the mean time certain souts came to the Vayuod then at dinner, certifying him, that the enemy with an huge army (the certain number whereof they could not well defery) was come ouer the river; and now refling themselves, had turned off their horses into the rich medows thereabout, in such disordered and carelesse manner, as that they might with a small power be easily ouerthrowne. The Vayuod glad of this newes, forthwith fent before Suiereenius with his Coffacks, and 5000 other light horfemen, more certainly to defery what the enemy did, with the manner of his lying; and he himselfe with the rest of his army followed faire and softly after. Suierceuiss with great L filence approching the enemies camp, fuddenly light upon the enemies fcouts, in number about 500; who enclosed before they were aware, were taken every man by the Cossacks, and by them streightly examined of the state of their army and campe. Who for safegard of their lives now in their enemies power, frankly confessed, how that the Palatine lay securely there by, resting his army, not so much for the refreshing thereof after his trauell, as with greater strength to set upon the Vayuod wish his fresh souldiers; and that in the army were about seuenty thousand Valachians, thirty thousand Turks, and three thousand Hungarians, who now dispersed and sleeping in security, might casily be overthrown. Of all these things Suicectains advertised the Vayuod; requesting him with all possible speed to hasten his comming for the obtaining of a most notable and affured victory: he in the mean time lying close with his men M not far from the enemy. The Vayuod certified of all thefe things, came without delay, and with the Tarks forthwith commanded Suierceules with his men to give the onfer vpon the enemy : purposing himself with the rest of his army on the other side, to charge the disordred camp in three pla-

This rough answer so much moved the Vayuod, that he commanded hands to be laid upon Zarbarow erathe aforesaid foure messengers; and their noses, lips, and eares, being cut off, both their seet to suj. be with great nailes fast nailed vnto a long piece of timber, and sowith their hands hanging downward, to be fet up before the city, & for left for the captain and the citifens to gaze upon. F Signifying withall to the captain that fent them, that he himself with the other fugitiues his guests, should in like manner be served, if they fell into his hands. Immediatly after, he assaulted the city, and vfing the cheerfulnesse of his soldiers, by plaine force tooke the same, the de- The city of fendants being not able to hold them out. There was made great flaughter of the Turks, by the Vagued

ces. Suiercevius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcry, fuddenly fet vpon the focuse enemies; who difmaid with the fuddennesse of the vnexpected danger, stood as menastonied, not knowing which way to fly, or how to make resistance. But whiles Suiercenius with his light horsemen thus on the one side filleth the camp with tumult, terrour, slaughter, and feare-behold, euen as a fudden tempest, comments the Vayued, bearing all the disordered campdown before him: neither had the enemies any meanes to fly, having put their horfes a great way off from them into the rich pastures; but there taken vnarmed, were miserably flain. In all the camp was lamentation and mourning, death raging in every place with fuch fury, that of lo great an army as of late passed the river, sew or none escaped, more than the Palatinowith Reter his brother, who by great chance with much ado getting horses, swam over the giver, and so came to the castle of Brailouia in Valachia, all the rest were slaine, and left to be of the beafts of the field, and birds of the aire denoured. It was a most horrible spectacle to fee the ground couered with the bodies of the dead, al stained with gore bloud, and their weapons of all forts lying by them. In the campe were found great riches, all which the Vavuod gaue vnto his fouldiers, and there staied foure daies to refresh his wearied men. After that he with his victorious army entred into Valachia, the Palatines country, where he tooke many castles and townes, and put to the sword all that came in his way, men, women, and children. without respect of age or sex : and burnt all the country townes and villages before him as he went, forhat all that part of the country of Valachia Transalpina, was couered with smoke and fire to the terrour of the beholders. The aged fathers were in energy place drawne forth to C flaughter, the young babes were cut in pieces, the matrons and virgins defiled, and afterwards flaine, and in briefe all the cruelty that could be deuised, performed in the bloudy execution whereof the Vayuod commended his men, perfuading them in like manner still to prosecute the victory, and that the rest of their labours were all but for prey and booty, for the enriching of themselves. In this havocke of all things, it was told him, That the Palatine with his brother Peter, the men whom he most sought after, were in the castle of Brailouia not far off: whereupon he forthwith marched thither with his army. The city of Brailouis flandeth upon the river Danubius, and had in it a castle of some good strength, defended both by the nature of the place, and a strong garrison of the Turks, which Selyman had appointed for the keeping thereof, as the key of the country; not far from this city the Vayuod encamping his ar-D my writernto the captaine of the castle, forthwith to deliuer ento him the Palatine, with Peter his brother, his mortall enemies a who neuer wronged by him, had inuaded his country, and fought after his life, and being ouerthrowne in battell, were fled vnto him : which if he thould refuse to do he threatned neuer to depart thence, vntill he had to his surther harme, constrained him by force to yeeld them. These letters he sent by two Valachian captives, to be delivered vnto the captaine of the castle: whereunto he returned answer by source Turks, two of the city, and two of his own feruants, by whom he alfo font ten great shot, and as many small, with two Turkish arrowes and this message.

For that I know thee to be the fernant of my dread Soueraigne Selymus, I regard thee and will not The blant en-B deny the same mento be with me, whom thou so much requirest. But for a smuch as I understand, that theu sweet the capof late half flaine a great number of the feruants of the great Emperour, who by his commandement were Vaynod. bringing Peter the brother af the Palatine into Moldania: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raife shy liege, I will feed thee and thy followers, with fuch dishes as these, whereupon thou and thing army gorgedto the full, shall all afterwards dangerously surfect and cast. Farewell.

whereas no man was taken to mercy; the very babes were flaine, together with their mothers, & and bloud ran like rivers into the Danubius. For the space of source daics this bloudy execution on indured : no places ferued for refuge, even the most secret and obscure places were searched on inquires no present there found, drawn forth and flaine. The fury was to greek, there hold. uing thing, no not to much as the very dogs were spated. Much gold, aluer, plate, fewels, and other rich spoile was there found, all which became a prey vnto the greedy fouldiers for the city was of all others in those quarters the righest, as a place much frequented and injoying long peace, as after such time the Turks were fully possessed of Gracia, not being mouble with any wars will now, that it was by the Vayuod first ansack, and afterwards raied down to the ground, and nothing thereof left flanding, more than the bare caftle it felfe: which the Vayuod durst not aduenture vpon, for that it was well fortified, and furnished with so strongs a garrison, as that it could not without his great losse be taken.

The Turbes againe ouer_ thrown by the Whiles the Vayuod was thus busied in the spoile of Brailoula, news was brought unto him of the comming of 15000 Turks to the reliefe of the castle; against whom he forthwith see Suierceulus with his Coffackes, and other 8000 Moldavian horfmen, who fuddenly commis voon the Turks, disordered and fearing no such matter, slew almost 1 4000 of them, and charge the rest unto the castle of Teina. Of this victory Suierceuiss in all hast certified the Vayuod. and withall, that there was another great power of the Turks comming, which might easily be alfo ouerthrowne, if he leaving the fiege of the gastle of Brailouia, would without delay come and joyne his forces with his. He glad of that news, and well perceiving how difficult and dan gerous that siege would be vnto him, rife forthwith with his army, and went to Suiercenim, and afterwards voon conference had with him, laid fiege to Teina: which city taken without much labor, he put to fword all the people found therein, not leaving one alive; and by the feruice of Suiercenius Ouerthrew the Turks comming towards Brailonia.

Selymus in deubt to bane bin thruft out the Vayuod.

Selymus in the meane time much troubled with the proceeding of the Vayuod and doub. ting to be quite thrust out of Valachia Transalpina (which he was like enough to have been had not the treason of Czarnieniche hindered the matter) prepared new forces for that services and after the manner of the Turks in time of their greatest distresse, appointed generall supplications and praiers to be made vnto his Prophet Mahomet, for the better successed his wars: the vndoubted figne of his feare.

The Vayuod after so many victories against the Turks, purposing for a while to breake up K his great army, called vnto him his old friend Ieremias Czarnieniche, vnto whom, as vnto the man he of all others most trusted, he had resolved to commit the charge, with part of his art my, to keepe the Turks from passing againe over the river Danubius into his country; and in deliuering to him his charge, spake vnto him as following:

The kind feesb

Sith Fortune both hitherto answered our desires (worthy Czarnieuiche) with most rare and peroc. tual successe against the Turks our most cruell enemies, we are thankefully to take the same, and to render most humble and hearty thanks unto Almighty God, that it hath pleased him, the Author of all Victory, so to have prospered our endeauours against these fierce and denouring enemies. Now what remaineth for the present, but to dibband mine army, wearied with labour and travell, and to give my souldiers leave to 1 depart home to rest themselves, that so I may as occasion shall require agains wie their fres forces for our better fernice: you in the meane time with thirteenethousand of my select souldiers, shall lie upon the side of Danubins, to keep the Turks from passing the river. Have good regard I pray you, unto this your charge, which I vpon an especiall trust, grounded upon your antient love and fidelity, have at this time imposed upon you. And let me from time to time with all expedition under frand from you of every motion of the enemy, that so we may in due time provide for him accordingly.

And so in token of his greater fauour, taking his leave of him with a kisse (as the manner of those people is) gaue leave vnto the greatest part of his soldiers to depart home, yet with this charge, to be alwaies in readinesse when soeuer they should be called upon.

Czarniewiche hauing received, his charge, & promifing vnto the Vayuod the vttermost of his faithful deuoire, went towards Danubius, & there most carefully kept the passages with continuall watch and ward, It was not long but that great numbers of the Turks were come downe to the other fide of the riner, and moe were still comming, yet none of them was so hardy as to adjust the great river; Czarnieniche with his horsemen lying in the faces of them, ready to receive them on the other side. Which the Bassa whom Selymus had fent with his army, perceiuing, sent certainemen pickt out for the purpose, to Czarnituiche, to sound him, if he might by any means be drawn to come ouer, in secret to talke with him: and the more to move him, beside his conduct for his safety, sent him by the same messengers thirty thousand Hungarian duckats for a present. With which so faire a bait Czarnieuiche allured, receiued the mony, & faithfully promised to come and so shortly after, secretly passing ouer the river, had conference with Peter the Palatines brother, who then lay on the further fide of Danubius, with exemicatehe a great power of the Turks. In this conference, Peter declared vnto him in how great danger forence with R the Vayuod flood, and how highly Selymu was offended with him, That he his tributary and Page the Pala. vassalie should worke the destruction of his so great armies: which his heavy displeasure he the souther, who canningly could no otherwise satisfie but with his head; and that therefore he should no longer rule in persuadeth him Moldauia, for that gouernment was by the great Emperor given vnto him. Wherefore (faid to give the he) if thou be wife, whilest it is yet in thy power, gaine the good will of Selymus by some good desertifor an easie matter it is to begin any war, but an hard matter to end the same. For asmuch as it is not alwaies in the same mans power to begin wars, and at his pleasure to make an end. Euery foole may when he lift enter into armes, but must lay the same downe when it pleaseth the conqueror. Now you have a faire opportunity, and it is in your owne power to procure his friendship for euer, better standing with your affaires than war. And albeit you may hope well C of the power of the Vayuod, yet wisedome would not, that you should prefer vincertainties before things certaine: you have now received 20000 duckats, the earnest of your further deferts which shall hereaster have also their due rewards in most full and bountifull measure. Wherefore if you will do your selfe good, and prouide both for your safety and preferment, confound not your own good fortune, with the broken and desperat state of the Vayuod, but fuffer the Turks to passe as friends over the river of Danubius; for I am come (said he) with a great and puissant army from the mighty Selymus, to take vpon me the government of Moldauia, and to fend the Vayuod in bonds to Constantinople; and of me, being once Vayuod, what is it that for fo great defert thou and thine may not aske and obtaine? Wherefore I pray thee conceale the comming of the Turks, and withdraw thy felfe from the river; fo shall we nat-D sing ouer the river with our populous army, casily oppresse the Vayuod with all his power, and at once reuenge all the former injuries and difgraces done both vnto Selymus and vs.

With greedy men what will not the foule defire of gold worke? Czarnieniche ouercome czarnieniche with the golden promises of Peter; and forgetfull of his faith before given vnto the Vayuod, with the Turk yeelded vnto all he requested and drawing his forces further off from the river, as if it had bin teauequietly to for his more fafety, gaue the Turks free passage. There was then in the Turks army two hun- last ours the dred thousand men, well appointed, and furnished with great ordnance and all other things neceffary both for the field and for fiege, who by the fufferance of the false traitor passed quietly ouer the river. Czarnieniche forthwith posting to the Vayuod, certified him, how that the Turks trusting to their multitude, had passed the river of Danubius, against whom he was not able (as E he faid) to make head: and that therefore he should do well, without delay to go against them with such forces as he had then in readinesse; which joyned vnto his, might casily ouerthrow them. Glad was the Vayuod of this newes, and filled with the hope of good successe, demanded of him what strength the enemy might be of? They are (said he) not much aboue twelve thousand that be already come ouer, but are still comming more and more, and will before your comming thither be aboue fifteene thousand.

The Vayuod lay then at the fiege of the castle of Teina (having before taken the city) but hearing this news, raised his siege, and so in source daies came and incamped within three miles of the enemy: and forthwith fent forth Suiercenius with his Coffackes, and Ieremias Generall of the horsemen, with fix thousand horse, to take view of the enemies camp, and to understand F what might be of their designes. These two captains marching together, chanced to fall vpon the Turks scouts, in number about fix thousand horsemen, with whom they had a light skirmish; and in short time put them to flight. Of these scouts they tooke one, and him gricuously wounded, whom being examined of the strength of the enemy, and feeling himselfe wounded to death, told them diffemblingly, that the Turks were not in number many. But the Coffacks doubting of the truth of that report, & probably conjecturing by fogreat a number of feoing, in that the enemy was of far greater strength than was supposed or reported quickly certified the Vayuod thereof, withing him in time to prouide for the fafety of himselfe and his army, and not too much to trust Czarhieniche, whom they had a good while before suspected, But the Vayuod nothing doubting of the faith of him whom he had a long time found most faithfull. in the time of his hardest distresse, and vied as a most trusty companion in all histraucie, and fwered nothing, but that he knew whom he trufted s'and that it was not now time to flanding doubt, or to be afraid; and that he would ere long come and take view of the enemies campe himselfe: for that he was not come so far to fly, but to fight in defence of his country and sole iects, cuen to the last gaspe. And so fortifying his campeneere vnto a lake that runneth out of Danubius (for the more convenient watering of his army) hee fet forward with all his

Necre vnto the enemies campe was an high hill, from whence the Vayuod had thought me have descried the number of them, with the manner of their lying tout cumming thither, he could descry nothing but source companies of scouts a far off, one company from another, who also upon the fight of the Moldanians withdrew themselves of purpose out of fight vnto the army, which then lay in a low valley behind an hill, not to be discourred vitill a man were ale most voon it. The Vayuod suspecting the enemy to be at hand, divided his horsemen in number 20000, into 30 companies, and placing before every company certain field pieces, fo marched ready to give battell. His footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of neonle he placed by themselves. So marching on, he came to another hill, from whence he might not far off cafily describe huge army of the enemy, and how he had been by the treason of Czarnicuiche deceiued; whereupon he presently sent for him; who sent him word backe spain. There he could not now come, the enemy being fo nigh at hand, but that he should forthwith see him in the field as forward as the forwardest against the enemy. Czarnienishe had then under his command 12000 of his most choice souldiers in the army; who you the signal of barrell on both fides giving (for the Tiftks were now also ready) first according to his promise set forward, as if it had bin to have given the onfet; but being come neere vnto the enemy, forthwith (as he had before agreed) caused his enfigne to be let fall, and his men with their caps vpon the downe their heads & bodies whom the Turks with their spears and lances holden up on high, joy fully received as their friends, or rather as men taken to mercy. The rest of the army almost discouraged with this so sudden a reuolt of so great a man, retired in haste to the Vayuod, crying out vnto him, That all was loft. But he nothing discouraged therwith (as a most resolute man in the most sudden dangers) with comfortable words cheered them vp, willing them as couragious men to follow him against the enemy, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which alwajes gaue not the victory. The Turks perceiuing the Moldauians lately revolted upon the joyning of the battell (as men in consciences wounded) to shrinke backe, thrust them perforce into the head of their battell, making of them no more account, but to The battel be dead bodies of these traitors the Turks comming on, were at the first notably encountered by the Moldauians, and after a most cruell fight, as if they had been discouraged began to retire, but indeed of puporfe to have drawne the Christians before they were aware, within the danwherein many both of the Turks and Christians fell, and neuer rise againe. But what was so The Moldan final a power against such a world of mentafter long fight, the Moldanians oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, began to give ground and feeing no other remedy, but either to fly power against the enemy. but vnto him of all others most faithfull, and armed with fuch country weapons as they had points of their spears and swords, in token of their voluntary yeelding and submission, to bow K blunt the enemies (word; and fuch as hung back, they themselves slew: vpon whom as salse L' traitors the Vayuod caused his field pieces to be most furiously discharged; so that most part of these trecherous men there slaine, some by the Turks, some by their owne friends, received the just reward of their infidelity and treason, accompanied with perpetuall infamy. Ouer the ger of their great ordnance, and ambushes, which they had before aptly & couertly placed for that purpose. Which Suierceuius well acquainted with the Turks finesse, perceiuing, with much ado staid their further pursuit, and so avoided the danger prepared for them. The Turks deceived of their expectation, came on againe afresh, with no lesse fury than at the first whom M the Christian right valiantly received, and made with them a most cruell and mortall battell;

A or to die botook them felues to flight, wherein most part of them were flaine, the furious enemie ftill hardby pursuing them at the heelessof the Coffacks were left only two hundred and fifty. The horsemen (the chiefest strength of the Vayuod) thus by the treason of Czarniewiche querthrowne, the Vayuod with twenty thousand footmen, and such horsmen as had now after the battell joyned themselves vnro the footmen, retired into a towne not far off, which he but The Vayued a little before had rafed; but was now glad in the ruines thereof to fortifie himselfe against head miles the sudden and furious assaults of the Turks: who the same night so beset the Vayuods camp within the ruwith such a multitude of men, that no man could goe in or out of the camp, or the vetermost temp, u bise part of that hugy army be from any place descried.

The next day (which was the 110f lune) the Turks shot divers great shot into the Vayuods Turks B camp, but to smal purpose; for the Christians had (for so short a time) notably fortified themfelires within the ruines of the old town. Which the Turks wel perceiuing, and withall confidering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to affault the Vayuod in his ftrength: they fent messengers vnro him, to persuade him without delay to yeeld himselfe, & to repose more trust in the mercy of the Turks, than in his own broken forces; especially in his so hard diffresse, being so beset, as that he could not possibly escape; and out of hope of all reliefe; and therefore should by such voluntary yeelding, seeke for grace of his enemies, rather than by a desperat obstinacy to cast himselfe into a most certain destruction, where no mercy was to be expected. Whereunto the Vayuod answered, That he was not ignorant into what danger he was brought, rather by the treason of Czarnieniche and his followers, than by the valour of the C enemy; yet had left with him a strong power of most valiant and resolute men, who would in his quartell & defence of themselves, sell their lives very deare vnto the Turks:neverthelesse, that to audid the further effusion of bloud, he could for his part be content to yeeld vnto his hard fortune, forhat the great Commanders of the Turks army would condifiend vnto such reasonable conditions as he should propound, & for the performance thereof give him their faith, not once or twice, but 7 times by folemn oth to be taken. Of this his offer the Turks accepted: willing him to fet down the conditions: which were, first, that the Polonian Cossacks might in fafety depart into their country, with their horses and armor: then, that they should without any violence offered to his person, send him aliue & in good safety to the great Emperor Selymus, before him to answer his owne cause: as for the Moldanians, he said he needed D not to covenant any thing, for that the injury offered vnto them tended also to the hurt of the Emperour himselfe, and of him whom he should appoint Vayuod, whose subjects they were. These conditions (as reasonable) were well liked of the Turks, and so according to his desire, confirmed feuen times by the folenme oath of every Captaine and Commander in the army, both for themselves and their sollowers. Vpon this agreement, the Vayuod brought al his arthy out of their trenches wher in they had lien ftrongly incamped, and there with heavy heart tooke his last leaue of his foldiers, to the generall griefe of them all: among s whom he divided such mony & jewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindnesse. And there in the sight of them aldifarming himfelfe, accompanied only with Ofmolius a Polonian, went in maner of a suppliant to the Tutks camp, where he had full foure hours talk with the great commanders B of the armytyntill that at laft Capucins Baffa (either offendel with his fpeech, or unmindfull of his faith before gitten) with his scimitar voon the sudden trinck him a great blow ouerthwatt The Vayued the face, and another croffe the belly : whom fo wounded, & as yet but halfe dead, the Ianiza. fiamefully and ries took and ent off his head, which was forthwith fet vp vpon a lance, for all men to behold. muritured by His dead body they bound by the feet to two cammels, & fo fhamefully tote it in pieces; and the Tarks. happy was he that could get any little piece therof, or imbrue his fword with the least drop of his bloud. This was the lamentable & wofull end of Iohn the Vayuod of Moldauia, a right valiant and worthy than, Mantefully murdered by the perfidious Turks, who had hebeen more constant in the Chriffian faith, had not haply fallen into fogteat mifery. Whose wofull fall may ferness a most privable example of the vocetrainty of theseworlds things for as no man

F for a titue had of the Titeks moe or more glorious vi ctories, fo in the end, and as it were in demonthration of mans fragility, no man perished more miserably. The Vayuod thus persidi-

oully murthered, the Turks with like trechery forthwith set voon the Moldanians, and slew them down right as beaffs appointed for the flaughter. Which the Coffacks beholding, and hoping for nobeter measure, thrust themselves into the thickest of their enemies, & there va-

All Valachia

After this victory and shamefull murther of the Vayuod, the Turkes ouer-ranall Molda. and M. Idavia

Of whom they also, as their maner is in countries new conquered, sent great numbers in colonies into the farthest part of the Turkish Empire: and for the more assured possession therofpla. ced firong garrifons in every Town and castle, as they thought it most convenient. Thus all Valachia, both the higher and lower, fel into the Turks hands in the year 1 574, and was by selymus joined vato the Turkish empire, none of the least things by him don: for beside the gai. ning of fo great a country (the most assured bulwark of Polonia) he hath thetby opened a fair H and easie way for his successors, either to enter into Podolia or Rascia, parts of the Polonian kingdom, yea and into Polonia it self: which they wil vndoubtedly in timedo, if God in mercy bridle not their immoderat defires, and with his mighty hand protest the dangerous flate

Selymus at the same time not a little grieued with the losse of the kingdome of Tunes, and that Don John had there done the year before; began forthwith to cast in his minde, how hee might again recouer the same, and withal thrust the Spaniards out of the strong cassle of Guletta, which they had now almost forty yeares kept, euer fince it was by Charles the fift taken from Barbarussa in the year 1535. For he wel saw it to be a matter of no small moment, voto whom that strong sortiesse (standing so commodiously in the frontiers of Africk) belonged. I There was and still is vpon that coast divers of the Turks, adventurers, who living altogether upon spoil, had to that place safe recourse as to a most affured refugeiand if no booty were to be met with therabout, then would they run out towards Malta, Satdinia, Sicilia, and other Islands therabouts; yea oftentimes into Italy and Spaine, and from thence carry, away with them great booties both of men and cattel, and what focuer thing els came in their way. For which cause many of the Turkes men of war resorted thither in hope of purchase. But after Guletta was possessed by the Spaniards, they were not only depriued of that so commodious an harbor, but many times intercepted euen by them of that place, and by the gallies of Maltaiwhich two places ferued as two most fure bulwarks against the Turks and Moors aduents. rers, by whose means they many times came short home. For which cause the Turks, especially these pyrats (of whom the Turke makes great account, as not his least strength at sea) wonderfully defired to have both those strong places gotten out of the Christians hands. In the castle of Guletta was continually a strong garrison of 1000 Spaniards, who kept them of Tunes in great subjection, and oftentimes cut short these pyrats and rouers, who much troubled thole feas. Wherfore the Turkish emperor Selymus having made great preparation both for fea and land feruice, commanded Sinan, Pial, and Vluzates, his chief Baffa's, & menof great experience, with all speed to passe ouer with his sleet into, Africke, to besiege Tunes and Guletta: who when they had put all things in readines according as they had in charge, let forward, and with 300 fail of gallies came before Gulettathe 13 day of July whitheralfore for ted vnto them other of the Turks men of war from Alexandria, Algiers, and other places, in L fuch number, as that all that coalt feemed to be covered with thipping. The Turkes at their first arrival laid siege vnto the water-tower, wherin were eight hundred foldiers wel provided of all things needful for defence; who valiantly maintained the place, vntil fuch time as that most of them being by the often assaults of the enemy slain, the rest by the commandement of the Captain retyred to him into the castle. Intaking of this tower, the Turkes lost 3000 of their men.

Guletta besie-

After that, they began to beliege the castle of Guletta, against which they cast up divers mounts, and from thence most terribly battered the castle; from whence the deadly shotwas fent again amongst them not sparingly; so that in one day, 200 great shot were reckoned to haue bin thot out of the castle among the thickest of the chemies. But after many futious as M faults, too tedious to report, & much harm don on both sides, the Turks to their great aduantage took the Chanel of the lake of Tunes; and fearing left fome reliefe should be sent to the besieged, maintained their assault day and night without any intermission. Neuerthelesse certain Companies of Spaniards sent from the new Castle by Serbellio, got into Gulettailte which, they in the befieged castle sallied out, and the twentieth of August repulsed the Turks with an exceeding great flaughter but the Baffa's fully refolued vpon the winning of the place togage their whole forces, and without ceasing still bringing on fresh soldiers, after they had all the day continued a most terrible assault, at length about two houres after Sun set, they Guletta taken took the castle the 23 day of August, when there was now scarcely two hundred soldiers left by the Turks. aliue to defend the same; who altogether with the other weak people in the castle were without mercy cut in pieces. What wealth the Turks found in this castle, is hard to say, but ccrtain it is, that they had therein great store of victuals, armour, shot, and pouder, and source hundred great pieces of Artillery.

Guletta thus taken, the Turks forthwith laid fiege to the new castle appointed by Don John The new castle the yeare before, to have bin built betwixt Guletta and Tunes, which was not yet altogether befored. finished: wherein the two antient and valiant captains Serbellio and Salazer (left there of purpose for the building thereof by Don Iohn) lay with a garrison of source thousand good souldiers. The Baffa's when they gave the first summons to the castle, the source & twentieth of August, required forthwith to have it delivered vnto them: to whom Serbellio stoutly answered, The notable an-That he had promised the king his master, to give him a better account of the place, & being for of Ser. now also very old, could not endure the Turks heavy yoke, but would therfore hold it out vnto the last maniwhich both he and Salazar truly performed, not omitting any thing that was by men to be done for defence of the place; & fallying out, somtime the one, and somtime the other, made great flaughter of the Turks, giving them also repulse on repulse when they came to the affault. But the great Baffa's, little feeling, and leffe regarding the loffe of men, to that thereby they might gaine the place, after many most terrible and desperat assaults, at length (namely the thirteenth day of September) when they had with all their force for the force of fix houres furiously affaulted the callie, and flaine most of the defendants, at last tooke it. Ser. The new calle bellio shot in with two bullets, and wishing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the enemie, thrust himselse into the midst of the Turks, there to have perished but by the hasty comming in of Piall Baffa both he & Salazer were taken aliue, as for all the rest that sollowed them, they were put to the sword. The Bassa in his rage struck Serbellio and the mose to grieve him, caused his son to be cruelly murthered before his face. Neither was this victory by the Turks obtained without bloud, having in leffe than three months space that the siege endured, lost aboue thirty thousand men.

These strong holds (the greatest strength of that kingdom) thus taken, the Turks marched Tunes yelded to Tunes, which they easily tooke, and afterwards ouerthrew the fortifications therof, because to the large, it should no more rebell. Mahomet the yong king, but the yere before placed in that kingdom by Don Iohn, was there taken, and in bonds fet aboord to be carried with Carrera Captaine of Guletta, prisoners to Constantinople: and thus the kingdome of Tunes, with the strong castle of Guletta, fell again into the possession of the Turks, to the fatther trouble of the Christian countries lying ouer against it. The proud Bassa's having (as they thought) best disposed of al things at Tunes & Guletta departed thence, and with their fleet of 400 faile, came the fourth of October, within fight of Malta. But understanding that they of Maltawere prouided for their comming, and remembring what dishonor their most magnificent emperor Solyman had not many yeres before there sustained (whereof divers of them had been eye witnesses) they turned thence, and failed directly to Constantinople.

Shorrly after, this great Emperour Selymus spent with wine and women, vnto whom he had selymus dieth. giuen his greatest strength, died the ninth of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1574; when behad lived one and fifty yeares, and thereof reigned eight, and lieth buried at Hadrianople. He was but of a meane stature, and of an heavy disposition, his face rather swollen, than fat, much refembling a drunkard. Of the Othoman Kings and Emperors he was of left valour, and therfore least regarded, altogether given to sensualitie and pleasure: and sodying, lest his empire vnto Amurath his eldeft son, a man of more temperance, but not much greater courage; F who neuerthelesse by his valiant Bassa's and men of war, did great matters, especially against the Persians, the mortall and daungerous enemies of the Turks, as shall be hereafter in this History declared.

LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE THIRD OF THA'T NAME, SIXTH EM-PEROR OF THE TVRKS.

The death of the late Emperor Selimm was for feare of the infolent Ianizaries notably concealed by the great Baffa's, vntill such time as Amurath his eldest son, then in Asia, about 12 dayes after arised at Constantinople, & there received into the Seraglio, tooke possession of the empire the 25 day of December, folemn among vs Christians for the nativity of our Saviour Christ Iclus. Hee was about The described $ thirty, or as some write 27 yeares old when he began to of Amuraib. reign of a manly stature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his beard thin and long: in his countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Otheman Princes, beeing indeed himself of a peaceable disposition, a louer of justice, and in the manner of his superstition very zealous. The rvot

D and exces grown among ft the Turkes by his fathers ewill example, hee reformed by his owne temperance, and the seuere punishment of notorious drunkards. Yet is it reported, that hee would oftentimes drink plentifully of Wormwood wine. He was most subject to the falling ficknes, and fore troubled with the stone; more spare handed than was for the greatnes of his flate; and yeelding more to the counsel of his mother, his wife, & sister, than of his great Basfa's: which was of many imputed to him for simplicitie. At his first comming to Constan- He pacifies the tinople, to appeale the murmuring of the Ianizaries (grieued to fee themselves disappointed Janizaries et of spoiling the Christians & lews, as they were wont to do in the vacancie of the Empire) he augmanstheir beside the vival larges which the Turkish Emperours at their first entrance into the empire bestow upon them, augmented also their daily wages, and granted them this priviledge, That E their fons as foon as they were 20 years old, should be involled among the number of the yonger Ianizaries, and be partakers also of their immunities: wherby he won their fauors exceedingly. And immediatly to rid himfelf of all competitors, he after the vnnatural manner of the Turkith policy, caufed his five brethren, Multapha, Solyman, Abdulla, Ofman, and Tzihanger, He Araqui to be all strangled in his own presence. At which so tragical a fight it is reported that Amerath let August fall fome tears, as not delighted in such barbarous cruelty, but that the state and maner of his weeks. government fo required.

In the beginning of his reign he established divers wholesome Lawes, altered the Coine, 157% F and bountifully relieued the poor. And albeit that he was of a mild and peaceable nature, yet because he would not seem to degenerate from the Othoman Princes his Progenitors, hee profecured his fathers Wars, and by the Tartars called Procopenies, in the moneth of October refinings in the year 1575, entred into Rascia, part of the Polonian Kingdome, where hee burnt and ded by the Amurath, god of the earth, Gouernor of the whole World, the Messenger of God, and faithfull servant of the great Prophet; Vato the most Honourable Nobility and Counsellors of the Kingdome of Polonia, Greeting.

T is not unto the world unknown (most honourable and mighty Senators) our noble progenitours to have of long time and for many years holden good friendship and religious Leagues with the King. dom of Polonia. For which cause it hath seemed good and reasonable vnto vs, to put you in mind of this antient a league and bond of friendship : for that we understand your king dom to be of late become destitute of a King, by the departure of the noble King Henry your crowned King (discended of the roiall race of the French Kings) our friend : who for the small regard you had of him so great and worthy a Prince, K and for your disloyalty, is departed out of your king dom, without purpose of returning any more into Polomia. Wherupon, as it is reported unto us (but how truly we know not) you passing over your said crowned King Henry are about to make choice of a new King, and especially of Maximilian the Emperour, or of the Duke of Muscoup; both men of running wits, and of vs greatly hated for why you may wel know they will be troublesome and grieuous not unto enery one of you only, but even unto us also. Wherfore bewat that you be not deceived; and take heed that your confederations and leagues canot long by their valor and proweffe be established, and withall consider well the great dangers and losses you may thereby falling, wheref we have thought good to give you at aft wher fore beware that heavier things befall not your flate. We know there are right noble and wife men among st you, who know better than they how to rule and gonern : and if it please you not to make choice of any of your own nation, there is not far from you one Ste- [phen Bator Prince of Transiluania, a man of great honor and valor by whose labor and dexterity you may easily procure the peace and quiet of your king dom. Which for all that we fay not as any thing at all doubting of your fidelity and con-Stancy toward vs. As for the rest, which it pleased ws by word of mouth to have told unto you, wee have ginen charge unto this our embassador and counsellor, unto whom our defire is that you give ful credence. From Constantinople the last of September, in the yeare of our Prophet Mahomet 982, and first of our reign.

This the great Sultans commendations fo much prevailed with the Polonians, that notwithstanding that Maximilian the Emperour was by the Archbishop of Gnesna and some others chosen King, yet was that his election by the greater part of the nobility reubked, and A both he and the great Duke of Mulcouy being passed ouer, the noble princesse Anne (of the most honorable lagelionian house) chosen Queen of Polonia, yet with this condition, that she should marry Stephen the Vayuod of Transyluania, to them by Amurath commended. Who afterward elected King, all the time of his life right worthily gouerned that noble kingdom, suppose the not only defending the same in such state as hee found it, but also notably extending the Kel Telepis. bounds therofinlarging it with fuch territories as he by force of Armes got from his neighbors, especially the Muscouite. Of this election Amurath would oftentimes asterward boast and fav. That he had given the Polonians their King. But of him, and of the league made by him with Amurath, more shall be said heraster.

The yeare following great troubles arose in Persia, whereby the flourishing state of that 1576. B most mighty kingdom was fore shaken, and opportunitie given for the Turkish Emperor to inuade the same which he laying hold vpon, entred into that bloudy war, which to the great quiet of the Christian commonweal, for long time after exercised the forces of those most puissant princes one voon another. For the better understanding wherof it shal not be amisse compendiously to set down the same troubles of the Persian kingdom, the very ground of the long and mortal war between those two most mighty Monarchs.

Old Tamas the Persian King, son to the noble Hy [mael, who with glory had morethan fifty years worthily governed that large kingdom, and mightily withstood the often inuasions of the Turkish Emperors, now spent with years, died the eleventh of May in the year 1576, leauing behind him eleuen fons namely Mahamet the eldeft, of an infirmitie in his eies firnamed Codabanda man of peaceable and quiet disposition, more delighted with the sweet pleasure of a conceased life, than the careful honors of fo great a kingdom. Ifmael the fecond fon of a more fierce and trouble for nature, fo much abhorring quietnes, that not regarding the league hardly concluded betwirt his aged father and the Turkish Emperor Solyman and Selymur, he would now and then without his fathers knowledge, vpon a youth ful heat break out into the frontiers of the Tucks Dominions, and there make great Boil. For which his doings, although he was both of his father and the people the more fegarded, yet was he by his fathers commandement (who feemed to missike of those his youthfull sports, tending to the breach of the League) restrained of his liberty, and sent to the castle Cahaca, betwixt Tauris & Casbin, where he remained at the time of his fathers death. Aidere the third fon, no leffe ambicious than was his brother Ismahel, although not altogether of like valour, who was kept by Zalcan, Paris Mahamer, and other his kinsfolk, all men of great power and authority. The other eight were Mamue, Solyman, Mustinpha, Emangule, Alichan, Amet, Abrahim, and Ifmaket the

Tamas thus dead, Ismabel was by the Sulvans sent for to Cahaca, to take upon his fathers kingdomat Casbin; when in the mean time there arose a great tumult in the City, yea eien B in the Kings palace : for Aidere the third brother, who in the time of his fathers greated ficknes had entred the chamber where he lay drawing toward his end, and in his fight most pre- Aldere affires fumptuously set the royal Crown vpon his head, to the manifesting of his ambibious desires; to the hunder for which hee was then worthily reprodued: Now after the death of his aged father, carried headlong with the same aspiring humour, and supported by Zalchan and other his mighty Fauorits, had so effectually dealt with the great lady Periaconcona his eldoft fifter, and the other Sultans counsellors of estate, put in trust to see the wil of the dead King put in execution, as that the succession could not be any longer kept from him and reserved for Ismahel, but by the help of fome fine secret and deceit. This lady Periaconcona (elder than all the yong Princes the fons of Tames, her brethren, a woman of great spirit and deep conceit) left in great trust by her F father, seeing the proceedings of her brother didere, durst neither openly moue any thing to the Sultans, prejudiciall to ris designes; nor could she in her heart indure so great an injury to be don to her brother Ismael, appointed by her father to succeed him. Wherfore in this perplexity the cast in her wily head, how to fatisfie her ambitious brother, how to faue Ismahels right being absent, the honor of her dead fathers wil & testament, and the safety of the kingdome. For having thorowly debated the matter with the Sultans, the resolved that sidere G inuested in royall apparell, and settled in the great gallery, should attend the acclamation of the people, and be there openly enthronifed as the very elected king. With which vaine flew the people, and be the term of the view of jefty, verily perfuaded himfelfe, that he should now be honoured both of his friends and fors, as King. But vnto these his so hasty and prosperous designes, the successe that spring from the fubtilty of those Counsellors and his dissembling sister, were nothing conformable: for that the by their aduice tooke order for the gates of the palace to be prefently locked, leaving at euery passage a sure gard, and only one wicket open, safely warded with a companie of mon faithfull and valorous captaines and fouldiers, wholly denoted to Tamas and Ismabel: with freight charge, to suffer every man to enter in, fauing only the knowne friends of Aidere. In H this fort did the thinke to have entertained the young man, vntill fuch time as Ismahel should arrive at Cahaca, and so put in execution what he thought best for the honour of himselfe, and the generall quiet of the kingdome.

Who joyeth now but Aidere? in conceit a King, replenished with vawonted joyes, received uing honor from all men fauing from his best friends. By means wherof perceiuing now the prohibition of them, and mooued also with the great stir of Zalcan his greatest favorit (who discouering the deceit, and crying upon king Aidere, threatned the lady, the Sultans, and the rest that waited upon the feigned succession, indeed ordained but for the scorne and despieht of the ambitious man) triken with great fear, and full of forrow, he withdrew himfelf closely amongst certain women of the court, hoping so to find some way to escape with life.

In the mean time to greatly increased the cries and threatnings of the friends and favouries of Aidere(who now had all of them prepared themselves for some dangerous and pernitious attempt) that the counfellors, with confent of the Lady his fifter, were inforced to take order. that to bereaue this tumultuous and feditious people of all their hope and courage; diame should be deprived of his life. Wherupon Sahamal the Georgian, vnclego Aidere by the medthers fide, by the appointment of Periaconcona and the Sultans, after long fearch they at length found him hidden among it the women; and without further delay taking him by the locks Aider Rais, and Arook his head from his shoulders, and in the place where Zalean and the rest of his visioning nat fauorits flood crying and threatning, among it the thickest preise of the proud conspire tors flung the had all bloudy, as it were yet breathing for heat; crying aloud vnto them; de hold there your King ening him at your pleasure. At which sudden and horrible spectacle energy man burned in rage & anger, neither for the present wanted there many a rash head that vais ly threatned most cruel revenge. But in the end, when they saw the neer succession of Ismany inenitable, and the death of Aidere irreuocable every man betook himfelf to his own printe affairs, and fo at the last dividing themselves one from another, departed from the palece and scattered themselves, some one way, some another, every mattas he thought best for his owne fafety.

Ifmabel faluted

Shortly after, I mael the defired King arrived at Casbin, where he was of his fifter and the Sultans joifully received as their lawful and vindoubted fourraign, and with great acclamation of the people faluted King; who as foon as he faw himfelf possessed of the royall fest, and I his power now answerable to his defires, he after the maner of the Turkish policy most vnnsturally caused the heads of his eight yonger brethren to be striken off; and withall yed such diligence, that not only all those which were neer vnto them in bloud and affinitie were bereaued of their lines, but also all the fauorits of his late brother Aidere were destroied in that publike flaughter: fo that all the streets of Casbin were defiled with bloud, and all the city resounded with mourning and complaints. Which vnexpected cruelty, altogether vnworthy fo worthy a thought king, so altred the minds of his subjects in general, that all their former hopes were now converted into new fears, and their toy into mourning. But much greater and far more lamentable did the miseries grow as soon as it was given out. That he would change the religion of the Persians (who with great deuotion worship their foolish prophet Aly) into M the superstition of the Turks, who with no lesse impiety observe & maintain the wicked rites of Ebubekir, Hamer, Ofman, and others, by them supposed to be the most true successors of their great Prophet Mahomet. For by meanes of this vacouth noueltie and vaexpected change, and by force of an edict concerning that matter, published by this new King, many of his prophane priefts, many of the gouernors of his friendly and fubiect cities (too much given to their former (uperstition) were driven some into exile, some clapt up in prison, some had their eies put out (among it whom was the Calyph of Casbin) and not a few others in fundry forts deprined of their lives. Yea many Ladies joined in bloud with Ismael himself, & divers others of his kinsfolk (to whom neither fex, age, nor innocency could be a fufficient defence) indured fundry torments & strange calamities. So that in Persia was never felt greater troubles, or a more dangerous change.

In this fo great innountion, and among these troubles, there went abroad withal a general rumor, not in the cities of Persia only, but in the regions of the Turks also, euen as far as Con. stantinople, That Ismael with a pnissant army of such as fauored this new proclaimed vanitie. was determined apperson himself to go to Babylon, now called Bagdat, there to receive the crown of the empire at the hands of him whom he should find to be their great Calyphs succeffor, and in the chief place among their vnclean priefts: as had Solyman himfelfe the great Emperor of the Turks, and the Persian kings of antient times. In this world of troubles, when as the fear of further miseries daily increased, rather than any hope of antient quietnesse; he was when he least feared, by the help of the aforenamed Lady Periaconcona fuddenly bereft of 16mont fudders. his life : but whether ouertaken in some of his own amorous practises, or poisoned by his said by murdered by fifter or that the (as some probably conjecture) having secretly conspired with Calil Chan, wife. Emir Chan, Pyry Mahamet, Curchi Basi (being all at that time men of great account, and as it were presidents of the kingdom) who disguised in womens apparel, & broughtin by her, stran-C gled him at such time as he had withdrawn himself among his paramors, is vncertain. Howsoeuer it was, sufficeth it that he by the helpe of the said Lady Periaconcona was by vnnaturall death taken out of this world the four and twentieth day of Nouember, in the yeare of Grace 1577. 1577; to the exceeding joy of all those Nations, who by his death thought themselves now freed of many great and dangerous troubles: when he had reigned one year feuen months and

Ismael thus taken out of the way, the lady began forthwith to persuade with the great Sultans, the ministers of Ismaels death, that as they had for the generall good of Persia contriued the death of the late king, so now that they would take voon them the protection of that great kingdom, with the preservation of the majesty and liberty therof, vntill such time as it were D knowne who should worthily succeed in that Crowne, which now remained in their hands. There was at that time many of the greatest Princes and Gouernors of that kingdom affembled at Cashin, there gaping after such mutations of those troublesom times, as might best ferue their private designes, Emir Chan burning in ambitious desires, was in hope by means of a match to be made with a fifter of Periaconcona (who was already greatly inclining vnto him) to be exalted to the souer aigntie of all Persia. Mirize Salmas the chiefe Sultan hoped on the other side to advance into the cstate, either Mahamet Codahanda the eldest brother of the dead king, or els Hamile the eldest son of the faid Mahamet; and by bestowing voon him his daughter in marriage (as afterwards he did) so to increase the glory of his house. Others there were that thought they should be able to draw Abas Mirize (the middlemost son of Mahamet) out of Heri, and to make him King. Neither wanted the infant Tamas his aforting friends, whose Tutor waited likewise for some opportunitie to settle him in the kingdome, and so by means of his greatnesse to make himself greatest among his fellows. Minumber of others there were, that fecretly waited vponeuery occasion that time should present for their presentent. Howbeit in this fo great varietie of thoughts, the Sultans answered the Lady with one consent, and promifed her in most liberall termes all the protection that their forces could affourd, or their weapons procure; and yet did every one of them both in action and word, Clerke-like, diffemble their feuerall imaginations, wherunto their minds were as prone and ready, as their hearts were cunning closely to conceale them.

Amurath the Turkish Emperor now amakened first at the death of the old renowned Tanas, Amurath in-F and then at the rumor of the defire I final had to passe with an Army to Babylon; as also at tentine to the the fresh report of the Turkish superstition newly published in Persia, and withall throughly survey person instructed what harm this lare King had done in Persia, what differtions he had raised, and how hardly the prouinces of the Empire had endured those calamities, began forthwith to thinke, that hereby a faire occasion was offered unto him to take up Armes against the Persians, and matter sufficient suggested for him to put in execution the great desire heliad G of some new conquest. For it is an antient custome, which is growne as it were to be a law at mong the Othoman Kings, That they may not challenge their due honours in their life time. nor their proud monuments after their death, valeffe they attempt fome great and stabitions actions & enterprises, and perform some exploit conformable to their majesty. Amenabites. forebent vpon these great shirs in Persia, would not dired his mind any other way, or take any other war in hand, untill he might first fee what issue these maruelsous innouations in Persa would bring forth: which in the person of Mahamet the succeeding King, seemed to be more pregnant than ever before, and ministred vnto Amurath new occasions of victorious & strange hopes. For as foon as Ismahel was dead, the afore named Mirize Salman (in dignity chief mana. mong the Sultans, though in blood & nobility inferior to them all) after may letters difpar. H ched to and fro, at last affured Mahamet Codahanda, how with al quietnes of mind, and security of person he might come & possesse himselse of the kingdom. He was also advertised by the faid Salmas, of the whole conspiracy plotted against his brother to bring him to his end, and likewise made acquainted, how the fraudulent lady, with the Suitans, had capitally consulted against himselfiand how she, fauouring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of Heri her nephew & his fon more than became her, did little regard the due and rightful succession of him being the eldest brother. So Mahamet bearing himselse upon the faith and diligence of Mirize Salmas. foliatibite take and defiring withall to fee his elder fon Hamze Mirize advanced to fome fuch fourraign dignity as he saw was due to the lively hope every man perceived to be in him, in regard of his Terfian hing . vertue and prudence for mannaging the common-wealth and matters of war (wherein allohe I shewed himself vnto his father scalous and suspitious, left some other man should vsurp your him that honour and authority which fo properly appertained vnto him) refolued in the end not to leave the kingdome in the hands of private persons, nor the lightnes of an viconstant woman of suspected modesty, and a rebellious conspiratour against her own blood wherwith the had without any pity or remorfe of conscience, now twice defiled her selfe. And therfore he wrot back againe. That he was minded to take the rightfull fuccession you him, and that for the same purpose he was putting him solf youn his journey with streight charge not with standing, That Mirize Salmas should before his entrance within the gates of Casbin, present him with the mischieuous head of Periaconconasa woman in respect of the scorne exerciseds. gainst her brother Aidere, and of the treacherous death of her other brother Ismabel, and of the K peruerfe imaginations which the had conceived to cause the succession to fall into other mens hands, & of the produgall familiarity which the had with fome of the Sultans) well work thy of a thousand deaths. Secretly did Mirize Salmar put in execution what soener Mahimit had privatly enjoyeed him, fo that by his meanes howas prefently and folemnly proclaimed king of Persia. And afterwards having gathered together many squadrons of men wholly denoted to the bloud & name of Mahamet, the same Mirite Salmar met him on the way, carrying the head of that manlike Virago Piriaconson's upon the point of a lance, with her halic differ-Mahamet proclaimed King fed, and some other vincouth fights to the terror of the beholders. From which nouelties one mischief as it were hudling upon the neck of another) there sprung up divers inward havels, 1 be bead of fundry tumultuous feditions, and much civill wars: this new king by the infligation of Mitt-L rize Salmas, feeking on one fide to be redonged on the Sultans for his brothers death & the Mahameton on the other fide oppoling shemfelues with all shelp power against him the State of Petits began to fal into great inconveniences, and of the le nontifies to year new losses, Sahand the Georgian fled into his mountain of Brus fearing the weath of his new lord Leuam oglilke. wife another of the Lords of Georgia, understanding of the flight of sahamal his neighbour, estranged himselfe so far from his old lougland antient denotion towards the Persian Kings that he feemed now to defire fome new insthusion of the nations affor that were neighbours to the Turks, and the people of Media Antropatian (Howardled Sirlian) diffiked of this lew king and in the end it appeared. That Persia vinder this lying through many mutations was in thort time fallen into most norable mifery, and the state thereof more weakened than it had M of long time before. ังไพวล และมหา กับได้

Of all thefe things had Amerath from diner spheres latelife erse but more particularly from Pfireff of Van(a city of Armenia the greater, foiled ropen the lake of A damar) hip fent him most perfect information of all the stire in Perfia 1 Diffour ling with him of the death of

A mabiel, the consultations of the Sultans, the trecheries & death of Periaconcena, the broils between the King and the Sultans, the nature of the new King (beeing diseased in his cies, little esteemed of his subjects, besotted in affection toward his sons) the facilitie to ouerrule the chief gouernors of the Georgians, and the people of Sirvan, euil affe ded toward the new kings and to be brief, what focuer had in truth fucceeded in Persia, and might inflame the minde of the ambitious Sultan, to convert his forces against an enemy of small counsell and much confusion. Adding thereunto, That neuer was there greater opportunitie to ouercome that King, than now was offered and therfore wished him, not in any case to let slip so fair an occasson, as the Otherson Kings had never before, for the obtaining of so certain and so glorious victories.

Amurath of long time wholly bent to mark the event of the troubles in Persia now stirred vo with these adhertisements from Pftref, setled himself more deep in his former conceits to proughis forces in subduing the Persian King, the antient enemy of the Otheman Emperors. and his only corrival and odious competitor in the East. But no one thing did more inflame him therunto, than to thinke, how he should have to his enemy a King not acquainted with deeds of arms, doring upon his children, and weakned with the diffention of his subjects: and on the other fide entring into the confideration of his own forces, of the infinit number of his men both horse and soot, of the means he had to find mony; of his Attillery and engins of War, wherein he far surpassed the Persians; he did more and more resolue with himselfe to take the occasion that was now offered him to begin the war. For the compassing of which his purpose he was greatly fauored by the present state of Christendom, at that time beeing wholly in league and amity with him, So not finding any thing contrary to his designments, he resoluted at length to confer with the chief Bassa's, which had the gouernment of his Empire, Whether it were better upon this occasion to begin the prepented war, or if they thought not this opportunity to be so fit, then to lay it aside, and to convert his forces and counsel against the Commonwealth of Christendom. For such is the barbarous policy wherby this Empire is mannaged, that it is lawfull for them to break any League, be it by neuer so many promises or solemn oaths confirmed, when soeuer any enterprise is to be attempted for the advancing therof. So that although this war could not be moved either against the Persians No ofference or Christians, without breach of their promised faith; yet among the manifold consultations in the Tart D that passed among the great Bassa's, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but all with one accord without further respect, sought to set forward the ambitious desire of their proud Lord and master. At last after long consultation and large discourses, it was at length agreed upon by the great Bassa's, Mahomet, Sinan, and Mustapha, That it would bebetter and leffe danger to attempt war against the Persians, than against the Christian Princes. Mastapha amongst the rest preferring the valour of the Latines, wherof he had made good trial especially at Famagusta, before the armies and forces of the Georgians and Persians. Wherby it is apparant to the world, that neither the zeal of their religion, nor any Ambition the injury received from the Persian King, but only the ambitious defire of Amurath (to subdue Persian War. a kingdome, both in his own conceit and other mens relations evil gouerned, by an effeminat and fortish King, and through civil diffention brought into great danger) was the first prouocation of making this war.

Vpon this resolution there arose new consultations touching the manner therof, and vpon what coast they should begin their journy for the more honourable successe therof. Which point Amurah greatly viged; protesting before his chief Counsellors, That he would not enter into that war except he were in great hope to bear away the victory. Some thought it most convenient to send the Army to Babylon, and from thence to Syras, formerly called Perfepolis, the chiefcity of the country of Persia. Others there were that gaue aduice, that the army should be sent directly to Tauris, there to erect strong sortresses, and to take possession of all the country round about it. And there wanted not fome (as it is reported) that thought it F better to fend two feueral atmies for both the forenamed places; and fo by bringing the enemy into a streit, to inforce him to yeeld to what soeuer should be of him required. But Amugath durft not repose such confidence in his forces, as to think that with his battell's divided and to weakned, he should be able to conquer that enemy, who had alwaies most valiantly fought against the monstrous and puissant Armies of his Ancestors, And therfore firmely G resolved with himselfe to send one only army, and so with his voited sorces to seek the over throw of the Enemy. And to preferring the strong hope he had conceived to conquer the country of Sirvan and the chief cities of Media the great before the difficulty of making war vpon the coast of Scyras, reposing also great hope in the notable help that was promised him by the Tartars called Præcopenies, he confirmed the great Bassa's his counsellers in the same opinion : and withall discouered vnto them a matter, which to all of them, but especially to Sinan feemed most strange, namely, That he was determined, not to goe himselfe in person with his Army, but to fend one of his worthiest Captains in his stead. The causes why heso did, were many; but especially, for that he was troubled with the falling ficknes, and feared greatly (and that not without good caufe) left his fon Mahomer, being much fauoured of the H people, might peraduenture in his absence be vntimely advanced to the Empire. Beside the dangers which he suspected at the hands of the Christian Potentates. And with a persuaded it to be vnto himself a great honour, to perform those things by his servants, which had for merly in those countries bin unfortunatly attempted by his most noble predecessors in their own persons.

Whilst they were thus consulting about the expedition, and the great Bassa's, Siman, Massa. pha, and others, made means to be sent as the sourraign ministers of their Lords designement, he dispatched away fundry posts and light horsmen, with order to the Bassa's and Gouernors of Van Babylon, and Erzirum, in the frontiers of his Dominions, That they should by often inrodes spoil the Towns and Castles of the Persians, and by all means to do them what harme 1 they could. Which they were not flack to put in execution, and especially Viref (or rather Hufreue) Bassa of Van, who with often incursions did much mischief, as wel an the countries that were tributary, as fubic of to the Persian King. A forcible preparative for greater troubles to enfue.

Now in this great preparation for the Persian war (which for many years after notably exercised the greatest part of the Turks forces, to the great quiet of the Christian Commonwealth) Stephen Bator the late Vayuod of Transylvania, but now by the commandement of Amurath become King of Polonia, in the beginning of his reign, by his Embassador thegreat Lord John of Syenna, entred into a Arong, league and confederation with the great Turkish Sultan Amurath at Constantinople. Which for that it sheweth in what termes that samous K kingdom then and yet standeth with the Turks great Empire, and withall containeth matter well worth the Christian consideration; it shall not be impertinent to our purpose comitting the great and glorious stile of that barbarous Monarch, seruing to no other end but to shew the greatnes of his power) plainly to fet it down, as it was on his part at the same time by him confirmed.

mali Eumel. Andof Christ 1577.

This league betwixt these two mighty princes Amurath and king Stophen thus concluded and after the death of Stephen, by Sigilmund the third renued ; as it was to the Polonian Kingdom for the time commodious, fodid it as it were with an Adamantine band fo tie that most famous kingdom, as that in the hardest distresses of the Christian commonweal, and most indeed conectaning it felf, it afforded no more help than did the members farther of, which (I rue to say it) was none at all. As in the infuing wars betwirt the Christian Emperor and the Turkish Sultans plainly appeared : wherin had it in due time given but such reasonable aid as it might wel haue spared, much no doubt might haue bin done for the repressing of the common Enemy, and the recourry of the greatest part of Hungary : but thus bound, stood as adead member, feruing to no other vie more than to the more speedy destruction of it selfe, C together with the rest of the sick body. For what assurance it had in that long, but euil assured peace, was wel feen, in that in the great confultation of this great fultan Amurath with his Baffa's after the Persian war, for the inuading of Christendom, the Polonians for al this legue fo folemnly confirmed, were nothing the more regarded, but laid in the same ballance with the rest, and preserved only by the Providence that all governeth, which leading the Turke against the Christian Emperour their neighbour, gaue them that peace they were otherwise hardly to have looked for. Vnto whom for all that (having to his endlesse praise maintained a long and most chargeable war) they lent little or no help, yet lying themselues still in the Lions mouth, and like enough to be the next (without Gods great goodnes) of him intended to be denoured. But leaving these the heavy conceits of a melancholy mind, and ominous forebodings of that I wish not : to return again toward Persia, Amurath's greatest care. Among many the ambitious competitors for the mannaging of these Turkish so great designes, was the great Bas. Mustapha chia. fa Mustapha (even he who in the reign of the late Emperor Selymus conquered Cyprus, carrying thence together with his victory, perpetual infamy for his faithles and cruel dealing with Bragadine the worthy and renowned gouernor of Famagusta) appointed General of the Turks army into Persia; and authority given him to provide what soeuer he should think needfull for so great a war. And commandment given vnto the Bassa's and other Commanders of the greatest part of the Turkith Empire Eastward, that they thould themselues with their foldiers of all forts, bound by their perpetual annuities to go to the War, in the beginning of the E Spring this year 1578, repaire to Erzirum, a City of Cappadocia bordering vpon Armenia, 1578

there to attend the commaund of their new General. Who having his dispatch from Constantinople, & for fashion sake conducted by most of the court over the streit to Scutari, and from thence passing through the countries of Amasia & Siuas, in the very beginning of summer arrived at Erzirum, and there stayd untill such time as his people, victuals, Artislery, and other his necessary prouision was come thither. From whence he departed for Sirvan, having first taken a diligent survey of his whole Army, mustring the souldiers of every Nation by Mustaphamus themselves: namely of the Mesopotamians twelve thousand, of the Assyrians and Babyloni-fierbia Army ans fourteen thousand, of the Syrians two thousand, of them of the lesser Asia (now comprehended under the name of Natolia) ten thousand, of the Iewes and Philistims one thousand,

F and of the Cilicians four thousand. After whom followed the soldiers of Grecia, the glory and hope of all the camp, valiant men, to the number of ten thousand; and after them the familiar and faithful gard of the General ten thousand Ianizaries of Constantinople, with harquebuses vpon their shoulders, and seimiters by their sides : of the City also of Erzitum and the jurisdiction therof, appeared four thousand, under the ensigne of Beyran Balla their general. Kkkk 3

All these were stipendaries vnto the Turkish Emperor; unto who mother voluntary; adventu. G rers joined themselves, in number not inferior to the rest, but better surnished and of greater courage. So that in this general furney of the Army were found about 12,0000 men, most part horimen: yet was there not any firred out of Arabia, Egypt, Africa, Hungary, or other places along it the fea coasts a neither were the provinces from whence these fouldiers were drawn, left destigute or vnfurnished of their ordinary garisons. Besides this multirude of men Mustapha brought with him 500 fmal pieces of Artilleny, with many loads of mony for his foldiers pay, with further order for the taking vp of more at Aleppo and other places, if his occasions should so require. He caused also great quantitie of corn to be transported byth great sea called in antient time Pontus Euxinus, to Trapezond, so to be conueyed to Erzinim being but four days journy distant thence. To be short, having taken order for all things he thought necessary for the war, he in seemly array departed from Erzirum, and in eight days a riued at the ruins of Chars, and in the fruitful country therabout rested himself. But he was there surprised with such a violent tempest of wind and rain, that it rent in sundergain Tents, and did great harm; by means wherof many fell fick, and were therby confirmined to forfake the Army.

Hauing staid three daies at Chars, the bounder of the Turkish and Persian Empire, he departed thence with his army, and that evening lodged under the mountains of Chielder, fupposed to be part of the hils Periardo, where hearing the Persians to be in Arms, he though it best for the security of his Army, so to pitch his tents, as that he might wel discouer the com-Mustapha cun- ming of the Enemy, and not to be affaulted at vnawares. And therfore planting himselse in the plain, he gaue order that Beyran Bassa of Erzirum should take possession of a certaine hill on the right hand and Dervis the Bassa of Caramit should keepe another hill that stood on the left hand : and with them Ofman Baffa, Mahamet Baffa, Mustaffade Baffa, aducaturers, with many others as wel stipendary as voluntary men, should likewife pitch their tents you the same hils, in such fort, as that they making as it were two wings to the Camp, might discourt the comming of every man, and yet he himfelf being shadowed with the two hils, might lye

Mahamer the new king of Persia, as yet scarsly settled in his kingdom, stirred up by the same of these motions, resoluted in himself to stand upon the desence of his state, and for stime to diffemble the conceived hatred which he bare to some of the Sultans of Persia, & Princes of K Georgia, and to make some apparant show that he was reconciled to them; for that without them he could not promife vnto himself any form of an army, or defence: wherin (not with standing all the troubled state of his kingdom) he wrought so cunningly, that almost all the great men of account took vpon them the protection of his state and kingdom. And so Tecome a Sultan, the Chan and gouernor of Reivan, a famous man, wel known to the Turks, and of great reputation among the Persians, was chosen General of this expedition, with charge, that gathering together the greatest number of men he could, out of Atropatia, Mediathe greates, and other places neer vnto the Turks, he should by all means possible stop their passage into Georgia and Media Atropatia. And therupon precepts were fent out into all parts of the kingdom, That all the Chans, Sultans, and foldiers what foeuer, should come ready prefit to at. I tend vpon their new General. Many obedient to the kings proclamation, came; but many there were that would not stir a foot, for their obstinacie in the broiles begun, and for the sufpition they had of vnlooked for mischiefs. At whose disobedience the king much griened: but now there was no remedy, but to make the best of the matter, and for the safety of his honor to make the best resistance they could. So with those few who for the love of their prince and country were met together in those parts, being not about 20000, Tecemac was dispatch about his busines, if haply he might with these smal forces oppresse the enemy in some small and troublesome passage, where the great multitude should rather serue to confound them. selues, than to help one another. These 20000 were all horsmen, armed with seimiter & bow, with some harquebusiers among, and furnished with very fine and wel tempered armour but M aboue all, couragious they were and resolute, and wel the more, for the valour and proweste of their General. So provided of all things necessary, they set forward, and keeping the way of Tauris and Genge, they came to the turning of Chars, where they were aduertifed that the Enemies army was already passed.

They were now come within a days journy of Chielder, when they fent quick and faithful feours to bring them certain newes of the condition and number of the Turks Army. Who came thither at the very time that Mustapha was incamping his army between the two hills. wherupon the two Baffa's Beyran and Dervis with their people had already pitcht their tents. These scours discouering the Turkish host alost, persuaded themselves that there was no other battel than those they saw upon the hils: Wherof with all speed they returned news to Tecemac, who at ease had followed these his scouts afar off. Tecemac thus mis-informed by his scouts of the number of his enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpose to affault them; and having discoursed their tents upon the hils, was throughly confirmed in the opinion hee had before conceited of the number of his enemies, and the scouts relation, and with so much the B more confidence fet forward to affail them. But Beyran and Dervis, who quickly from the hils perceived the Persians comming in the plain, although they knew them to be men of great courage, yet reposing an assured considence in their Generals battell, with all speed mounted voon their horses and ran to meet them. So in the aforesaid plains under Chielder, within one hour after noon was joyned a most bloudy battel, wherin at last were slain 7 of the Turks Sanzacks, with a great number of foldiers, without any apparant losse among it the Persians. who fighting close together in a great heat, and al bebloudied, vrged their happy and fortunat victory.

But Mustapha, who perceived all that had passed, and staid waiting til the fight was at the hotest, and the medly at the thickest, that so the slight of the enemies might breed the grea-C ter diforder, and now feeing that his people could no longer indure the fury of the Enemies rage (cuen as if it had lightned and thundred, and as though the earth had (haken) with (uch cries and acclamations as the Turkes vie in their affaults, for the more terror of the enemies. exciting his army, ran as it were headlong upon his aduerfaries, and forenued a most terrible battel. The Persians wonderful courage induring this vnexpected and dreadful assault with incredible figns of valor, in that little time of day light that was left (for the night began now to approch) continued their manifold flaughters, and at last being fauored by the darknes of The Personal the night, withdrew themselves with as little losse as possibly they could. Neither durs Mu. flapha any longer pursue them, but was glad by night to return to his camp. Of the successe of this battel the Persians certified their King as also of the greatnes of the Turkish Army with D their further purpose for anoying therof. And by the Turks also were presented to Musicapha (who had already sent news by posts to Amurath) 5000 heads, that by their color, countenance and beards bewraied themselves to be Persians, and 2000 Persians alive. Of this victory Muflapha greatly rejoiced, and to make it feem the greater (feeking by all means to conceale his own losses, and to raise a greater terror by the same therof among it his enemies) caused the heads of the 3000 that were brought before him aliue, to be presently cut from their shuol. A sulmerke ders, and gaue order that of those heads there should be framed a bulwark in those fields, beeds of the

for a most horrible and vncoth spectacle.

The same day that Mustapha applied himself about this barbarous and cruel worke, there came vnto him certain meffengers from Manucchiar, the yonger fon of the Georgian Widow E Dedesmit (a great prince in that country) who told him, That with his good favour and leave, Manucchiar their Lord and master was comming to salute him, and to offer himself vnto him as his obedient and denoted fervant. At which news Mullapha redoubling his joy, gaue commandment, That all the Bassa's and captains in the Army, with all solemn pomp, with Trumpets, Drums, peals of ordnance, with all other figures of munificall and joyfull entertainment. should go forth to meet the said Manucchiar, and to accompany him to his presence. Which they did accordingly, and so incountring him with all signes of honor, conducted him to the great paulion of Multapha, who there caused him again to be saluted with like triumph, Manucchiar dismounted from his horse, and against his wil beholding the strange & vncoth pile of heads all pale and filthy to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant; yet not-F withstanding before all other things, having don his due reverence to the great Bassa, and according to his degree placed himfelf next to his fide, after he had presented him with such Manuschiers gifts as his country yeelded, he gaue him to vnderstand, That for the honour & estimation he hapha. bare to the Turkish valor, he was alwaies denoted to the house of the Othemans, and as he had Oftentimes defired to found his goods and life in their feruice, fo at this prefent time, moved by his antient defire, allured by the firange fame of his wonderful and victorious Army, and G by his antient define, and the painfull and hard precepts of the art Militarie. under fuch a General, commander of other commanders, he offered him all deugtion; and fernice, more than euer he had don to any hertofore, and himfelf having nothing in the World dearer to him, confectated his own life to his commandements, defiring that the fame mishe be imployed in the conflicts of war under his banners, among warriers and foldiers of feme and renown; and therfore befought him to accept of him in the name of Amurais, whose obedien vallat he vowed himself to remain for euer.

iffal he vowed himself to remain for ever. Graciously did Mustapha receive all this discourse from Manucchiar, and having shewed him again thepile of heads, together with his battels, armor, and promition of war, fold him That as all those forces were the gift of God, who ever favored the righteous counsels of the ur Othoman Emperors, in such fort that they lord it ouer all the world, even to the astonishment of them that live in the world at this day; so had be for his particular chosen the better part in comming now to yeeld himfelf, & to fubmit his obedience vnto his Lord, although it had bin better if he had don it before, And as concerning the defire he had to be his companion and fellow in these warlike affairs, he did very friendly accept of his comming, and promised him all good entertainment and afford fafety. And so in exchange of the presents which he brought him, he apparelled him in cloth of gold, honoured him with a batel-axe, and targuer wrought with gold and ammel, and neuer permitted him to go from his paullion without a train of his flaves following him.

This Georgian Prince thus folemnly entertained, the General gaue order thorow the camp. That they should the next morning remoue from those mountains: and now every man was putting himself in readines, when as there rise a most terrible tempest of wind and rain, mixe with thunder and lightning, which continued with fuch violence for the space of four dayes together as if the heavens had bin dissolved into waters. Wherby it came to passe, that our of the dead carkaffer and heads before mentioned iffued a most horrible stink so that therby, and by the foulnes of the weather, with other annolances alwaies attending upon fo great a camp, the whole army was exceedingly troubled, and divers diseases arose among the Turks. But at last the weather breaking vp, Mustapha rife with his camp and set forwards toward Teflistand being not able by reason of the foulnes of the way to passe any farther, that day slave in the plains where the lake Chielder Giol flandeth, and there refreshed his sick and wearing K foldiers. Remouing thence, the next day about noon he came to the Castle of Archichelech. formtime a castle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his wars against Tamas, and ever fince holden by the Turks. Here Muftapha surveyed his Army, and by diligent acatuliapha fur- count taken, found himself to want 40000 of his foldiers wherof some were slain in the batveying bit Army, lacks forty tel, some were dead of sicknes, and many weary of so long and perillous a journy, were secretshouland min. ly ftoln out of the camp, and returned to take their rest at home. From thence the Army remoued, and lodged that night neer the marish called of the Turks Peruana Giol, or Lake of flaues; and the next day came to Triala, where at this day are to be feen the ruins of a great City and of many churches, wherof some are yet repaired and maintained by deuout Christians the reliques of those happy and religious forces, that with so great and faithful zeal past the !! the seas and mountains through those barbarous nations into the Holy land, men worthy of eternal praise. The next day the Turks ascended the high and craggy mountaine that stands vpon Teffis; from the top wherof descending the day following, they seised vpon a Castle of the Georgians, called of the Turks Giurgi Chala, Departing thence, and lodging incertain plains, the next day they came neer the river that runs by Teflis. But in these 4 dayes march from Archichelec, where Mustapha took view of his army, many of the Turks, who in seeking victuals for themselues and their horses had stragled from the army, were cut off by the Georgian captains, who with a number of their own country foldiers fecretly followed the Turks army, and wel acquainted with all the waies of the country, lay in ambush vpon such places as the victualers were to passe through, and so suddenly setting vpon them spoiled themat once M both of life and goods.

Mustapha comming to Testis found that castle emptys for that Daut Chan lord therof, hearing of the comming of the Turks, for fook the same and betook himself to the fields, prouiding better for himself in so doing, than by staying in the castle, to haue bin there taken pliA foner. This castle for the convenient scituation thereof Mustapha caused to be repaired and fortified, and planted therin an hundred pieces of artillery, and appointed Mahamet Balla Generall Gouernor of that place, with a garrifon of fix thouland fouldiers, which done, he departed for Siruan. At which very time those of Soria, which had brought a thousand loads of rent corn to the camp from Aleppo, being themselves in number a thousand persons, with 500 0thers of Omps (in antient time called Hus, the city of the patient lob) and other places of Soriamen neither of duty bound, nor of themselves willing to follow the camp returned homewards towards their owne country: but upon the way they were fet upon by Aleffandro, Ginfuf, and Dauid (three of the Georgian lords) and all flain except fome few, who by the swiftnes of their horses escaped with Nassardin their Captain.

Now after that Mustapha had passed the discent of the sleep mountaines of Testis, the next Alesante day he incamped in certaine low plains, where the Embassadours of Alessandro syrnamed the finds Embassa Great, sonne of Leuent, a Georgian Prince, came vnto him and told him, That their Lord was phi. ready, if it so pleased him, to come vnto him to do him reuerence, and by word of mouth to promise him that denotion he had alwaies in mind born to the Othoman Emperours. With a glad heart and cheerfull countenance did Mustapha receive these Embassadors: and presently fent them back, to will their Lord to come, and to tell him. That his friend hip should be vnto him most deer and acceptable. And after their departure, tooke order with all the Commanders of his army, to receive him with all the figns of joy that might be which at his comming was accordingly by them performed. Who after he had presented to the Generall the C richgifts he had brought with him, he offered his obedience to the Baffa with most lively speeches he could possibly deuise, calling Amurath his Lord: seeming to take it in cuill part. that he passed not through his territory, where he should (as he said) have had plenty of all things for the relief of his army; yet hoping that in his return from Siruan he would take it in his way, wheras he should find him most ready to bestow all that he had in the service of his lord:telling him moreouer, That although he could not for many vigent respects go with him into Siruan, yet he would alwaies accompany him in mind, and continually pray to the Creator of all things, for his prosperity & most happy successe. Courteously did Mustapha receive Austandiacus. both his presents and submission, and in exchange therof bestowed vpon him certain gifts af. treasfir merter the Turkith manner, and in magnificall terms gave him answer; promising him in his te-D turn to passe through his country; and so dismissed the Persian Duke with like honour wherewith he was entertained at his comming.

Mustapha holding on his journy towards Siruan, through moorish and troublesome wayese in twelve dayes after he departed from Teflis, came into the confines of Sirvan, neere to the river Canac, and there rested on this side the river one day. At which time they of the city of Sechi, bordring vpon the Siruanians and Georgians, foure days journy from Sumachia, came to offer themselues to Mustapha, as subices to the Turks. Of whose submission the Generall grationfly accepted, promifing to them his affured protection.

The Turks army ouerwearied with the continual travell of twelve days march, but yet fat The Turks army more afflicted with hunger, not finding in those parts so much as one wilde beast to assuage afflicted with their greedy defire of meat, fought by all means, every man for himself, to get somthing, espe-bunger. cially when they understood their General would passe the river into a Country unto them all vnknown where they were altogether uncertain what to find for their reliefe. So whilft they were inquiring among themselves, who was able to conduct them to some such place as whet they might supply their wants, behold, certain Persians were taken, who being streitly examined on that point, after much relistance at last told them, that not far off, after they had passed certain marishes, where Canac dischargeth it self into Araxis, they should finde many fields ful of rice and corn in the blade, and a little farther certain fat herds of cattel, fufficient to relieue the whole army. Of this news was the General certified who although he greatly doubted the subtilty of his enemies, yet to gratifie his foldiers, and to make them more willing to F follow him into Sirvan, he licensed every man that had a defire, to go and provide himself victuals, and so suffered all that would, to go freely. Wherupon there went of themselves, and were fent by their Captaines about ten thousand seruile persons, with Camels, Horses, and Mules, to fetch away this provision of Corn and Cattell. But the event answered not vitto their defires. For Tocomac with the other Persian Captaines, and the rest of the soldiers that were escaped from the ouerthrow given them in the plains of Chiefder, having gathered to. G gether the remainder of the army, and recovered fuch places as they thought fale and friend. ly for them, carefully attended the marching and passing of the Turkish army. And being cer. tainly informed by them of Reinan and Georgia, what way they kept, and that of necessity they must ariue at the banks of Canac, they began to deuise how they might in some measure be reuenged of their former loffe, and impeach their enemies entrance into Siruan. But wanting rather strength than courage to affail the whole army, they thought it best to stay in am. buth in fome fit place, vntil fome part of the Turkish army (allured with the prey of the com and cattel) should for the relief of their common necessities discend into those fields. And the rather to draw them on, fent out divers men, who as if they had gon about their own busines. and by chance at vnawares had lighted vpon the Turks camp, reuealed vnto them, as a great H fecret, what a good prey was hard by them. And fo withdrawing them felues out of fight, pri. uily awaited the comming of the Turks: when as within the space of three days it so fell out. that the aforesaid ten thousand forragers arrived at the wished place; where they had no soo. ner begun to charge themselves with the prey, but they were surprised by the Persians and all flain, fauing a few, who by hasty flight faued themselves. The noise of this hot skirmish being heard into the Turkish hoast, caused Mustapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out euen as indeed it was; and therfore rifing with his whole army, hasted with all possible speed to have succored the poor people, who were now all slain. And albeit he came not in so good time as to yeeld them reliefe, yet came he very fitly to reuenge their death vpon the Persians.

The place from whence the Turks were to have had the aforefaid booty, was almost in maner of an Island, inclosed with the rivers of Araxis and Canac: wherinto Must apha entted with his whole power, Deruis Baffa leading the one wing, as did Beyran Baffa the other, and hehim. felf comming on in the middle with the main battell. The Persians seeing Mastapha with all his forces hafting toward them, and withall remembring the late ouerthrow by them receiued in the plains of Chielder; began to bethink themselves how much better it had bin for them to have contented themselves with the late slaughter of the forragers, and with speed to have gone out of that streit, than by staying longer, to be inclosed with the multitude of their enemies, as that they could now no way escape without most manifest perill. In this perplexity discoursing among themselves, whether it were better to fly, or with so greatdif. K aduantage to join battell, and forather to die honourably, than to liue with reproach : at last they resoluted to referue themselves to the further service of their Prince & country, deeping it rather a point of wisdome than of dishonour, not to adventure vnto most desperat and affured death, so many worthy men as might in future time stand their country in good stead; yet tlid they not see how by flight wel to escape, for that they were in such fort strain'd within the rivers, as that there was no ground left for them to escape by, than that which contrary to their expectation was by the Turks already possessed. In these difficulties every man began to be-The leffat for take himselfe to his own privat conceit and fortune. Tocomac with Emir Chan and other the and in flying great commanders of the army, were the first that turned their backs, and by the help of their many of great commanders of the army, were the first that turned their backs, and by the help of their them downed couragious horses got over the river of Canaciwhose example moved many others to attempt [the like, though not with like fortune; for that their horses being not of such courage, and out of breath, lay many of them drowned in the river. Wherwith others being amased, as perceiuing incuitable death in flying, present before their eies, and reposing all their hope even in dispaire, ran as it were headlong in a rage and fury vpon their enemies, and in fighting shewed unspeakable valour:but what was one against an hundred a for there they were also all slaine, though worthy of immortall fame. Thus was the Persian army quite discomfited in this demie Island, being first stained with the bloud of the enemy, and afterward with the slanghter of the neighbor and proper inhabitant and so became the perpetuall sepulchre of a most conragious and warlike people. The Turks in this last conflict lost not about 2000 men, beside the flaughter of the 10000 forragers; although Tocomac to make his loffe to feem the more M collerable, made a report to the King of a great flaughter made. The Persian Captains full of forrow for this vnexpected ouerthrow, with the licence of their Generall departed enery man to his severall gouernment : as Emanguli Chan to Gengi, Serap Chan to Nassiuan, Tocana himselfe to Reivan, and all the rest to other Cities, to the government whereof they were be-

Ten thouland of the Turks fortagers flain,

A fore by the King appointed, and foremained expecting his further pleasure from Cashin. Multapha was now come to the river of Canac, which he was to paffe ouer into Sirvan. And therfore made streit proclamation through his whole army, That every man should be in readines against the next day to passe the river. At which proclamation all his people suddenly arose in a rumult, and with injurious terms even to his face reproved his folly and inhumaniey, propounding veter danger unto himfelf, and an universal confusion unto the whole Army: and therfore prayd him to furcease from proceeding any further, vales he were minded to cast them all away. But his resolute mind was not by their threats or intreaties to be removed neither gave he them other answer than this, That fo had Amurath commanded; and that if all the Arefoliuse rest should shew themselves unwilling to obey their Soueraigne, he himself would not nor could not, but sould not of Mustapha. would be the first manto attempt and perform that which they all so abhorred and reproned. Valiant sonl. diers (he faid) were discouered and known not in idlenesse and ease but in pains taking, and difficult enterprifes , who never ought to be afraid to change this momentary life for everlasting honour or to shunne death, if the service of their Prince so required: And for myne own part (faid he) I most earnestly request youthat after I baue attempted the paffage of the river, if any thing happen unto me otherwise than wel, yet carry my dead body to the other fide of the riversto the end that if I canot whill I yet line execute the command of my Soueraign, I may yet at least perform the same when I am but a speechles and liveles Carcas : for a fmuch as the defire of my Lord is not in any fort to be frustrated, for making too great account of myne own life.

Divers and fundry murmurings and wisperings followed upon this speech of the Generaliwho notwithstanding the next morning did first of all wade ouer the deep and swift River himself after whom presently sollowed the Bassa's with all their slaues: by whose example the rest also were induced at last to do the like, & so continued vntil the darknes of the night interrupted their paffage; by which occasion more than halfe the Army could not then get ouer. In this passage, being with great tumult and disorder attempted, about 8000 persons, 8000 Tarki caried away with the violence of the river, were miserably drowned, with the great outcry of drowned. all the host. The like hapned also to many mules, camels, and sumpter horses; Vpon whose backs divers persons being mounted, in hope to have passed dry over the river, were likewise headlong onerwhelmed therin. With great complaints and blasphemous cursings was the whole night fpent, by them that were yet on this fide the river, whose fears were not a little n increased by the example of their unfortunat fellowes before drowned. And like enough it was, forme pestilent sedition to have insued thereupon had there not a shallow foord by great chance bindifcouered, which gaue fafe paffage to those that were left. For in that paffage the people made in following Muftapha, the gravel in the bottom of the river being raifed & remoued by the heavy hoofs of the cattel, was driven down the river to a place where by great good hap there was also a foord, and there gathered together in a heap, had in such fortraised the depth of the chanel, that it made as it were a shelf for their commodious passage; so that the remnant of the Army, carriages, and artillery passing ouer the same, there was not so much as one man that perished. So having with much difficulty at length got over the river of Cavac, they refreshed themselves that day and the next, and there staid untill the whole Army E was mustred and again put in order. Remouing thence, the day following they incamped in certain barren champains where was neither corn nor cattel; neither could they perceive or Familia the learn, that in those quarters were any Villages at all. By means whereof the hunger of their Turks held. beafts increasing, they were inforced to give their horses and mules leaves and stalks of very dry and withered reeds, and such other like things of little or no sustenance at all: & the men themselues were fain to satisfie their hunger with those vemost reliques which they were fain to pick our of fuch poor victuals as now by corruption were become lothfom to mans nature: and that which was worse, they saw no end of these miseries they were so entred into. Notwithstanding there was now no looking back, but needs on they must, and follow the fortune of their leaders; among whom Must apha before all the rest set forward on his intended journy. F He had not long marched, but there was discouered good store of fundry plants, and shortly after, a very large plain Countrey all greene and flourishing, and garnished with many Trees. By the only fight whereof enery man was refreshed with the hope of reliefe, and with more The Twist Ari than ordinary place hasted, untill they were entred into those Champaignes, which aboun- my refusited. ded with all kind of Corne and fruits that could be of an hungry man defired. In this place did euery man fatisfie his appetite, and forgot in part the forepaffed calamities. Thorow this is fruitful and pleasant country Mustapha leading his Army, at last arrived at Eres, the chiefeire in that coast of Sirvan as you travel from Georgia.

This city of Eres was for faken of a number of her inhabitants, fo foon as it was known than the Turks were come to Canac, who all followed their great governor Samir Chan, who with Ares Chan gouernor of Sumachia, and other the gouernors of Sechi and other places of Sixvan, for fook the cities, and altogether withdrew themselves into the mountains, as places of more furety, attending the event of these so grear motions. So that as the Turk entred the city without disturbance, so were they with the prey they found therin nothing inriched; for in this common danger every man had caried away with him the best things he had. Here Mustapha staid with his army 22 days, during which time he creeked a fortres in the said City, H wherupon he placed 200 smal pieces of artillery, and for the keeping therof appointed Caites Baffa with an garifon of 5000 foldiers. In the mean time also he commanded Ofman Baffa(one of the voluntary captains) with 10000 men to possesse Sumachia, somtime the metropolitic cal city of that province, with the title of Visier and governor general of Sirvan. Giving him further in charge. That in any case he should cleer the passage to Derbent, and give present advertisements to the Tartarians, of his arrival there, whom he supposed by that time to bee come into those quarters, for that they had before so faithfully promised vnto Amerala, Oc. man comming to Sumachia, prefently feifed upon the City, and was friendly entertained by those that remained there : whom he likewise curreously intreated, without doing or suffing any outrage to be don upon them. Of which his curteous viage they of Derbent underflar. ding fent prefently to offer their city to him; befeeching him to receive it into his protect. on, and to defend them from the Perfians; under whom although they had long lived in fubicction, yet differed they from them in the ceremonies of their Mahometan superfittion, where in they better agreed with the Turks.

Muftapha veturnes out of SIYUAN.

Mustapha having thus brought the country of Sirvan into the Turkish subjection, and fininished his fortresse at Eres, and put all things in such order as hee thought best; importuned by the Ianizaries and the people of Grecia and fomwhat inforced by the feafon of the years, which was now far fpent departed from Eres, and turned his course homeward towards the country of Alexander syrnamed the Great, as he had promifed in his late passage to Sirvan, And having travelled a long journey, he fent before him certain Engineers and pioners to g make a bridge ouer Canac, so without danger to passe ouer his Army. Having passed the Riuer, he gave notice to Sahamal (one of the Lords of Georgia) of his arrivall : who prefently came and yeelded himfelf as Vaffal to the Turkes; and being entertained of the Baffa with great pomp, and rewarded after the Turkish manner, took his leave, and so returned into his mountain of Brus.

Mustapha setting again forward, and trauelling by night, because he would not lose the opportunity of the fair weather, by the error of his guids loft his way, and fo fell into rough and difficult passages, wherby he was inforced to wait and stay for day light; which arising, ald with a folemn excuse that he came not himself, because the infirmity of his body would not suffer him. Wherwith Mustapha rested satisfied, and leaving the city Zaghen on the right hand, caused the messengers of Alexander to guid him the way to Testis: which they so die Aly did, that within the space of three daies they conducted him thither with his army, with out the feeling any annoisance what focuer. From whence they returned, being wel towarded for their pains by the Generall Massapha. Who now comming to Testis, found the garatton M he had left there for the keeping therof to bardly pinched with famin, that they were glad to cat cats,dogs, heep-skins,& fuch like vnufual food: for neither durft they for fear of the Enter my go out of the castle to provide for themselves; neither if they had so don had it any thing manifest vnto them, that they were now entred into the countries of his friend Alexander and therfore he gaue forthwith proclamation thorow all the army, That no man should vpon pela [of death be so hardy to molest or disquiet any of the subjects of Alexander, but to have good respect vnto them, and to intreat them with al curtesse. The day following he stil travelled on in the same country, when there arrived from Zaghen certain Embassadors of Alexanders with great abundance of cattel, corn, fruits, and other relief fent for a prefent to the General, anailed, such was the carefulnes of the chemy in keeping of his things. But now by the carefulnes of the chemy in keeping of his things.

ming of the Generall they were relieved with meat, mony, and plenty of all things. Having staicd there two daies, he put himselfe againe vpon his way, and with fire and sword destroicd whatfocuer came in his way in the Champains subject to the said city : only the scoulchres of Simons progenitors (lord of that country) were left untouched by the Turks fury. The next day they trauelled ouer rough and ragged mountains, full of a thouland difficulties, which were the more encreased by wonderfull great snowes that were fallen: by reason whereof many foldiers, horses, camels, and mules perished. In which distresse the army continued two daics: during which time the fouldiers were fallen into fuch a diforder, that forgetting the feare of the enemies connery wherein they were, every man without regard tooke vp his feuerall lodging apart, some here, some there, where they might find either some thick bush or some small B cottage or fome quiet valley to fielter themselves in from the wind, the flow, and the florms. Of which disorder certaine Georgian Lords understanding by the scouts which from time to time waited upon the Turks army, joyned themselves together, and in the night secretly approched ynto it expeding the opportunity of performing fome notable exploit; and having observed. That Hosaine Bey had withdrawne himselfe with his regiment from the rest of the army under certaine mountains, to defend himfelfe from the Rome and wind; they tooke the occasion presented, and so assaling him, slew his slaves and all his squadrons took a great booty of many loads of mony and apparellized away with them all his horses, and what some els they could find, and scarce gave him leifure to save him selfe by flying into the tents of Bejran Baffa. The next morning the Turks removed, and in the cuenting came to a castle called Chiurchala, where they staied a whole day to make provision of vi Quall: which was attempted by fending abroad many of their flaues into the fields conducted by them of the castle, who were all miletably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this place the Turks army departed in great hunger ouer divers rough places of the Georgians, where they were oftentimes faine to jest themselves and at last came to the confiner of Deds mit of ther called the widowes countrey. Mustapha setting himselfe in Brzirum, dispatched posts with letters of plentifull adventife. ments to his great lord and mafter, of all things that had passed : not forgetting to magnife his own exploits aboue measure. He certified him of the battels he had had with the Persians. the obedience he had received of the Georgians and Sirvanians, the mutiny of his own foldi ers, the fortresse he had built at Hres, the garrisons lest in that city with Caitas Bassasanin Sin machia with Ofman Baffa: and in briefe, what focuer elfe had passed, and what focues he had the ken from the enemy. Neither did he faile to propound unto Amurath, what he thought come nient to be attempted the next yeare, for the firengthening of those places he had already conquered, and for preparing the way for new enterprises. And principally he put him in mind of a fortification to be made at Chars, a place very fit for any passage into Georgia or Armenia by scituation fruitfull and commodious both for men and cartell. And withall the senson him the widowes two fons, Alexander and Mannechiar, the Georgian Princes; certifying him of their submission, and that hee had received in their countrey all good entertainement and friendly welcome and withall declaring his opinion, That Manuchiar was the meeter mentor gouernment than his brother Alexander, and the readier to do him fertice. Greatly did American rath commend the valor and diligence of Multapha, and highly pleased himselfo with this conceit, That of these beginnings might grow mighty conquests, to the enlargement of his Em. pire, and that by this meanes he should be able to surpasse the glory of his predecessor. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about these wars, the lesse horroubled him. selfe with thinking how to annoy Europe with his forces.

It was not long after the departure of Muftipha from Eres, but that the Tattarians haufter left the fens of Moetis, and the warmountable thores of the Blacke fea, and having passed ones the rockes upon Cholchis, and furueyed the frozen crags of the mountaine Cancellus were now arrived vpon the confiner of Situan, and there attended the commandment of the Turke. And fo being loded with the spoiles, and weary with the slang hear of their enomies, they returned merrily toward Sirvan: & passing again over Canac, came to the higher fide of Bres into certain low champaigns, environed about with hils, & there having pitched their rents, without any feare fetled themselves to sleepe and to rest their wearied bodies.

In the meane time, and long before these actions, were newes come to the Persian court of Ci all the Turks proceedings I whereupon the Persian king having gathered new forces, had difpatched Emir Hamze Mirize his eldest some with 12000 souldiers to passe into Sirvan to see what hurt the enemy had done, and to attempt the reuenge of the forepassed injuries; but aboue all things to punish the vallany of them of Sechi, and the other cities of Siruan, that nor induced with any accessity, had so voluntarily yeelded themselves to follow the obedience and religion of the Turks. The Persian Prince departing from Casbin, accompanied with his mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloued fon, was on his way towards Situan, vn. der the guiding and government of Mirize Salmas, chiefe of the Sultans, and had now left behind them the countries of Ardouilland Caracach, when he was certified by the advertisements come from Ares Chan of the arrival of Abdilcherai, with his great number of Tartarians, D andwas thereby at the first fliucken into a great quandary, and almost out of comfort; yet prickt forward with an honourable defire of glory and reuenge, hee profecuted his intended enterprise of Siruan, and hastening his journey, came to Eres long before the king his father thought he could have fo done. This his notable celerity ferued him to great purpose, for that gree recounted Caited Baffa was boldly gone out of the fortreffe, and went fooiling the country, carrying away by the Perfect. with him whatfoener he met withall and committing fuch infolencies as hangry foldiers beyoud all honesty vie to do in strange and fruitfull countries. But when he was in the midst of these spoiler, and least foured the enemy, he was suddenly affailed by the Prince and having no means to escape his fury in this extremity, after a ficree and blondy battell (wherin the Turks although in number few, yet shewed many effects of valor) he was there slaine with all his foldiers, leaving the fortrelle, the spoiles, and the country committed to his custody, free to the pleasure of the victors which the Persian Prince having once againe gotten into his possessioon, tooke away the two hundred pieces of artillery that were left in the fort by Mafiabba, and prefencty sens them to Casbin to his father.

The Prince encouraged with to happy a beginning, leaving his mother at Eres, followed on his fourney coward Sulachia, but by the way descending the hile, he discoursed where the Tartarians lay incamped. VV hereupon lie flood in great doubt, whether to aduenture upon to mighty anenemy or to concent himfelfe with the victory he had already gotten, and fore retorne into Perfie : to return he thought too great a shame, and chose rather to adsenture himfelie so most manifest perill. And therefore descending the hill, and drawing nigh the enemy, be perceived that the army was all laid downe to reft, and that their horfes were fome con-

Of men who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians ouerthrow, but fill hoped of the returne, thought it best to entertaine the Prince with faire words wntill their comminguism therefore gave him courteous answer, That he was very ready to yeeld up the city a but wisheld intreated him, that he would flay but for three daies, and grant him sime to put all things in H readinesse, that so he might freely depart, as it had pleased him in cuttesie to offer. The Prince glad of fuch an answer, supposing it to have proceeded of a sincere meaning expedied of the Turke the performance therof. But Ofman meaning nothing leffe, than to commit himfelfe to the faith of his enemy, and feeing that the Tartarians whom he looked for, appeared not be resolued to saue himselfe by secret flight; doubting; as he had good reason, that if he should longer flay, to be berraied by the inhabitants of the city themsellies wand therefore somewhere before the affigued term of the three daies appointed for the furrendring of the city, he by the help of a dark night, and the couert of the high and rough crags, with great filence withdress himseiseout of Sumachia, carrying away with him all his substance and so in safety arrived at Sumathia reel. Derbent. The next morning the inhabitants of Sumachia opened the gates of thecity to the l ded valo ite Prince who seeing their infidelity, first by giving of entertainment to Ofman, and now by hele ping him to escape, without giving him any knowledge therof, did put in execution the effect of his wrath & indignation, which even at Casbin he had conceived in his mind against them. and with great cruelty did punish the miserable and unfortunate citisens, laying their houses euen with the ground, rafing both the old and new walls of that city of late fodofired a refair for the Turks. But when he was to depart thence the flood in doubt, Whether to goon to Dep bent, or to return to Perlia; the firength of that city, the approch of Winter; and the long journy he was to take homeward, perfuaded him to lay afide the enterprife for Derbent when upon he resolued to returne to Casbin, yet first to make his returne by them of Erecand Sec chi, and your them as your rebels to inflict well deferred punishment. turned to Casbin. Young Abdileberas the Tattarian was kept fafe in the Kings palace at Casbin but with fuch casse imprisonment as was agreeable to his calling; which was day by day so inlarged as that he feemed not to live as a prifoner, but rather as a companion of those of the county as it were in apparant liberty. By which occasion having infinuated himselfe into the loas of Jegunt the kings wife, he spent his time in courting her, and she again in entertaining of him in all sestes and couert manner. Yet these their mutual affections and interchangeable fauors passed not fo fecretly, but that in the court and all ouer the city it was a rife topoit! That the financialis is dy, prodigall of her honor, had participated both her bed and her felfewith the Kartanian fitfoner. Howbeit neither the King nor the Prince knew any thing of it. It is reported that the Queene was then flaine in the also murdered by them : certaine it is, that the poore lady after that day neuer law the light of The Perfer the Sun: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the king her husband, or Quenumate that the Sultans did it for the publike interest, is not certainely knowne. Vpon these murders forung vo many troubles, and much civil diffention, threatning the vtter confusion of the Perfian kingdome, to the fingular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous disorders the King by bridling his own affections, and the motions of his fon Emir Hamze Mirize, wel appealed. procuring at last a perfect vnity, as then most necessary for the defence of his kingdome.

Olman Balla being in Derbent (the only place of refuge now left for the Turks in Siruan) cea-R fed not with all carefulnesse to deuise what he possibly could, for the assuring of that country (of late won, and now againe almost lost) under the government of Amuraih. For the better establishing whereof, together with his owne safety, he thought it good to enter into friend. thip with old Sahamal the Georgian, lord of the mountaine of Brus, With this man did Ofman practife many tokens of good will; and he again interchangeably towards Ofman: whereupon there atole great friend (hip betweene them, at least wite in outward appearance: whereunto in short time there was added a strait knot of alliance: for that of man tooke to wife a daughter of the faid Sahamals, the greatest signe of his sincere loue towards him. Neuerthelesse shortly after Ofman upon some reasonable conjectures began to suspect (as indeed the truth was) that Sahamal for all the faire shew of friendship he made towards him, might for all that receive some C fecret order from the Persian king to betray him, and to free the city from the Turks, and so to reduce all that province vnto the antient devotion: in which jealous fuspition be was fully confirmed by the speeches of his wife, the daughter of Samahalawho rauished with the honor. valor, and riches of her husband, could not conceale any thing that the knew deuised against him, but frankly told him, That her father being fecretly reconciled to the Persian king, held friendship with him, and that letters went between them of great matters, and particularly of the affaires of Siruan. Hereupon the Baffa perfuaded himfelfe, that all the friend thip of Sahamal was but deep diffimulation, and the marriage of his daughter nothing but a meane to procure his death. Neuertheles, he made thew vnto his wife, as if he had made no fuch reckoning of it as indeed he did, but kept it in flore to his owne safety, and the destruction of Samabal. D whom for all that he ftill entertained with all honor and kindnesse due vnto a most louing father in law. But to preuent the malicious purpose of Samahal, having invited him according to the custome of a certain solemne feast, he acquainted certain companies of his most trusty and valiant fouldiers with his determination, enjoyning them, that as foone as Sahamal was entred into his court, even in the very difmounting from his horse they should all fall voon him, cut off his head, and put all his retinue to the fword. Which his cruell command was by them accordingly at Sahamals comming put in execution, he in lighting from his horse being slaine, sahamat gains, and all his followers murdred, when forthwith was fent forth by Ofman 2000 horsmen to spoile by Ofman. and facke all the country of the faid Georgian Lord, to the great maruell and aftonishment both of far and neere. The Persian king hearing of these news, tooke the matter grieuously, as E foreseeing that the recourry of that country and province of Sirvan would prove a matter of great difficulty, and fearing greatly that it would fill remaine (as indeed it doth) in the possession of the Turks. This was the end of the Turks attempts against the Persian in Siruan this yeare 1578, wherein they lost about seventy thousand men, denoured partly with the sword. and partly with famine and the other miferies of war. And fo VV inter comming on very tharply, every man withdrew himselfe from the field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had already gotten, vntill the comming on of the next Spring.

Amurath advertised by letters from Mustapha, of all that had hapned in the late expedition The consultation against the Persians, vpon these prosperous successes (which the Bassa had for the advancing of one of American his own credit described to be far greater than indeed they were) began to cast many deuises in F his head, touching such matters as were to be attempted the next yere. And first he thought it necessary to fend his forces again into Srivan to recover such places as were first conquered by Mustapha, but afterward againe subdued by the Persian, so to establish his government in that country. But vpon better confideration, he ceased further to think of that matter, for the great hope he had conceived of the aid that was promifed him by Tatar Cham, who had faithfully LIII 2

affured both him and ofman, that he would ouerrun that province anew, and do great matters G in furtherance of the Turks defignes : all which for all that fell out to be but windy words : yet in respect of this hope he laied Sirvan aside, and committed the desence thereof to the falls promifes of the Tartarian, and the valour of Ofman. And placing his ambitious defires with more haughty thoughts, he began to deuise with himselfe, for sending his army directly to Tauris, there to erect a fortresse; which being throngly fortified and furnished with a garrison of most valiant soldiers, should neuer be again subdued by all the power of Persia, and by this meanes to keep in subjection all those great countries betweene Tauris and Erzirum, Which his conceit being of great weight and importance, was much increased by the persuasion of others very inward with him; every man being almost of opinion, That it was an easie matter for fo great an hoaft in few daies to performe that feruice, and to pierce, not only into Tauris, H but further to passe whithersoeuer he would easily desire. Yet after he had more deeply confidered of an enterprise of fo great importance, and with more indifferent judgement compared his own forces with his enemies, he began to find many difficulties and dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious defires he at the first saw not : for beside the length and tedjousness. of the journy, he doubted that in fending his army for Tauris, it might be on the one fide affailed by the Georgians (of whose obedience he had as yet no great assurance) & on the other fide by the Persians, and so brought into great danger; which he was alwaies to seare, when so euer he should haue occasion to send new supplies vnto the sortresse by him intended at Tau. ris. Whereupon laying afide all his former conceits, as too eager and perilous, he refolutely concluded with himselfe, first to make sure his own borders, and afterwards by little and little to enter into the enemies country, still fortifying in couvenient places as he went and fo fine. ly, although but flowly, to triumph ouer his enemies, rather than by thrusting his army head. long voon vocertainties, into places strongly fenced both by nature and the power of most mighty enemies to be inforced with shame to abandon the enterprises so hastily begun.

Of this his resolution he advertised Mustapha by writing; giving him in charge, against the fulto purinex- next Spring to provide all such things as should be necessary for the building of certain forts vpon the way that leadeth from Erzirum into Georgia: that having made those waies sase, and brought the people vnder his obedience, he might afterwards attempt greater matters. Whereupon Multapha presently directed forth precepts to the cities of Aleppo, of Damasco, Caracmit, & other places of Syria and Mcfopotamia, for the taking up of cunning workmen, K of pioners and fuch like to the number of 20000; and likewise wrote to all the countries out of which he had raifed his army the last yeare. That all their foldiers, (yea, and in greater number alfo) (hould be in readinesse against the next Spring, to returne to the wars. The rumour whereof he caused euen to be spread as farre as Ægypt. He commanded also the taxes and tenths of those countries to be collected, and further, yield the chambers of Aleppo, and other places, for such masses of mony as he thought necessary for these purposes.

In this while the two Georgian brethren, Alexander and Manucchiar, fent (as we have before faid) by Mullapha to Amurath at Constantinople, in doubtful hope expecting the end for which they were both fent vnto the court, were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Mahometan religion: whereunto Manucchiar easily yeelded. Whereas on the other side Alexander L. surucib Turks. his elder brother could by no allurements or means be induced to consent to so infamous and Alexander con. damnable a change of his religion, although he knew he should therefore be deprined of his state: but protesting his obedience at all times to Amurath, and his love to his brother; requested only, that he might but as a privat man go and live in his countrey, there to be buried amongst his ancestors. Which his request the Turkish Emperor referred to the discretion of Manucchiar, to do therin as he faw good: who consented thereunto. Hereupon Manucchiar was circumcifed, and the name of Mustaffa given him, with the title of the Bassa and Governour of Altunchala, and of all his mothers and brothers countries: and being thus created a Turke, had his brother Alexander a Christian, committed vnto him, and so both returned into their owne

Now in the Persian court at Casbin, were many consultations had for the repressing of the inuations of the Turks. And among others carefull of those matters, Emanguli Chan Gouernor of Genge, doubting to lose his honourable gouernment, by reason of the late sacke of his city, and spoile of his country by the Tartarian; by those plots that were dayly in contriuing for

A the fending of men into Siruan to impeach the defignments of Ofman Baffa, & if it were posfible to drive him out of Derbent; took occasion to offer to the King, vpon pain of his head to defend Siruan and not to suffer Ofman the Turk to attempt any new fortifications, or further conquests in that Prouince. Of which his offer the king accepted, and therupon the gouernment of Genge, & guarding of the country of Siruan against the forces of Ofman, was trankly committed vnto him: And commandement given to the Governours of Tauris, Reivan, and Nassiuan, and to divers other Captaines that were neerest, to be ready at all times with their power to affift Emanguli Chan, if it should fortune either the Tartarians or Turks, with any great power to enter into Siruan; which order so taken, was thought su fficient for the security of that Province.

But how to protect the Georgian Countrey, was thought to be a matter of greater importance, every man being almost of opinion. That some great power of the Turks should bee fent thither, for the more affurance of the conquest therof already begun, and for the succour of the fortresse at Testis, which must needs otherwise fal againe into the hands of the Georgians. This matter fo troubled the Persian king, as that he seemed to have bent his whole counfels and thoughts therupon: when Simon a Georgian a famous captain (somtime prisoner with Ismabel the late King, at Cahaca, and by the familiaritie he had with him, seduced from the Christian faith; for defence whereof he had in the time of King Tama, chosen to live depriued of his liberty and state) thinking it now a fit time to obtaine at the Kings hands such help as he had long defired, for the recovery of his dominion viurped by David, otherwise called C Pant Chan, his yonger brother (who for the obtaining thereof of King Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Christian religion) offered now vnto the King his faithfull seruice, for the defence of that part of the Georgian Country wherein Teffis stood (being in right, part of his own inheritance) against the Turks: reprouing by way of difgrace, his younger brother of cowardife, and promifing the performance of great matters in himfelfe, both for the defence of that cuill defended country, and further annoying of the enemy. With great content did the "mon whit & he possessed before whilest he was a Christian : and sent with him Aliculi Chan into Georgia, of Giorgia. with five thousand horsemen, and certaine pieces of artillery taken at Eres, when Caretas Bassa was flaine. Simon afterwards comming to Georgia, was joyfully received of his countrymen, D and there pressed about three thousand soldiers of his owne and of his neighbours; excusing himselfe that he was become a Persian, not because he preferred the Mahometane superstiti. on before the Christian Religion; but only so to be deliuered from his long imprisonment. and by that meanes to maintaine his estate. And in this order were the affaires of Georgia as fured and strengthned in the best manner that might then be.

Now began the Spring to approch, and every man prepared himselfe to the discontinued 15 7 Q trauels of the wars begun; and now were met together at Erzirum, out of all the wonted pro. The meeting tominces, all the Turks forces , with all things necessary for the intended war. With this army, giber of the in all things equall with the first, Mustapha set forward, and in twelvedaies came to Chars, Ergiram. not perceiving in his foldiers any signe of discontentment at all. And for a smuch as here they E were to stay, and to fortifie both with wals and ditches that ruinated City, and that with as great speed as was possible; there was no remedy, but that beside the pioners and engineers that were brought for that purpose, many of the Spaoglani, yea, and of the lanizaries also, must be fet to worke. Whereupon they all suddenly in a tumult, began with bitter protessarions to tell the General, That their stipends wherwith it pleased the Sultan to fauor them, were not bestowed upon them to imploy their forces and vertues in such seruile works; but onely with their swords and other weapons, to exercise that force and hardinesse for which they were effected worthy of that honour. Whereunto the Generall answered in most haughty termes, and not yeelding one jot to their inciuility, but vling all meanes of authority and terrour, brought them to worke so much as he desired. So that within the space of 23 dayes the chars foreified F towers and wall were erected, the ditches digged, the artillery orderly planted vpon the walls, thates and the water brought round about it. Many inconveniences hapned in the army while they were busie in this worke; and namely upon the 25 day of August, when they had almost euch finished the whole building, the souldiers endured a most sudden cold by reason of the snow snow actors that then fell in great abundance.

Persian King consent to the request of Simon, and named him Chan of all that Kingdom which for the defense

Chars

Chars thus fortified, the Generall resolued to send succors into Georgia to Testis, without G which it was most certaine that the fortresse would be yeelded to the Georgians but in what fort to relieue it he remained doubtfull. To fend pare of his army with some valiant appaire feemed dangerous, and to go himfelfe with all his forces, would found (as he thought) to his differedit with his great Lord and Master, whom he had already made beleeue, that he had subdued the Georgians, and brought all that prouince to his obedience and deuotion. In this ambiguity, the desire he had to preserve his credit with Amurath prevailed; and so he made choice of Hassan Bassa son to Mahomet principall Visier of the Court, a gallant gentleman, and of great valour, to whom he deliuered betweene eighteene and twenty thousand foldiers; joy. ty thousand to Of Breat various to the futer in futering of ning vnto him one Refuan Captaine of certaine aduenturers that voluntarily offered them. felues to follow the forces of Haffan, a ffigning vnto him likewife forty thousand duckats, and many loads of rice, meale, and barley, with other things necessary both for diet and war, and so fent him away for Teflis.

Hastan with this charge set forward, fully resolved to put these succours into Tessis, or to lofe all and at length came to the famous streit of Tomanis, where the our growne woods on the one fide, and the deep vallies & craggy rocks on the other, would aftonifh a right confident beholder. When voon the fudden, the Perfians & the Georgians, under the conduct of Alicali Chan and Simon, at vnawares fet upon the Turks, and joyned battell with them. For these wo valiant captains remaining for the most part in the borders of Testis and Tomaniswith 8000 foldiers, waiting for some opportunity to annoy either of them of the fort of Teffis, or else fuch as should come to their succors, understanding by their espials, of the comming of Hallan with this aid, had scattered themselues all along it the said fireight, in hope there to affaile the Turks, and holpen by the advantage of the place, to drive them headlong into the deep valley, and at once to be reaue them both of their goods and life. But Haffan carefull of nothing more than how to avoid that danger, chose rather to make his journey through the thicke woods. and so as he might to escape the ambush that the enemy might lay for him vpon that streight The Perfances passage. And so entring with his army into the wood, which he was to have left upon his left hand, to discover what might be plotted against him, he was hardly charged by the enemy, and constrained to fight with a thousand windings and turnings in & out, thorow a thousand croopresently staine. And thus with much ado he at length passed the streit of Tomanis. Hallandee. ming himselfe much disgraced, by suffering his enemies, in number so far inferior, to have don ces fleights & stratagems more availe than open forces; burning with defire of revengewould with certain bands of the foldiers of Grace, and of his own adventurers, to lie in ambush within the couert of the fireight, attentiue to every fir of the enemy. Two daies the Turks army was for feare of the Persians, foolishly returned and gaue a fresh onset vpon the flanke of Has-The Persians o- sans squadrons. Who forthwith raised all his souldiers, and giving a signe to Resian, with all speed compassed in his enemies, and streightening them on both sides, tooke some of them Aliculi Chan The mifers of many miferies; whereof some were already dead, and some yet sicke : for they were so plagued abstructings with famine, that they not onely denoured their horses, but even the very skinnes of the lame M horses, of theepe, and of dogs, and in such most miserable wants had passed the time : whom Haffan at his arrivall comforted with gifts and good words; exhorting them to perfift conflant in the service of their King, whose honour (as he said) was never more than there to be respected. And for as much as the souldiers of the Fort did with one voice request Hastanto ked paths and doubtful cranks, in a most confused medly, with great slaughter of his menumbo not accustomed to this kind of fight, nor acquainted with the scituation of the place, were in X the skirmish driven so far, that downe they fell, and being not able to recover themselves, were him so much harme, and so to have escaped his hands; and further, considering that in such planeeds stay neere unto those streits, as if it had beene to refresh his wearied army, but indeed to try if the Persians would adventure againe to trouble him, or no : and appointed Resum Bassa lay thus divided, and were now resolved the third day to remove thence towards Tessis: when I as the Persian captaines Aliculi Chan and Simon, vainely imagining that this stay of the Turks aliue, cut in pieces othersome, and put all the rest to flight. Among others that were taken aliue, was Aliculi Chan the Persian Captaine, who ouer rashly charging upon the face of Hasfan, fell into his hand. The next day following (being the eleventh day after Haffans departure from Chars) he joyfully arrived at Teflis, where he found among the poore belieged Turks spoont them's new Gonernor, because they did all millike Mahamer Baffa , who the left verre was left By the General in that fort , Haffan tempued the faid Midhamet, and put Amous all in Misblace and to bree he had filled by the places of the dead fouldiers with a new supplement Tet all things in order, he tooke his leaue, recommending the charge and cultody of that for to their trust and valor. Hasan returning from Teffis, and being without any trouble come to the Melt of Tomanis, was advertifed by his foouts, That it was firongly possessed by the enemiviand to thur vowith areillery, as that it was not to be passed through ; for Sinter thinking fas indeed it fell our) that Haffer would returne that way, had so belaicd that streit; as that the Turks could not without most affured losse passe the same; which thing much troubled the Baffa, and filled his head with many conceirs, how he might make his journy fome other way. n and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtfull what to do.or which way to turne himfelfe, Alienli Chan the Persian (who to purchase his liberty could have beene content to have done any thing) offered Haffan to thew hima thort and fafe cut. whereby he might without danger paffe with his army out of that troublefome country , ves Ethenanting before, that he should promise him to fet him at liberty for his so good service. Which his request the Bassa did not flicke in large maner to promise, although he afterwards ed his vient dishonor performed not the same. So bending his journy on the right hand, he was guided by Alieuli through firange and vincouth waies, out of those woods and dangers, not meeting so much as with any one of his enemies. But when the Persian Duke well hoping for his liberty, put the Turke in minde of his promife, he with deep and feigned fights professed, That he was right forry that he could not performe what he had promifed to do for him, forasmuch as it lay not in his power to fet any man at liberty, that was taken in battelf by the foldiers of his great lord and fouereigne : yet gaue him his faith, that fo far as his in-nest means he could, to procure his liberty and returne to his own country. Simon the Georgian perceiving that the Turks were removed, imagined forthwith, that they simon definite had taken this new way : but being afterward certified by his faithfull spies, that it was fo in- thereward of deed, he ran all headlong, & as it were desperat, to meet with this so happy an army. And al in. Haffan Army. flamed with rage for this great fortune of the Turks, he fel voon the taile of the Turkish hofts bimbis treasure which with vnmeafurable fury be wholly destroicd, leading away with him all the people, all n the horses, and all the treasure of Mahamet Baffa which he brought from Testis, and all the treasfure of Hallan Balla likewise. As for Aliculi Chan, whom Simon most greedily sought for, he was fent away in the front of the army, so that he was not to be rescued. Hallan bolding on his way. came to Chars in the space of eight daies after his departure from Tellis, and there presented vnto Maftapha the Generall, the Persian captaine Aliculi, recounting vnto him the danger he had induted, and what soener els had hapned in that expedition. Alicali the vnfortunate Perfian was by the commandement of Mustapha carried to Erzirum, and there in the castle committed to prison. Not long after, Mastapha returned himselfe also to the faid city of Erzirum, with Mastapha rehis army fore weakned and discontented, which was there presently by him discharged.

Of all these successes Mustapha afterwards sent aductissements to the court to Amurath tecounting vnto him the fortifying of Chars, the deferts of Haffan, as well for the succouring of Teflis, as for the taking of alicali the Persian. At last happens this opportunity for Sinans who taking the occasion of many complainers against Multaphacaused great number of them to frame their supplications to Amurath, which he for his wart did in most malignant maner inforce and exaggerate against his old adversary; accusing him, That sinan accusion this second year he had most manifestly shewed himselfe to have gon vnto the Wars not as a Amurath. worth / General desirous of noble and honourable enterprises, but as a man that would make R merchandise of bloud, and of his foldiers payes, imploying the most liberal provision of corn and money not as the rewards of well descruing men, not to the erecting of such fabrickes as were needful, and might have bin built therwithal, but onely to his own proper gain, so to inrich himself with his peoples losses, to the great shame of his Lord, and consuming of the publique treasure: adding herunto. That if the things don by Mustapha were well searched, it would be found that he had neglected many good opportunities, attempted many things in vain, and not don any good either to the Emperor or his foldiers, but only to himfelf. Whom rather than they would follow again as their General, al his people in an yprore shewed themfelues ready and willing to aduenture themselves to any other far greater labour that by their Lord and Soueraign (hould be commanded them.

Thefe and fuch like complaints, with the hard opinion already conceiued against him by Amurath, were the occasion why he resoluted to put him from his place. Besides that, he suppofed it a thing dangerous to his flate, to fuffer one and the felf fame General any long time to command ouer fo great armies; deeming it not fo much for his honor, stil to imploy one man, as to shew that he had varietie and choice of subjects worthy of so great a charge. Wherfore 10, Leunch in being desirous to find out the truth of that was reported unto him concerning Mustapha, hee supple Annal. fent the chief of his gentlemen porters with fifteen others, to bring him to the court, with his Chancellor and Treasurer, to shew the accounts of such monies as he had received, & to give vp an account of their whole office. Vnto this messenger had Amurath delivered three divers letters, which he should warily shew as occasion served one of them was so written of purpose that Mustapha in the receiving therof might by the same messengers be strangled : in the second was the Emperours warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded; and in the third was contained. That Mullapha (hould forthwith fend his Chauncellor and Treasurer to the court by these messengers. Mustapha in the mean time by divers means, but especially by the guilt of his own confcience, venting the emperors displeasure toward him, and suspecting (as the truth was) his life to be by those messens sought after at such time as the Captain porter came to his camp, found many delaies to put him off, and would not in any case be spo. ken withall. But when the meffenger would endure no longer delay, he was at length admirted to his presence, having a circle appointed for him, out of which he and his companions might not fir, or approch necessivito him, the Baffa's gard standing in arms round about him. E The meffenger perceiving the Baffa's warines, willly pluckt forth the third letters, touching the fending of his Chancellor and Treasurer to the court. Then began the crast vold Bassa ro find many excuses to have delaied the matter; but being hardly prest by the messenger, and feeing no other remedy, he with much difficulty deliuered them both; couenanting first with the messenger, to have their lives spared. Who comming to Constantinople, were forthwith clapt fast in the tower called Iadicula, as there to have bin severely examined of al the Bassa's doings. But Mustapha after long delay comming at length to Constantinople the 9 of Aprill Mustaphane. the Spring following, and whing the mighty and potent mediation of divers great Ladies and conciled to Aother his gracious friends in court, prevailed fo much in that corrupt government, as that hee was again at length received into Amaraths favour, without any further proceeding against him, his Chancellor of Treasurer, who by his means were afterwards also inlarged & set at liberty syet was he never after admitted to those honors which he persuaded himself were of right due vnto him, for his good and faithful feruice of long time don to the Otheman Em.

In this time that Mustapha was General at Erzirum, Muhamet the Visier Bassa was trea-Mmmm cheroully cherously slaine at Constantinople, after whom shortly after died also Achmet Bassa, who suc. G ceeded in his place: fo that the foueraigne dignity, in honour next vnto the Turkish Emperour, was by rightfull succession due to Mustapha the next Bassa; but that he was not thought worthy of it by him that might, and of right ought, to have gratified him therewith, as shall be a little hereafter declared, when we have briefly fet downe the fudden and strange death of the faid Muhamet the Visier, worthy in all Histories to be registred, as a mirrour for all such as administer instice in so great place, to look vpon.

Baffa Muba-

This Bassa, a man of as great same as ever was any that had government in the Othoman empire, in the time that he all commanded, had for some light causes deprived a certain souldier of Constantinople, of his yearely pension, which with many labours and dangers he had gotten to maintaine himselse; which pension, the Bassabestowed vpon another souldier, so that tr the other poore foule remained in misery, altogether unprouided for. Vnto which miserable estate seeing himselfe now brought, and not guilty to himself of any fault worthy so great punishment he determined with himself to revenge the injury with the bloud of that great Basfa, and to bereaue him of life, that had bereft him of living: which because he could not by any fit means put in execution (by reason of the guard of slaves that keep the person of the Visier. fo that no man can come neere him that holdeth that high place) except he could by some means acquaint himself in the Visiershouse, and so infinuat himself into his acquaintance, he resoluted to take you him the rude habit of those religious which the Turks call Depuissars and after their manner to present himselfe every morning before the Visier to aske his almes: and to be did counterfeiting withall a certain kind of folly and lightnes of mind, as do those I Deruislars, to make the people beleeve, that they contemne all worldly things, as men raujthed only with heavenly cogitations; which yet was by fome that knew him, thought to have hapned in him, through the griefe he had conceived for the loffe of his stipend, Muhamet not only the first time, but also at all other times that this counterfeit hipocrit came before him, caused him to be comforted with his almes, and as it were with a kind of privat stipend enioined him every morning to come to him into the Divano, and there together with others anpointed for the same purpose, to say his demout prayers, and in singing praises to their wicked Prophet, to intreat God for his faluation: for it is a custome of all the noblemen, that at ordinary hours of prayers, all their priests assemble themselues in the Diuano, which is made ready for them, and there all together the Infidell wretches, do with their vnclean mouths mumble up their superstitious praiers, or rather most abhominable blasphemics. By this means did this diffembling companion so infinuat himself into the Visiers acquaintance, that the counterfet foole went in and out of the Diuano at his pleasure, no man gainsaying either his going in or comming out, but daily fat in the presence of the Visier, 28 so having said his payers, and taken his almes, with al reverence quietly departed. At last when the crafty hypocrit thought that the time was come wherin he might most fitly execute his purpose, having vtterly resolued with himselfe to die, so that he might satisfie the desire he had of reuenge, so long couertly fostred in his heart; having conveied a very sharp dagger secretly into one of his seeues, he went according to his custome, to require his almes, with an assured resolution (when hee had faid his praiers, and reached out his hands to receive his woonted almes) speedily to charge L vpon the Visier, and with the dagger to strike him to the heart. According to the accustomed mannerwas the counterfeit hypocrit (for who would euer haue suspected so long and sotraiterous a designment) admitted into the Diuano, where Muhamet the Visier fat in his house, to giue publick audience, and after the viual maner, before any of the futors that attended for anfwers and dispatch of their busines suspected any such deceir, he was admitted neer to the Vifier, and fitting right against him, according to his old wont poured out those vain denotions which those hypocritical Barbarians vse to mumble up in their praiers: which being finished, whilst the Visier simply reacheth vnto him his wonted almes, the traiterous villaine in receiuing it, suddenly drew out his dagger, and once or twice stabbed it into the Visiers breast, out of which fo deadly wounds gushed our his bloud and life together. Wherupon the standers M by aftonied with the ftrangenesse of the act, ran in, but lo, the old hoary Visier lay all soiled in his own bloud, deadly pale, and breathing forth his last gasp. The mischieuous murderer they presently laid hands vpon, & bound him fast:but the rumor of the strange fact did by & by fly to the Emperors ears: who suspecting that some of the other great Bassa's desiring to mount

A into that high dignity, had prouoked the traitor to do this deteftable act, would needs underfland of the traiterous murderer, what occasion had moved him so trecherously to kill his Vifier. Who resolutely answered him, That he did it to deliuer the city of Constantinople from the tyranny of him, by whom he was undeferuedly deprived of his pension. But when he could get no other answer of him, he delivered him into the hands of the slaves of the dead Visier. who with most exquisit torments put him to death.

Muhamet thus dead, after him succeeded Achmetes the next Bassa, who (as is before said) shortlu after died alfo, fo that it was now Mustapha his course to succeed in that chief room, for that he was the third in the order of the Bassa's. But when he had vsed at the means that he possibly could to have obtained that fo honorable a place by order due vnto him; yet could be not find B so much grace in the fight of Amurath his great Lord, as to have it granted him under scale. although in effect he made him fit as Visier, and all matters of state were brought vnro him as chief Vizier; but in his flead the seale was fent to Sinan Bassa, who was now made Generall for the Persian wars. Which disgrace not a little discontented Mustapha, fearing lest some other frange accident should in short time light vpon him.

After that Multapha was thus displaced from his Generalship, Amurath nominated Sinan 1500 Baffa to be Generall in his stead for this expedition against the Persians, and for the preserva- sinan nessa tion of Chars and Teflis, giving him soveraign authority to command, and to set in order all the Persian fuch preparations as he should think necessary for such enterprises as he should thinke good warre. to attempt in his first yeare: who although by reason of his great fauour, he grew haughty and C glorious, yet did he not foreflow to discourse throughly with himselfe vpon all his designements; and namely, befide the fuccouring of Teflis, he determined to build a fort at Tomanis, to affure the paffage thither from Chars; and withall to attempt all the means he could to induce the Persian king to send Embassadours for peace, with such conditions as should be acceptable to Amurath. With these and such like discourses did he busic himselfe whilst he was yet making preparation to fet forwards toward Erzirum.

Of all these changes and alterations was the Persian King advertised, as also that this new Turkish General Sinan was careful, how this long war might by some means be appealed, and a good peace concluded. Vpon which occasion & by the persuasion of Leuent Ogli the Georgian, and of MiriZe Salmas the Visier, he was induced to send embassadors to Constantinople, The Persian to demand peace of Amurath. Vpon which resolution he dispatched Maxet Chan (of some King serules) called Maxudes) his Embassadour, with direction that he should go to Sinan, and of him to re- Waxus (ban his Embassadour) ceiue guids to conduct him to Constantinople with letters to Amurath, and as much as lay in to Amurath. him to labour for the pacifying of all these troubles: and in any case to conclude youn it, so that he would be content with Chars and Teflis. With these instructions the Embassador departed, and at length arrived at Chars, and so came to Erzirum, and was from thence condu-Red towards Amasia. But when he came to Siuas, he found Sinan the Generall there incamped, gathring together his army for the execution of his designments; for Sinan you the arriual of Mustapha, departing from Constantinople the 25 day of April, was now come so far on his way. Of the comming of this Embassador, the Turks received great ioy, and news therof E was in post fent by Gicala Bassa to the Court. The Persian Embassadour informed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalf of King Mahamet, and laboured carnefly to persuade him, of the equity of the cause, and of his request : declaring to him, That forasmuch as both the nations were conjoined under the law of Mahamet their common Prophet (though there feemed fome smal difference not worth those troubles) it were a very inconvenient thing for them to contend among themselues, and to seek the overthrow or vtter destruction of one another; and that therfore he was in good hope to obtain of Amurath this defired peace, if he had no other cause wherwith he found himself agricued as in truth he had not. Wherefore he belought the Generall, that he would with safe conuoy conduct him to Amurath, to the end that if it were possible, these bloudy wars might take end, at the very report wherof, the rest of the world rejoyced, and flood attentiuely waiting to fee what would be the iffue thereof.

This embassador, Sinan entertained after the best manner the rudenesse of his nature would afford: and thinking that the very fame of his valor, had wrought in the minds of his enemics this refolution to come to demand peace, granted vnto the Embassador a sure convoy to conduct him to Constantinople, and wrote to Amurath in his letters, all that he thought was fit to G be demanded, representing to him what great and important matters (he hoped) might now Theadmonition be obtained. But before he dismissed the said Embassador, he aduised him not to go to Amu-Theadmonition De Obtained out of the Amaof Sinante the rath, without resolution to offer vnto him some great good conditions, and to yeeld vnto him all that countrey which he by force of armes had before conquered : for he knew the mind of Amurath very wel, that he was resolued in himself, not to yeeld so much as one hand bredthof that ground which he had woon with the fword. Which motion of the proud Baffa fo trou. bled the Embassadour, that fearing he should not be able to conclude any thing, he stood in doubt, whether to proceed on his journy to Constantinople, or to return back again into Perfia: but confidering better what belonged to his duty in fo weighty a busines, and hoping to receive more reasonable conditions from the mouth of Amurath himself, he gave large words H to Sinan, and so with a safe convoy departed from Siuas, and by long journies came to Scute. ri, and so passing over that little streit, the sourth of August arrived at Constantinople,

The Persian King in the mean time, stirred vp with the report of the Turks preparations to an ting againg cause it to be notifed, that he likewise intended some important matters, commanded all the the Turks.

Chans and Gouernors of his kingdom to meet together with all the state. Chans and Gouernors of his kingdom, to meet together with all their forces at Tauris, where he himselse with the Prince Emir Hamze his some met them. And after many consultations there had for the repressing of the Turkish invasion (for as yet it was not certainly known what Sinan meant to attempt) he resolued to send soldiers into Georgia towards Tessis, whither of necessity, succors must be sent by the Turks to them of the fortiand withall, determined also to goe himselfe with all his army from Tauris, to Caracach, a place very commodious and neer, to guard both Tauris and Siruan, being scituat even in the middest between the one and the other, and there to expect the remouing of Sinan, whose ambitious nature the king know. ing.doubted, that he to furmount Mustapha, would attempt some greater enterprise; yeaperaduenture to run euen voon Tauris. But when it came to the point, that he should send some of his Captains into Georgia, he made choice of fuch as had best experience of those Countries, and were necrest vnto them: with whom he sent Tocomac also, and the rest whose service he had before vied against the Turks; commanding them to ioine their forces with Simon the Georgian, and by all meanes possible to annoy the enemie: whom if they should perceive to bend for Tauris, they (hould not faile to follow him to the end they might joine together with him, and so encounter the enemies army. All those Captains were resolute men, and led r with them ten thousand souldiers; which being joined with them of Georgia amounted to the number of thirteen thousand : who arriving at Genge, gave knowledge to Simon of their comming, and that in his behalfe they were ready to do great matters.

Now was the Persian Embassador with all due honour received at Constantinople, where he was honorably entertained by the great Baffa's of the Court but especially by Mustapha, who within two days after fuddenly died of a furfet taken of eating too much of muske Melons, and immoderat drinking of Zerbet (a kind of pleasant drink which the Turks vie made of water and fugar:) but most men thought him to have poisoned himselfe, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to be again inflamed by the new complaints of the Persian embaffador against him, for that he in the time of his Generalship, had dishonorably suppressed L certain embassages sent from the Persian king, which he now fearing to be called in question for, the former storms as yet scarse well appeased, made himselfe now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if he had longer lived, he should have been undoubtedly strangled:which to preuent, he became the worthy executioner of himselfe, that had most uniusly. caused others to be most shamefully murdred. Which was the more like to be true, and the rather beleeved, for that the infinit wealth he had of long time scraped together, was immediatly after his death taken into the Kings treasuries some smal portion thereof being left vato his nephews: a most certain token of Amuraths indignation against him. The Persian embasis, dor having audience the 7 of August, with many lively reasons & much eloquence, persuaded, the Turkish Emperor to desist from the war begun, as contrary to the will & pleasure of their, M common Prophet Mohomet: as also to the peace, which was so roially, & with so many, capitalations, not long before concluded between Tamas and Solyman his Grandfather; and was not to haue bin broken, and wars raised, but voon some great quarrell or injurie don; which the Persians had not at any time offered, but had alwaies wished ento him all happinesses they had manifestly declared, by fending vnto him an Embassage to that purpose by Sultan Total mac: whereby he might plainly perceive the good mind and zeal the Persian King had for the maintenance of the peace. And although in the thort reign of Ismahel there was a rumour rais fed. That he meant to go unto Babylonia, and fome fuch other like newes; yet that was but a vouthfull part, and an effect of that heat which is commonly proper to fuch as beeing kept long in prison, canot vie their liberty with moderation, and had therfore received due punish. ment for it, by fudden and vnexpected death. But as for the King that now is, he did about all other embrace amity with his Majesty, and therfore did most earnestly defire, that it would please him to temper his anger conceived, which had insenced him to take up armes against R a King fo much his friend, being of the same religion, and better affected towards him than all the rest of the Nations in the world.

This Embassador the Turkish Emperor dismissed without any resolution at all, but only gaue order. That what focuer he had to fay touching this peace, bee should communicate it with his Vifier. Many were the discourses that hapned, for that the Turks required all those cities and countries which til that time he had conquered with the fword, or (as their proud maner of phrase is) wheron his Generals horse had trod, to be yeelded again vnto bim; and the Embassador on the other side had no warrant from his King to yeeld more than that part of Georgia which is on this fide the river of Araxis. Wherupon the faid Embassador began to fear left he should be suspeaked for a Spy, and so be earl intreated; wherewithall he did finde C himself too manifestly charged by the hard speech which the Visier vsed toward him. Being thus doubtfull whereupon to resolue, perceiving himselfe frained to the grant of these demands and receiving also some threats withall, he determined with himselfe to inlarge his speeches with the Visier in divers and fundry particulars, and to give him good hope that he should be able to persuade his King to yeeld up so much as disast had and did demand. Herupon was Maxet Chan in friendly maner and without any outrage fent from Constantingple to Chars, and commission given to Sinan (then at Chars) That without delay hee should faithfully cause the Embassador to be conducted to Van, and from thence into Persia wherfocuer he did defire. All which was faithfully performed.

Bur to return again to Sinan the Generall, who from Sivas had fent the faid Embaffadour to Constantinople (as is before declared) & being departed thence arised at Erzirum, where sinan multer he took a furuey of his army and other prouision necessary for this expedition: and so from thence was now come to Chars, from whence he dispatched the Persian Embassadour, much discontented that no other conclusion for peace could be wrought.

Mixel Chan at less arriving at the Persian court, reported vnto the king all that had hanned in this his embaffage: the fum wherof was, That Amurath would not condifcend vnto any condition of peace, valeffe the whole countrey of Sirvan were yeelded vato him, for that hee had once (as he faid) conquered the fame. Neither did he forbear to tel the King the fulbition Amurath had conceived of him, to have bin a fpie rather than an Embassadour; and of the large promifes he was fain to make to the Turk, to avoid the manifest danger of imprisoment or death; all which for all that now lay in his Majesties power to perform or not. The King for the present remained well satisfied with that which Maxes had don, and in reward of his great trauel and expences gaue him the charge of the Chamber at Tauris, naming him the Chamberlain of that rich and great city. Of which new office (though very honorable and of great importance) he took (mal pleasure, for that Emir Chan his antient onemy was thief gouernor of that city, from whom he feared some dangerous trechery. Wherfore he appointed his deputy for the execution of the office, and with drew him felf from Tauris to Caffangich a place of his own, there to paffe away the time until it should please the King otherwise to dispose of him. But Emir Chan, who still nourished in his mind the antient hatred hee had conceined against him, tooke this as a most fit occasion to bring him into diffrace with the King : certifying him, That Manut not contented with the preferment it had pleased him to bestow you him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned the city of Tauris, and substituted in his place a most base person to represent the Kings Majesty, and to manage his Treafure; and that he absenced himself far from that City and the court there, having withdrawn himself into the confines of Turky, no doubt for some mischieuous intent, either to yeeld Mmmm 3

This malicious accusation shilly contrided, fo wrought in the mind of the jealous king. that he commanded Emir Chan fecretly to apprehend Manue, and tobring him to the court. and if he could not by other means, then by torrure to wreft from him the truth of all thole matters. Glad was Emir to haue his enemy thus put into his hand, and thought it long til he had brought this shame vpon Mann. Who having already heard some inkling theref, refot. 31 ued with himself to do any thing, rather than to fall into the power of his fatall enemy. And therfore at fuch time as fitteen sall fellowes were for that purpose fent unto him from Emir Chan, who in the kings name summoned him to the court; hee without making any shew that he rook the matter otherwise than well, entertained them courteously, and made them good cheer but when he perceived them to be overcome with fleep, which crept vpon them by resfon of the excesse wherewith they had ouercharged themselves, her caused them to be fireitly bound, and with long cords hanged them down into a deep wel, and there thur them ybsecree. ly couered. Then gathering together the most precious things he had in the house, & setting his wives, his children, his breehren, and nephews on horfeback, fled with all his family in the evening, and the next day arived at Salmas, and was there friendly entertained by the Turkiff 1 Basia, and from thence conveyed to Van, where he was also curteously welcommed by Cheek Bassa, and honorably accompanied sent to Sinan the General, who very glad of his comming. fent him with all diligence to Constantinople to Amerah. And this was in effect the end of the first interparlance of peace betwixt the Turks and Persians.

Sinan staied at Chars eight dates, and there again surveyed his army and provision; and afterward fet forward toward Tomanis, with refolution there to build a fort. But beeing come thither, he could by no means put that his designement in execution, by reason of the immoderat rain, which continually for eight daies together fol in such abundance, as that neither did the Sun appear, nor the sky clear. Beside that, Sinan greatly seared lest the enemy taking the opportunitie of this rain; of the streit, and of the building, should assault his army, & fir & ding it in euil plight, and out of order, greatly indanger it. Wherefore casting off his former determination for fortifying at Tomanis, he removed thence to cary succors to Tessisbut fo foon as he was rifen with his Army and past the streit, Tal-oeli Captaine of the lanizaries at Damasco, and Homan Sanzank of Saffeto, having received secret intelligence, that hard by, a little out of the way, was good flore both of corn and cattel resolued to go thither to setch in that booty : and fo with two thousand foldiers greedy of prey they fee forward. Now Simon the Georgian and the Persians following the Turks Army afar off, had divided his souldiers into all fuch places as where there was either corn or water, or any fuch thing as might allow the Turkes to scatter themselves from the Campe : and perceiving these hungry Turkscarelefly to run headlong to lay hold on this defired booty, he fuddenly fet vpon them desirthen L in pieces being disordered 3 so that of those two thousand escaped but Tal-ogli the Captaine of the Ianizaries; Homar the aforesaid Sanzacke and all the rest beeing lest dead upon the ground.

Sinan holding on his way, in two daies came to Teffis, where prefently calling a Councell of all the chiefe men of his Army, hee tooke order. That every man should voon his outside pose the truth concerning the greatnes of Teffis: which he did only in reproch of Mallaghia the great Baffa, who most untruely had informed Amerath, That it was as great and populous as Damasco: wheras in truth it was not in any respect to be compared to that so samous a Ch ty. After that, he divided the treasures and succors he had brought, among the soldiers of the Fortreff, cheering them up with good words, & promifes of great matters. And because the M foldiers there in garifon complained greatly against the Baffa their Captain, he caused a bill of complaint to be framed against him, & finding him guilty, That he had converted the following diers pay to his own vie, he condemned him to thereffitution therof, and fo immediatly difcharging him of his office, placed in his room Guifuf Ben a Lord of Georgia; who for the att tient enmity betwirt him and Simon had yeelded himself to the Turks; and was of them so welcommed, that Sinan trusted him with the custody of that fort, which with so many dangers had bin maintained until that day. All things thus fet in order at Teflis, Sinan with his army departed thence, and having paffed the Recit of Tomanis, there came vnto him Must affad Baffa (afterward gouernor of Alenpo) declaring ynto him, That not far off was great ftore of corn and cattel, and no body bue a lew Georgians to keep the fame; and therfore wished him to fend forth some to fetch it in. wherof if it had bin much more his army then food in great need. Sinan was well affected to this Mustaffed, and therefore the cafilier induced by him to fend for the aforesaid booty. But moduled with the fresh remembrance of that which had happened to Tal Ozli and Homar, hee R gaue order, That to fetch in this provision there should goe out ten thouland horsemen and their servants. with Mullaffadas their General. Now flood Tocomac Simon and the other Persian captaines in secret ambush, waiting when any of the Turkes should come to setch in this boory. Wherupon the aforesaid souldiers beeing now come as they defired and having almost charged all their mules and horses with that which best pleased them to make choice of the hidden Persians all on a sudden issued out of their lurking places among them, & with great flaughter put them to flight, and with fuch fury purfued the victory, that they flew of Sent thouland them 7000, carrying away many prisoners aliue, and the mules and horses laden with the Rolne booty. Multaflad was the first that fled, and the first that brought the vnhappy news of that overthrow to Sinan; which was forthwith confirmed by such as had by speedy flight e-C scaped the fury of the enemy. Wherupon Sinan dispatched the Bassa of Caramania with 2 great power, charging him wher focuer he should finde the enemy, to fet upon him; and prefently rifing himfelf with his whole army followed the faid Baffa: but all too late: for the Persians after the aforesaid victory, without staying had withdrawn themselves into their firing places, known only to fuch as were wel acquainted with the difficult passages of Georgiarand having there disposed of their prey, were now returning to await some fresh occasion of new flaughter. But when they descried the whole army of the Turkes voon the rifing of a certain hil, they were afraid to meet them, yea and flood inflome doubt alfo, left Sinan should descend from the hil and so assault them. For which cause they retyred themselves again into the strength of the mountains, yet not with such speed, but that the Turks ouertooke some D few of them, and flew about fifty or threefcore of them, whole heads in figne of triumph they carried a good part of the way upon their speares point, and tooke prisoners about threescore and ten more. At last Sinar with all his Army, having passed these dangerous places of Georgia ariued at Triala, where it was toldhim, That the Persian King in person himselfe, being already depar. ted from Tauris, with an exceeding great Army was comming to bid him battel. At which newes he caused proclamation to be presently made thorow all his Army. That everie man should out himselfe in readinesse for the voyage to Tauris, whither he himselfe meant to goe to meet with the King his enemy. In the mean time (as is reported) hee dispatched certaine Posts to the Persian king then at Carachach, to intreat him to send another Embassador vnto E Amurath for peace; thinking by that means (as fome do confecture) to alter the Kings resolution for comming to affail him, if he had any fuch meaning. After this proclamation made, he descended into the open and large plains of Chielder, where presently he mustered his whole army, and gaue it out, That before he would fet forward toward Tauris, hee would make triall of the readinesse and nimblenesse of his soldiers, as if they should presently join battel with the enemy. Which without further delay he put in execution the next morning, formally ranging his whole army in order of battel, and then fending out some few others to shew themselves upon the top of certain hils, as if they had bin enemies that came to seife upon his Armyshe caused al his artillery to be discharged, and commanded every man to skirmish & beftir himfelfe altogether after the same manner as if the enemy had been there present before F them: where the thundring of great and small shot, the thicke stormes of arrowes, with the brightneffe of the armour and weapons yeelding forth lightnings as if it had bin fiery beams, and the poile of Drummes and Trumpets, and other inftruments of Warre, with the enfignes of blew and vellow flying in the winde, made such a medley of all things, as if it had bin the turmoile of a very battell indeed. In the end he caused the retreit to be sounded, and then ferring all his army in order again, made the like thew the fecond sime, and to the third time & alfo. Which was indeed performed with the great feorne and derifion of his fooldier, who deemed it rather childrens play, than any commendation to the proud Baffir The legionical feit (hewes of was thus finished, yet did he not fet forward toward Tauris, or fice had giben it out, but loitted eight daies in those plains of Chielder. At which simether arrived the of Per lia one Aider the Aga, as Embassador from the King, who was by Sinan With great joy to tertained. Divers were the things by this Embaffadour propounded, fuch as beit Manhi Cha before : but the conclusion of all was, That the Persian King would bee content volumeitly to relinquish Chars and Teflis, and foremain as he did before in amity with Amerah and defired Sinan, to conclude a peace with his master, if it might be; as for himselfe, this message don, he was prefently to return into Persia. For this peace Sinan promised to deale with HE rath, fo that the Persian King would send another Embassador to Constantinople. Whering the faid Aider returned into Persia, and at Tauris declared to the King, what he had Cen, what promifes he had receiued from Sinan, and withal exhorted him to fend a new Embaffiedour ha the Turkish Court. After this, when the publique rumor of the comming of the Persian king was found to be falle, Sinan in flead of going to Tauris, returned to Chars, where he idely fleid a whole month, to the general maruelling and murmuring of his whole army, admined to fee themselves, to the great charges of the King, and the disturbance of the whole kingdow. brought forth not for any honorable conquest, but as it were only of purpose to make wine thew of war.

At last he departed from Chars, for that Winter was now come on, and the frost and show did his army great harm, and fo comming to Erzirum, there prefently dismissed every man to go and winter in his owne Countrey, but remained still himselse in the same City. From whence he by speedy Posts diligently advertised Amarath of the succours he had left at Te flis, of the losses he had received from the enemy, of all that which was by Mullaphamists potted of the comming of the Persian Embassadorvotto him of the promile made voto him touching a new Embassador; and to be short, of all his whole actions. Besides all this, hee aduertifed Amurath, That the enterprise of Persia was a very hard; long, and difficult matter, and fuch a one as needed another manner of preparation than had been as yet appointed for it. And that if he defired to subdue the whole kingdom of Persia, it was then very necessary that he should speak with him at large, and discourse of many particularities, which could not so k wel without exceeding tediousnesse be declared by writing. After that, he sent other messen gers also to solicit Amurath for his returne to Constantinople; continually telling him; That it was not possible to signifie by writing, what he purposed to report to him by word of mouth for the better accomplishing of the enterprise begun. Nothing did Sinan more abhoriethan this War, having his mind altogether bent against the affaires of the Christians in Europe, and therefore fought by all means possible to divert those Warres from the East, into some other quarters. At last he wrought so much, he entreated so much, he writ somany Letters, and solicited the matter so carnelly, that Amurath was persuaded to send for him to Constantinople, as soon as euer he was certified of the arrival of the new Embassador from Persia, of whom Sinan had before aduertised him. For he was resoluted either to grow to a peace with I the faid Embassador, if he came with honourable canditions; or if he came not, or that after his comming they could not agree upon the peace, then to put in execution those conceins wherof he must needs in particular talk with Sinan by word of mouth. At length the promis fed Embassador called Borahim Chan, a man of great eloquence, and highly honoured in Perfia, came to Sinan; wherof Sinan gaue prefent intelligence to Amurath, befeeching him again to permit him to come to Constantinople. Which Amerath then granted. Wherupon She forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the univerfall government of the whole Empire. At his first comming to the presence of Amurath (wherein hee discoursed not with him of any thing but of the comming of the Persian Embassadour) the conditions were fet down which they were to require for the reducing of the Capitulations of this peace with M good end. After which agreement the Embassador being now come, and most magnificant ly received at Constantinople, had audience. At which time he with much glorious speech labored to persuade Amurath, That his king earnestly desired a reconciliation, and to joyle his forces with his against the Enemies of the Mahometane Religion; and for that very put

A pose, he was now especially come thither : which his good purpose, if it were answered with like zeale on his part, there would therof enfue the greatest vnity and friendship that ever was between any Mahometan Princes: Whereunto Amurath gaue him no other answer, but that he should therof talke with his Visier, and with him intreat of all matters concerning the peace: and so he was by Amurath entertained and dismissed both at one time.

Now had Amurath called to Constantinople his eldest fon Mahomet (who afterward fue- 1581 ceeded him in the Empire) being then about fixteen yeres old, to circumcife him, according Amusatheirto the custome of the Turks; following therein the inucterate Law of the Hebrews. Vnto constitution which folemnitie many Christian Princes were folemnly innited, who accordingly fent this bants. ther their Embassadors with great gifts and Presents, in token of peace & confederacy, name-

B ly Rodulphus the Emperour, Henry, the third the French King, Stephen King of Polonia , the State of Venice, the King of Persia, the Moore Kings of Morocco and Fez, the Princes of Moldania, Valachia, and others. With al triumph and ioy was the circumcifion of this young Prince folemnised by the space of forty days and forty nights, in the great market place of Constantinople, where all the Embassadours aforesaid had their scaffolds prepared and furnished according to their degrees and States, & received such entertainment as might be shewed at fuch a kind of barbarous spectacle: Only the Persian embassador, who had also his scaffold severall to himself, but not regarded as the rest, reioiced not at these seasts and triumphs: for among fundry other wrongs and form done by the commandement of Amurath vnto the Persian nation (as by hanging vp certaine counterfeit pictures of Persians made of laths and

C Ricks, and then burning them, and in many scornfull forts abusing them) the Turke, for the great displeasure he had conceived for the harm done to Osman Bassa and the Turks in Sirvan much about that time, and for the disdain he had taken against Ebraim Chan (as one not condiscending to the conditions of peace which he expected, nor yeelding to any more than the other Embassador had done before, seeming to have come as a Spie to mark the Turkish affaires, or to mocke Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacifie the minds of the two mighty Princes) commanded the standing before appointed for him, in difgrace of him to be east down, and himselse and all his followers to be thut up as close prifoners in the house of Mahamet Bassa at Constantinople; where he was so streightly kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the plague, which shortly after began to wax hot in the city, yet could he not obtain fo much fauor as to be remoued into fome other To I cune, Sup.

place, but there was inforced to tarry it out, wntill that afterward order was taken, he should he carried thence as prisoner to Erzirum. To end these solemnings Mahamet the yong Prince be carried thence as prisoner to Erzirum. To end these solemnities, Mahomet the yong Prince was circumcifed, not publiquely, but in his fathers chamber, by Mechines one of the inferious

Baffaes, somtime the Emperor Solymans Barber. Now whilft Sinan as great Visier sat commanding in Constantinople, the garrisons of Chars and Teflis (kept in by the enemie, and having received none other reliefe than a little which Sinan before his departure from Erzirum, had by good hap caused to bee secretly conveyed vnto them) were thought to be driven to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, and fearing lest those two places which had with so much ado been both gained and maintai-E ned, should for want of new succours fall againe into the hand of the enemy : he both boldly and freely counselled Amurath to fend a new garrison to Van, for the safety of the countrey thereabouts, and then under the conduct of some valiant captaine, to send succours to Tellis. Vpon which point Amurath asked Sinan his opinion, and willed him to bethinke himselse of some fit man. Hereupon Sinan propounded divers vnto him, but none of them pleased him a for why, he was before refolued, in despite to f Sinan and of his counsel, to bestow this charge vpon Mahamet Bassa nephew to Mustapha the late Bassa, and for his sake hated of Sinan. This Baffa Mabamer he fent to Erzirum, with the title of the Baffa of that Province, honouring him withall with the name of Generall of the army for Teffis. And prefently gaue commandement to Hussan the Bassa of Caraemit, to Mustaffa sometime called Manucchiar the Georgi-F an, to all the Sanzacks, the Curdi, and the foldiers of Erzirum, that they should refort to the standard of Mahamet their Generall, and so to follow him to Testis. Whereupon there asfembled together out of all the faid places about fine and twenty thousand fouldiers, with all things necessarie for the reliefe of the distressed garrison which was in Testis. Commandement was also given to the Bassaes of Aleppo and Maras, to repaire to Van with all their fouldiers, and there to abide till Winter: which they accordingly did, not molested not trough bled by any enemy.

In the end of August, Mahamet Bassa departed from Erzirum, with the Bassa of Caraemie and all his army, carrying with him mony, corn, and all other things needfull for the reliefe of Teflis, and in eight dayes came to Chats, and from thence to Archelec, not troubled by any At Archelec he found Muftaffa (otherwise called Manuschiar) the Georgian, with all his fouldiers, whom the Generall most joyfully entertained, and honoured him with gifts, and with al admonished him to continue his obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his army the shortest and safest way to Testis: for that some were of opinion, that it were best to goebu Tomanis; and someother, by the way of Mustaffa his countrey; wherin Mustaffa did readily refolue him, that the easiest and shortest way lay through his owne country, being also in his o. H pinion the fafest. This counsell of Mustaffa pleased Mahomet greatly, so that he made choice of him to be the guid of his army, repoling himselfe wholly vpon his good direction : and for departed thence towards Teflis, passing through Altunchala and Carachala, both belonging to the faid Georgian, abounding with all things necessary for the sustenance of man, neither were they cuer disturbed by any enemy. Having passed Mustaffa his countrey, they came to friendly Castle called Gori, from whence they discouered in certain fields a great army of the Georgians mingled with Persians, but apparelled after the manner of Georgia: thesewere those captains of Persia, sent from the Persian King (as in other yeres before) to aid the Georgians; who fecretly conloyned with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their apparell. be. cause the treaty of peace should not be disturbed, and their King acounted vniust of his words who under a colour of a treaty of peace, whiles Amurath attended nothing else but to succour and defend his conquered countries, without purpose to annoy any other places, went about to procure the destruction of the Turks. These then as foon as they saw the Turkish army, and perceived that they also themselves were by them descried, fent Heraulds vnto them with Mediant Baf. haughty words of defiance, and to offer them battel. With great griefe of mind did the Baffa fartisfith batreceive this proud defiance: but having no other purpose but to bring his succors safe to Terelegiably the receive this proud defiance: but having no other purpose be could be successful to the purpose the th Georgians and flis he dismissed the Heraulds, and studied by all means he could to shun battell. That euc. ning he was fauoured in his purpose by the great and continuall rain which then fell, and serued for a reasonable excuse of his delaysbut the next day prouing faire, and the Sunne shining bright, both the armies marched in fight one of the other all day, vntill about four houres and g an halfe before night; at which time the Turks arrived neere to a river that separated the one army from the other. There the Bassa fell in consultation with Mustaffa, whether they should passe ouer the river before night, or stay on that side they were till the next morning. In which case Mustaffa aduised him to stay, as fearing lest the enemy should set vpon the army disordered in passing the river, and so annoy them. Notwith standing the General disliked this advice of Mustaffa, having taken a strong conceit even voon the first discovery of the enemie, that there was some intelligence and compact betwirt Mustapha and the Persians, and that to that end he had maliciously persuaded him to come that way, and not by the way of Tomanis: and therfore the Bassa thinking, that if there were any such plot laid between Massaffe and the enemie, to fet it in some confusion, would not in any case follow the counsell of the L suspected Georgian, to stay that night; but commanded, that with the greatest speed that might be, all his fouldiers with their treasure and corn should passe ouer the river, to the end that before night he might on the other fide of the river incamp his army in some good place, to the scorn and derision of his enemies. Mahamet his lieutenant, a bold young man & an hardy, was the first that ventured ouer, and after him the carriages of money and of corn, and then the whole army, with such speed, that some of the consused multitude were drowned in the passage, being rather troden downe with the horses and camels, than brought to their desite, either by the depth of the channell, or swiftnesse of the river. As soone as the Georgians perceived that the Turks had passed the river, without flaying vntil they might fettle themselues in any good order, they in great hast & fury ran vpon them, M and prefently affailed them, whiles they were yet all in confusion and out of order by reafor whereof the Turks, although they turned their faces vpon their enemie, and made fome good refiftance, yet in fort time you might have feen the banks of the river in many places flained with the Turkish bloud, and many carkases of the Turks here & there scattered, without any

A apparant loffe among the Georgians and Persians. Amongst them that fell in this slaughter. were number of Sanzacks, of the Curdi, and Mesopotamians: which the rest perceiving and The Turke different by the ouerthrow of their owne, conic during the loffe of others, turned their backes and fled : confired the the like did the remnant of the McSopotamians, and after them at last the whole army: whom constakts by the Georgians pressed to fore in their flight, that many of the Turks seeing no other way to ef the Georgians cape, cast themselves into the river, and so (though hardly) escaped with their lives. Great was the shame, great was the confusion, but greatest was the loss they received, for that in the heat of the battel the Kings money and corn was taken by the Georgians and Perfians, euery man fauing only fo much for himselfe as he could secretly hide upon his owne body, or contry by the means of some trusty slaue, which by the help of their swift horses was presented rather by B fortune than by valour,

The Turks thus discomfited and spoiled of their reliefe, the next morning gathered themfelues together againe, one with another curfing the Heauens, the King, and their aduerse fortune: some of them also threatning the Georgian Renegate Mustaffa, as though all this mifchiefe had hapned through his trecherie and fecret intelligence with the enemie. Notwithstanding, when they found that they had still remaining so much money and other casements as might suffice to comfort the afflicted minds of the foldiers belieged in the fort, they resolned to hold on their way towards Teflis; and in their journy vsed such speed, that the day following they arrived there in the evening. But when they of the Fort faw their friends whom Mahamet with they had fo long expected, arrived in such bad fort, and so evill surnished, they were aftenied bis discompated C and wonderfully grieued at this common loffe, and all in a confusion protested to Mahamet, 10 Testino That they would abandon the place, if they had not forthwith necessarie prouision made for them. But the Generall after he had with large promifes mitigated their first furies and infolencies, presently in the morning caused a Divano or counsell to be called in the castle, where having gathered together all the chiefe men in his army, he spake vnto them in this manner:

For a fmuch as it hath pleased God, that so great and important an occasion of victoric which was offe. The Oration of James on the Control of victoric which was offer. Mahamul Bajia red unto us for the hondur and glory of enery one of us, is now fallen out fo unfortunately, that it hash not in the caffe of only not ministred with our any matter of triumphing ouer our enemies as we should have done, but rather Tefic. hath made them (I know not how) to carry away from us both the triumph, and also our armor, our horses, our flaues, and our floiles yea and (the remembrance whereof doth most grienously trouble and afflict me) our Sultans money and our publique munition and forces folemnly delivered to our conduct, is now become a booty and a prey unto them : that the honour which might have made every one of us famous among noble and valorous foldiers, is now fallen from our forheads, and to our great detriment doth adorn the heads of strangers or rather of our enemies: and that notwithstanding all this, we are now come to those couragiout foldiers which with their great valor have defended this Fort evenin the midst of their evenies weapons and treacheries; and to whom we should recld that aid and reliefe which the vertue of every one of their minds doth deferue, and which King Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither unto them: there is now no remedie, but to resolue whon some good means, that we fall not wholly into the viter differace of our Lord and King; and that is, To maintain these souldiers in the custody and defence of this Fort; and though it had bin with all our wants, and all our owne dishonours, to comfort these that have so long time looked for us, and so well deserved all manner of reliefe. We cannot excuse our selves, that our enemies were better than we either in number or instruments of war; for both in the one and the other we were far beyoud them : neither yet can we say, that they set upon us by night, or at unawares; for when we saw their number, their weapons, their horses, and finally their approach, and their manner of assault, yet we would needs passe oner the river, and soyn battell with them. Which we now know hath fallen out very lamentable unto us because we were more ready to take our flight than to endure the fight and to use our feet than to occupie our hands. And therfore it is very requisit, as well to satisfie the rigor of justice, as to performe the duty of foldiers, that we suffer not our Lord and King to lose his mony, which he trusted into our hands. and which we have loft, not by greater freugth nor by any trecherous fratagem of our enemies, but by our own too too important feare, and too bafe a regard of our lives, before which, it was the duty of enery one of vsto have preferd the care of honor. For if by fighting and couragious full fraining the affaults of our enemies, though they hadbin stronger, and better armed than we, this misfortune had hapned onto vs, and that we could in any fort have represented to the King and the world an honorable and bloudy battell, wee

diers, he commanded them to follow him to the Councel appointed in the Generals panili-deply and forcibly to thrust into the paulion with their weapons, and rather than any wrong should be don vnto him, to shew their valor against the Turks, without exception of any per-

And being about to depart, the Capigi Bassi or great V ther of Mahamet came vnto him, and and his breft in twain even to his very stomack; so that he died (a strange spe accele to beffold) being thus cut in funder, with his cleft head and two shoulders hanging down vpon their seuc-all in confusion was rifen up in the tumult) and wounded him with five mortal wounds, which should not now have any need to seek means how to repay this losse, and to transport the thing that vialent. G ly was taken from us by such as were more mighty than our selues, and these honourable souldiers hould more easily have digested with vs this lamentable calamity. But we have lost that mony and in very dead having as is were willingly bestowed it upon the Georgians and Persians to redeeme our lines, and to save Us from their fury, are bound to repay it, or elfe for ever hereafter to be challenged by the King at langual debtors unto him for it. And therefore my good friends and companions, if you will take a good courfe. let cuery one of us without further consultation, put his hand into his privat purse (if he have not foolish. ly cast that into the hands of the ranonaus enemy) and with our own money let us succour the necessitie af thele men, and have regard to the honour of our King. So shall we make our flight lesse blame worthie, wee Shall instific our actions more honestly, and that which is of greatest importance, wee shall better pacific the wrath of Amurath, which he might most iustly conceine against vs. I my selfe before you all am most rea. dy to disburse foure thousand duckats towards it if it shall please you all to follow me accordingly, we shall deliner these souldiers from their great necessitie, and acquite our selves from the intricate bonds of most troublesome displeasures.

There might a man haue seene a thousand countenances changed a thousand manner of waics; for one foftly whispered many a curse and shame vpon the King, vpon Mahomet, vea and vpon God himself; another denied to disburse any thing; another determined privily to seal The Turks one away; and fome faid one thing, and fome another; but in the end every man was induced to folof their owne low the example of Mahamet, and thereupon having made a purse according to every mans a. privat purset. bility, there was collected thirty thousand Duckars among them. And presently after word t Florof Tellie, was fent to Leuent Ogli at Zaghen, to fend thither grain, muttons, and other necessary prouisi-on, that they might the better continue the defence of the Fort.

Two dayes onely stayed Mahamet in Tessis, and having changed such souldiers as defired to be dismissed, and also appointed Homar Bassa Gouernour of Testis, in stead of Giusus that there gouerned before, he departed. But before his departure consultation was had, Whether they should keep the way of Tomanis, or the way they came through the countrey of Mustaffa the Georgian : and in the end they resolved to keep the way of Tomanis, and thereupon order was taken that they thould all passe the river. The Curdi were the first that went ouer, and had alreadie pitched their Tents vpon the farther fide of the water; when the Generall began to reuoke his former order, and fent them word. That they should returne, be x cause he was now determined to goe backe the same way he came. At which message the Sanzackes were in a rage, and in plain termes sent him answer, That these mutabilities beseemed not them, being men accustomed to warre, but to be rather childrens play, than manly resolution, and that for their parts they were minded not to change their journy, but would go on the same way they had begun: and so forwards they went (say the General what he could) and by the way of Tomanis arrived at Chars long before Mahamet; who was much grieved at this their fo great disobedience: but seeing no other remedy, he with the Bassa of Caraemit and Mustaffa the Georgian, put themselves on their journey, even by the same way they came to Teflis. At last Mahamet arrived at Altunchala, the chiefe Castle of Mastaffa the Georgian, and burning with the defire of reuenge of those losses, (which he thought himself g to have received by the treacherie of Mustaffa) or, as some thought, seeking by this meanes to make Amurath beleeue, that in truth all the forepassed mischiefes had hapned not through their cowardife, but through the treacherous and malitious deuices of the Georgian, and so to make their received losses seem more pardonable the devised with himselfe how to finde out such a plot, as that Mustaffa might vpon the sudden be taken away, as guilty of so foule a treason. And that he had denised, was in this sort: To call a Councell into his owne possible to be. Paullion, as if hee had received some commandement from the Court; and having caused Mustaffa to come into that roome, whilest the said counterfeit commandment should be in reading, to cause his lieutenant with those chief of his band that stood about him, to fall vpon him and presently to cut off his head. This pretended Councell was accordingly called, M wherein sate the Bassa himselse, and with him the Bassa of Caraemit, bertaine Sanzackes subiect to the Iurisdiction of Erzirum, the Capagi Bassa or chiefe Gentleman Vsher, and the Generals lieutenant, with whom hee had vpon their folemne oaths for secrecie, communicated his intended deceit. The Georgian Mustaffa was also called accordingly: who plucking him by the fleeue, would have forced him to fit down. Then Muftaffa ctying aloud students me. dren his fword, wherwith he ftrook Mahamets lieutenant, that was right against him; and ha. tably renerge feel, and every man with all speed departing thence, put himselfe on his way toward Chars; whither also were brought the two wounded Bassa's, and the rest that were it handled & much scared with these sudden and vncoth stirs. Of all this treachery intended against him, Mustaff a sent present information to the Turkith Emperorafinding himfelf greatly agricued at the falle sufpition that Mahamet had oniuftly conceiued against him, to his great dishonor; and wrought so cunningly, that Amurash in token of his good liking and contentment, sent him both cloth of gold, and a battel ax all gilt. Mahamet on the other fide intermedling here and there with all the art he possibly could deuife, all hateful and iniurious termes, fent large aduertifements of all the misfortunes that had happed; and aggravated to the King, both the treacheries of Mustaffa, and also the stender fecurity of those waies and countries.

As foones Amurath understood the calamity of his fouldiers, the losse of his money, the great dishonour of his people; and the apparant danger wherin the fort of Testis stood, when F it was like to be abandoned; all inflamed with rage and anger he called vnto him the Baffa's of his court (among whom fate as chief the proud and hauty Sinan) and rated them al exceedingly, reprouing their lewd counfel, and recounting the losses that he had from time to time received, as if they had hapned through their defaults. And especially Sinan, as the principall occasion of all these mischies: who like an improvident fool (as he said) would needs relin-Nana

quish the charge of his army, and like a king sit idle at Constantinople, standing as it were at the fome publique tritumph, to behold and heare the milories and mistortunes of others, having fome publique trituspu, compare and selection boated, with the like power that be fire in the time that Must aphawas General, vainly boated, with the like power that be fired. to fetch the Persian king out of Casbin, and to deliver him in bonds to Amarath, but had indeed performed nothing worth the remembrance, Sinan could do no leffe but make answer to the writhful King, yet not with fuch mildnesse and modesty as he should in such a case per aduenture have done; but in proud and peremptory manner, without any reuerence or regard told him plainly, That as the last year a little before his return to Constantinople, succours had bin conneied to Teslis without any losse or trouble (as in truth they were) each so had they bin this year also, if he had put his aduice in execution, as much as he despised and contemned it: for he did then give him to understand, That Mahamet Bassa could not be a fit man for fo great a charge, and that it was necessary to have chosen in his room some other Cap. tain of valor and diferetion. But feeing he would needs make choice of the same wait man he was not now to blame any other for this errour, but only himselfe. As for his comming to Constantinople, it was a thing long before thought most needful, not only for his aduice, how the matter of peace might be brought to some good pas, but also because if that treaty came not to the defired iffue, then he had to talk with him how he might compas the overthrow of his enemy, which thing as yet he had no fit time to declarevnto him, but was now ready to reueal it, if it were fo his pleasure. Wonderfully was Amerath grieued with this sullen answer, when he confidered that a flaus of his own should so arrogantly and manifestly reprous him of folly and improvidence. Notwithstanding being desirous to know of him what that seems and important matter was, which he had to reueal vnto him for the easie compassing of his commenced enterprise , he diffembled his discontentment conceived against him, and commanded him to dischose those his devices which he had to veter: Sinan in brief. of all his aduices propounded the fe two things: first his counsel was, not to proceed in this war as hitherto they had don, by feeking wish fores and fortresses to hold and keep the enemies countries. for that their treasures were not able to weeld fuch store of money as were sufficient to main. tain to many and fo great garrifons contrary to the opinion of Mustapha (of late dead) who with great pertinacy had perfunded that dangerous, chargeable, and difficult manner of War. His second advice was, That the true means to bring this war to wished end, consided especially in the resolution of Amerath himself, who if he would go in person, & against sogrest K a king oppose the person of a king then might he most affuredly promise to himself all speedy and honorable victory, for that at the only name of his comming the Persians would easily come to any agreement; or if not, he might then proceed in his wars, and so obtain most glorious conquests. This his aduice so little pleased the effeminat king, that in stead of the great opinion which he before held of him, he now conceived an envious affection against him; & a further suspition (sourced by the great ladies of the court, especially Amurathemother) The Sinan had thus counfelled the king, himfelf to go in person, not for any good could come of it, but only that fothe might finde meanes, for the prince his fon to make himfelfking, and to drive out his father. Which suspicion was in such fort nourished in Amuraths mind, especially being affured of the great affection which the prince caried toward sinan, and be alfo to. I ward him, that he refolued to richim out of his fighteand fo depriving him of all charge prefently banished him the court, & out of Constantinople to Demoticas city of Thrace, from whence he afterwards by most humble supplication obtained to be removed to Marmana little beyond Selymbria. And into his place of Visier ship was presented Sciaus Bassa, who had maried Ameraths fifter; an Hungarian born; a goodly perfonage, and of honorable judgement but aboue all men a seller of justice and preferments, and yet a great friend nothe peace with the Christian princes, which Sinan had alwaies most wickedly maligned. 20 30 in 10 wides

The Persian Capraines in the meantime, with their spoyles and divertof the enemies Enfigites, were with great joy and triumph received at home in Perfia, But when the different that fell out between Mahamet Baffa and Muftaffa the Georgian was also reported, the former M ioy was redoubled, enery man in generall being of opinion. That these discords might bee great impediments vnto the Turks further attempts into Perfia which it was much feared they would the next year attempt, to the meat danger of Nassivan & Tauris, Vpou which och casions the Persian king perceiving he dould not have a sitter opportunity to imploy himself

A against Abas Mirize his fon (then with him in difgrace) determined with himself to leave the Mahamet the matters on this fide of his kingdom in their present state, and to march toward Heri. Wherright into he was earnestly solicited by his eldest son Emir Hamze Mirize, but especially by Miriz to literaging. Salmus his Visier. Vpon which resolution, committing the defence of Reivan, Nassivan, and bis sound about that fide of his kingdom to Emir Changouernor of Tauris; hee fee forward himfelf with his army towards Casbin, and so marching thorow diners provinces, arrived at length at Sasuar. being on that side the chief of all the cities subject to the jurisdiction of Heri: which city he took by force. & without delay caused the gouernor therof to be beheaded, although he aledged a thousand excuses for himself, and objected a thousand accusations more against the seditious Visier. The King after this departing thence, and having also put to death certaine B captains and Sultans, that were accused by the Visier to be confederats in the rebellion of his fon he arrived at last at the defired city of Heri. Very strong is this City by scituation, com- Mahamet com paffed about with a good wall, and watered with deep chanels of running forings, conveyed method Hers. into it by Tamerlane their founder or restorer. Besides that, there were in it many valiant captains, enemies to MiriZe Salmas, ready to lay down their lives in desence of themselves and of Abas their Lord fo that the winning therof could not but proue both long and difficult. So foon as the King approched the city, he felt in himself many troubled passions arising of grief and pitty; it grieved him to think that he should beget so graceles a son who in stead of maintaining his state and honour, should seek his ruin and destruction. It gricued him also to remember the bloud of his subjects, before spilt upon so strange an occasion; and scarsly durst C he enter into the cogitation, thenceforth to shed any more of the bloud of his people. Neuertheles being stil more and more solicited by his Visier, he attempted to understand the mind of his fon, and if it might be possible, to get him into his hands. But while the king travelling with these thoughts lay with his army before Heri, Abas Mirize in the mean time writ divers letters to his father and his brother; wherin he befought them, That they would make known vnto him the occasion of this their stir : for if desire of rule had mooued them to seek the deprivation of him, being their fon and brother, from the honor he lawfully possessed, & which his father himself procured for him of his grandfather Tamas, they ought to abandon their imagination, for that he was alwaies ready to spend his wealth and his bloud, together with his estate, in their service, and acknowledge his father to be his good father and King. But if D they were not induced herunto for this cause, but by a desire they had to revenge some trespasses that he had committed, to the prejudice of the crown of Persia or his fathers honor he was most ready to submit himself to any amends, and with all reason to yeeld vnto them the kingdom, yea the whole world, and even his own life, the rather to fatisfie their minds with a more ful contentation. With twice or thrice reading ouer, were these affectionat letters confidered and digefted; and at last, both the father and brother perceiuing in them such liberality of words, and ouercome with pitty, or if not with pitty, yet with great admiration and contentment, they determined to put the matter in practife; and moderating their defire of reuenge to attempt to reduce the yong mans mind to fome good paffe. Wherupon they wrot back vnto him, That no greedy defire to vsurp his gouernment had induced them to make so great a voyage, to trouble so much people, and to shed such abundance of bloud, but only his disobedience and presumption in that he had caused himself to be called the King of Persia, and had not fent fo much as one captain to aid them in the late wars against the Turks. Glad was Abas the yong prince, when he vnderstood the accusations that were laid against him; hoping to make it manifest before all men, how the King and his brotherwere mif informed in these particularities: and therfore incontinently did write back vnto them, That if they would faithfully promise him, honorably and without any outrage to receive his Embassadours, hee would fend them fuch euident matter, and so elect information touching those his accusations, as that they should not onely plainely perceive that there was never any such kinde of thought in him, but also that he had alwaies desired and labored the contrary; & would more-Ouer open vnto them such matter, as in respect of other men, and not of himself, might cause their comming to proue profitable & commodious to all the kingdom of Persia. Which his request they both solemnly promised faithfully to performe, beeing very desirous to vnderstand what those strange nouelties should be. Whereupon Abas Mirize sent vnto them two of his chief counfellors, wen of great account and reverence both for their years and wifdom,

Abas Stirize with full instructions, who after many speeches, in the end swearing (according to their Cu. G frome) by the Creator that spread out the aire, that founded the earth vpon the deeps, that a dorned the heauen with stars, that poured abroad the water, that made the water; and briefly, of nothing, brought forth all things, swearing by the head of Ali, and by the religion of their Prophet Mahomet, that such peruerse thoughts neuer entred into the head of Abas Mirizethey alledged many testimonies and manifest proofes, that most loyally in all due time, as well when he was advanced to the kingdome of Persia, as also in his battels against the Turks, his fon had alwaics caused deuout prayers and supplications to be made to God for his prosperie tie : neither euer desired to heare any other but happy and fortunat successe of him. They brought with them 10000 and 1000 precepts and loyall letters, which the young man had caused to be written, as occasions required to the Gouernours that were his subjects, sorthe gouernment of the State, wherin he neuer named himselfe king of Persia, but only, Your King and Gouernor of Heri, They prayed the king alfo, to cause a diligent processe to be framed a. gainst his son; and if there should be found in him any sign or shadow of so wicked a suspiris on, then to take from him his estate and liberty, offring themselues to remaine as hostages for him. But when all this should be done, and Abas found altogether free from these vniust accufations, then (falling even to the earth and kiffing it) they befought him, and as it were coniured him not to leave the matter thus imperfect, to the prejudice of his bloud; but returning to his counfellor, to take information likewife, vpon what mind and confideration he had ad uised the King, to take vpon him this vnorderly and dangerous voyage, where no doubt hee should find nothing in him but malignant, ambitious, and wicked affections, and such as even deserved, that with his bloud there should be revenged all the bloud of those, which till that hour had bin brought to their vnworthy & vndeserued deaths. And forasmuch as nothing remained, wherof the Visier had informed the king against his son, but the commandement that was given by Abas Mirize to the Governours under him, That they thould not go to the wars against the Turks: they confessed in truth, that such an order was taken, but not to that wicked and traiterous end and purpose as was reported to the king by his great counsellor, but onely in respect of an inuasion justly seared in those quarters by the Tartarian Iesselbas; whoby diuers inrodes had alreadie don great harm in the country about Heri, and put young Abu and his counsellors in such a feare, that they durit not disfurnish their Cities of their guards and forces: and therfore had commanded the faid Gouernours, not to go to war against the Turks, Y but to flay and expect further direction. And that all this was by writing fignified vnto the Visier himselfe: which he of a malicious mind had concealed, only to try, if in these common troubles he could bring to passe, that Abas Mirize and the king might be taken away, & Emir Hamze fucceed in his place, and so he him self remain the Superintendent of his son in law, and Moderator of that fo famous kingdom. Of which fo treacherous a purpose, they (for all that) thought Emir Ham Ze the young Prince altogether ignorant (knowing his honourable dispofition and loue towards his owne kindred) but imputed it only to the immoderat and ambitious defire of the wicked traitor Mirize Salmas.

Of these grave speeches of the Embassadors, Mahamet the father (by nature credulous) began to make great construction; and deeply to consider of their so earnest and important requests; which seemed vnto him so voright and equall, as that he could not chuse but hearken vnto the same. And therefore calling vnto him the Gouernors, the Captaines, the Indges, and Treasurers of all the cities that were subject to Heri: he demanded of them, how and in what fort they effected of Abas Mirize, and in what degree of honour he defired to be effected of them: and of them all received one answer, That they held him for their Lord & lieutenant to the king of Casbin, and that himselfe had alwaies desired to be so taken and thought of for proofe whereof, cuery one of them brought in diuers letters, precepts, and orders; wherein he neuer caused himself to be honored with any other title, but only, Your king of Heri. Hedemanded further, Whether any fuch warres were attempted by the Tartarian Iesselban or not: whereof he received a large and folemne information, that fo it was, to the great detriment of M all those territories. And thus the king was throughly persuaded of the innocencie of his son; who before was noted vnto him by his Vifier, to be an obstinat Rebel. Vponwhich occasion only, although he might justly have put him to death, as author of so great troubles & bloudshed; yet because he would be better inform'd of the truth of the accusations laid against him by the Embassadours, he resolved to make a curious & diligent inquisition thereof; and there fore first of all in great secrecie he examined Emir Aamze his eldelt sonne, wherefore he had aduifed this journy against his brother Hbas, whom he had found guiltles of all those crimes that were objected against him? Whereunto the Prince answered, That he had no other cerraintie of the pretended euill behauiour of his brother, but only that which proceeded from the great credit that he alwaies gaue to his father in law Mirize Salmas, to whom as to a chief Counsellor, his father in law, and protector of the Kingdome, he had alwaies yeelded affured credence: and so discharged the whole tempests of all those mischieses upon the Visier. Tousching whom the King made diligent inquisition, as well among those of the Court, as of the army, and therby found him guilty of all that the Embaffadors of Heri had accused him and that being alwaies acquainted with the true occasions which restrained the Governours of Heri (subject to Abas Mirize) from going to the war against the Turks, he had most malicioufly concealed the fame, of purpose to hatch such a strange and dangerous discontentment, as had wrought the vnworthy death of many great men, and almost defiled the hands of the father with the innocent bloud of his guiltleffe fon. For which fo foule a treason the false Vifier was worthily condemned to die, and his wily head by commandment of the King, firucke Mirice Salmad from his carkaffe. Iustly rewarded, with the same punishment which he vniustly sought to beheate haue conuerted vpon others, and with his own destruction pacified the diffention and battels that were risen between the two Princes. And so the two brethren being reconciled together. and the fon to the father; after that Abas had again promifed his wished obedience (which he C afterwards most dutifully performed) King Mahamet returned with the Prince towards Cafbin:where by reason of new and vnexpected morions of the Turks, he had now been long loo-Amurath through the rough speeches of Sinan, was more and more settled in his purpose for the continuing of the Persian warre; accounting it so much the more to his owne glory, as it should in happy successe fall out contrary to the opinion of many and therupon began to bethinke himselfe, whom he might chuse for his Generall, to whom he might commit so great a charge. Among the Baffa's of the court there was one Ferat, a man of ripe yeres, but yet fierce of courage, tough of opinion, in counfell as hardy as might before his age, ready for all fullden & strange aduentures, but aboue all, a vassall most denoted to the kingsof this man, at last D he was resolved to make choice to have the leading of his army : and therefore calling him apart, declared vnto him what he had in himself purposed; incouraging him to take the charge vpon him, with a firm resolution to perform all things answerable to so worthy an enterprise. with the opinion he had conceived of his valor. Very willing did Ferat accept of this new of. First Baffa fice; and thought himself (as indeed he was) highly favored by the King; and thereupon made in sinan; place himself as invaling the simple himself as inval him a large promise, to imploy his strength, his wit, and vetermost denoire, to put in execution whatfocuer should be offered vnto him, either by occasion, or by his royall commandement.

At first Amurath had no other purpose to imploy him any further, but only to assure the passage to Testis, and so into all Georgia; and to have destroiced the countrey of Mustaffa the Georgian, who had so audaciously injured the lieutenant of Amurath, and put his whole army in confusion: but being certainly advertised of the troubles in Persia between the king & his fonne, he changed his purpose, and commanded Ferat to imploy all his forces to creek a fortrefle at Reiuan, a place belonging to Tocomac, and to affure the paffage from Chars to Reiwan; for fo they should be reuenged of many harms they had received by him, and lay open the way to the city of Tauris, to the great glory of Amurath. As for Mustaffathe Geor, inn, al. though he had well deserved to be chastised for his tash attempt against Mahames Bassa, being then his Generall, yet he willed Ferat to dissemble his cuill opinion of him; and (if it were possible) so towork, as to vie him as an instrument to conucy treasure and succors to Tesis: for by this means the passage being made safe, all Georgia would without any moe fortresses be subdued, and then the next yeare they might attempt the enterprise for Tauris.

Highly did Ferat commend the devices of Amurath his Lord, and shewed himselfe ready for any attempt. And so the time being come wherin it behoued them to set on foor their important defignements, in the beginning of the yeare, 1583, commandements were fent out to al the cities of the empire, which were wont to make their appearance at these wars, that you fresh summons they should be ready to return against the Persians; and to put in execution G. that thould be injoined them by their new General. The fame wherof flew as far as Siria, Iu. rv. And foat last General Ferat departing from Constantinople, & passing Generali Ferat ouer to Scutari, by the way of Amasia and Sivas came to Ezzirum, where he took a view of all departeth from his armor & prouision; and from thence in eight days ariued at Chars, conducted by the Perfian fugitive Maxut Chan; and from Chars fet himself on his way toward Reivan. Threedays before he came to Reivan, of certain ruins of an old castle which the Turks cal Aggia Chalasi for the castle of Strangers) he erected a new fortres, and left in it a Garison of 400 souldiers; w with a Sanzack and certain pieces of Ordnance; and then went to Reivan. This country is difant from Tauris eight or nine days journy; betweene which two places is scituat Nassivan Chiulfal, Marant and Sofian; all inriched with goodly gardens and pleasant greens. But in the way are many craggy mountains to be climed, and fundry hard passages either for Army or traueller.

He buildeth a great fort at Reivan

Here then did Ferat incamp himself with his Army, and taking advice of his chiefe Can. tsins, where he should build the fort, they all with one consent adulted him to seife you the houses and gardens of Tocomac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, inclosing the gardens with strong walls and deep Ditches round about, wherinto he conveyed water from a certain river, that comming down from the mountains ran into Araxis. Which worke 1) he performed with such expedition, that within the space of 15 days the fortres was finished. being in circuit seuen hundred and fifty yards. It grieued Tocomac exceedingly, thus to lose his country and dwelling, and so much the more, for that it hapned so suddenly, and as it were vnlooked for. He himself, as soon as he understood that the Turkish army was comming unto that coast, having withdrawn himself and his men of War out of the City he could not keep. fought by all means to be revenged, if not altogether, yet in some part of this so great an injury; and therfore he writ to the king at Chorazan, to Emir Chan at Tauris, to Simon in Georgia; he gathered foldiers out of the villages, and vsed all his possible indeauor to inable himself to anov the enemies army. But from none of these places could he receive any helpe; the King being so far off in wars against his son, the Georgian being busied, by hindring any reliefe to I be brought to the belieged in Teflis:as for Emir Chan (who by folemn promife vnto the King before his departure to Heri, had undertaken the defence of that fide of the kingdome against the Turks) he either would not or could not stir, nor sent so much as one souldier, having (as fome supposed) secret intelligence with General Fergianot to disturb him in this his Worker So Tocomac destitute of all other help, and not able to do much himself against so mighty an enemy; yet ceased not to lay such privy ambushes for the Turks as he could, killing of them fomtime 100, fomtime 150, and fomtimes moe, as they fell into his danger. And to ease his flomack against Emir Chan (who fitting still at Tauris as it were to behold his miserie, would not so much as shake a sword against these spoiling Turks) he spared not to dispatch certain horsmen in hast to the king at Chorazan and by eloquent letters to amplifie the cowardisc of L Emir Chan; intermedling withall some causes of suspicion that he had intelligence with the Turkish General.

Ferat having thus built this new fort at Reivan, as Amurath had commanded, and furnished it with artillery and all other things needful for defence therof, appointed Sinan Baffa (the fon of Cicala Baffa a Renegat of Genoa, whom Selymus the late Emperour in the flour of his youth created Aga or Captain of the Ianizaries) with a garrifon of 8000 foldiers to keep the fame. And so departing thence by the way of Aggia Chalasi, in ten days arrived with his Army at

Ferat had not long stayd at Chars, but strange news were brought thither, That Mastafa the Georgian (to whom Amurath had fent thirty thousand ducats by two of his Capigiand two M of his Chiaus, to have by him bin conveyed to Teflis for the relief of them in the Fort) was revolted from the Turkish obedience, and being now become a Rebel, had left that formelle in most manifest danger to yeeld, if by some other means it were not relieued. Which strange

A nouelties exceedingly troubled the General; who to know the certaintie therof, called before him all fuch as were the messengers of this missortune. By whom he was certainly informed. That Multaffa, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, having put themselves vpon their way toward Teflis with the treasure, garded with a conuoy of 500 of his foldiers, in the mid way had met with his coufin Simon the Georgian, by whom he was perfuaded to return to his antient faith and religion (which he had to the great peril of his foul so prophanely abandoned) and to shake off the service of Amurath, which would yeeld him no other recompence than an hateful and infamous captiuitie, and in the end fome fraudulent and treacherous death. And that his persuasions had so prevailed with Mustaffa, that he caused the two Capigi and the Chiaus to be apprehended and prefently beheaded, and dividing the treasure with his said cousin, had B with him and his other kinfmen vowed a folemne and perpetual confederacie: and fo having withdrawn themselues to their wonted passages, lay there in wait for such succours as should by the Turks be brought to Teflis.

When Ferat understood these and such other particularities, he all in a sury swore, that he would not return to Erzirum til he had put all the Country of Multaffa to fire and fword, Yet first he thought it needfull to relieve Teffis, which otherwise would be in danger to veeld to the enemy : and for that purpose made choice of Hassan Bassa, who in the last year of the Generallhipof Mustapha had most couragiously conneied the like succors, and taken Aliculi Chan, Vnto him therforedid the Generall affigue forty thousand Ducats, with other provision neceffary for that service; and for the more security appointed him fifteen thousand of the most choice and valiant souldiers of his whole Army, to conduct the same. In ten dayes space Haffan Baffa went and came from Teflis, having in his journey to and fro had many skirmithes with the Georgians, wherin he lost some few of his men, without any further losse worth remembrance. After this, the General fent one Refuan Baffa with fix thousand souldiers to spoil the Country of Mustaffarhe Georgian the late Renegate, but now become a Rebel to the Turk. Which Resuan without any long stay ouer-ran all his territory, burnt his towns, and committed most vncouth outrages, which extended even vnto the infencible trees, and earled away with him many captine fouls, with much Corn and Cattell, like a raging tempest destroying whatfoeuer came in his way. Now was the General also retyred to Ardachan, whither came Resuan to meet him with his aforefaid booty. But because they had now performed what they before intended, and the approach of VV interperfuaded their return, they removed from Ardachan, and by the way of Olti retyred to Erzirum; from whence all the fouldiers were licen. same was now once again honored by the King with cloath of gold, a battel-ax and Targuet all gilt.

... About this time one Podolovius a gentleman of Polonia, sent by Stephen king of Polonia to Constantinople, by the leave of Amurath to buy certain horses in Anatolia; returning homeward with 24 goodly horses which he had bought, was notwithstanding the great Turks Passe by his commandement staid voon the way, all his men (in number 34) slain, except one boy, who getting into a Wood escaped; and Podolovius his head struck off. The horses brought back to Constantinople, were by the appointment of Amurath, some bestowed into his owner stables, and the rest given among st the Bassa's, oftentimes pointed at with the fingers of the Turks, in derision of the King of Polonia. This injurie Amurath commanded to be donin retienge of an outrage don by the Polonian Costacks against the Turks: wherof news was but euen then brought to the court.

gan to cast many things in their heads about it; but aboue al others the King; who ynderstan- G ding at Casbin of all that had before happed at Reivan, and of the new preparations of the Turks, began to fear that they would this year passe to Tauris, or at least wise (as was reported) to Nassivan, and in those places build new fortresses, to the great danger of the Prisa empire, And therfore retaining fill such forces as he brought with him from Heri, and commanding as many moe as he could out of all the cities that were fubic & vnto him, to follow him vnto Tauris, he arrived there with his army not long after the arrival of Ferat Baffa at Erzium. This vnexpected comming of the Persian King with so great an army to Tauris, filled the World with expectation of great matters to have bin don by him against the Furks; insomuch that Ferat the general, before he would proceed any further, thought it good to advertise Amurah of the matter: declaring vnto him, that his defire was to go to Nassivan, and there to build a R fortresse, according to his commandement, and so to lay open a passage to Tauris. But having certain intelligence, that the Persian king was come to Tauris with a huge army, and ful reso. lution to incounter him; he thought it his duty not to put in execution his aforesaid determination, without his expres commandment. To whom Amerath prefently wrot back, that the matter to standing the should not go to Nassivan, but only imploy his forces to affure thenes, fages to Tomanis and Lori, that so the fort of Teflis might the year following be relieved by fome small band, without sending any great army for the conucying of succors thither. This new commandement of his Lord Ferat kept secret to himself, causing the rumor of his going to Nassivan to be more and more increased; of purpose to nourish the opinion that the Perfians had before conceived of his comming thither; and fo deluding them, with leffe danger 1 to build the forts he had intended, for the quieting of those most dangerous passages of Losi and Tomanis.

Vpon this resolution Ferat having gathered together his people, with all things necessary for his purpose, removed with his army from Erzirum towards Chars, where he staid ten days to take a new furuey both of his fouldiers and provision. And so departing thence fet for ward toward Lori; fending before him Haffan Baffa with five thoufand light horfemen to scour the Country even to Tomanis, and to learn what he possibly could of the enemies purposes, and of the state of Georgia. Which thing Hassan dutifully performed, speedily scow ring ouer all the woods, and difclofing all the passages from thence to Lori, and so to Tomenis, not meeting with any vpon whom to affay his valour: only certain Robbers vpon the high. way, whom he caused to be slain, as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Persian as. fairs, and their heads to be fet youn the tops of their launces; and for returned again to Lori, Where having flayd one day he met with the Generall, to whom he recounted all that had hapned in that excursion. Ferat being come to Lori, there incamped his Army. This place did somtime belong to Simon the Georgian, wel strengthned with an high castle, compassed about with very deep Ditches, and a thick Wall almost a mile in circuit, but was then somewhat weakned with time. It is diffant from Teflis about two daies fourny of a Cariers pace. Vpon this Castle Ferat seised, and having repaired the Walls; and strengthned the breacher, he placed therin Ali Baffa of Greece, with feuen thousand souldiers for the defence there and planted upon the Walls two hundred small pieces of Ordnance. And so when had set I all things there in good order, he departed thence with his Army towards Tomanis, having before commanded Ali Baffa at some convenient time to fortifie Saitan Chalass (à Castlesbout ten miles distant from Lori) and therin to place a convenient garrison of souldiers and Artillery.

Ferat builds a

Four daies were they going from Lori to Tomanis, being ordinarily but one daies worke from the one place to the other:but now the General would needs fo make it, to take the spoil of those rich fields, abounding with corn, cattel, and fruit, and to leane to the country people a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At last being come to Tomanis, in times past a Castle of Symons, but by reason of these Wars by him then abandoned) he began to consult with the other Captains, how and where the Fort should be ereched for the affurance of that M country. But after many discourses, it was at last concluded not to fortifie in that castle, as being too far from the freit, to make that dangerous paffage fafe & fecure; but 18 go a little fail ther, and to build a Fortresse upon the very mouth of the streit. So the Army marching for ward a few miles, at the very entrance of the narrow passage found the ruins of another cash.

A and neer therunto staid themselves. This steep headlong castle was so compassed round about with a thicke wood, which hindred all discouery afar off, that it was not convenient to found fuch a castle there, from whence their Ordnance could neither availe them to whom the defence thereof should bee committed, neither indamage those that should come to offend it. And therefore the Generall commanded, that every man with all his endeavors should lay to his hand for the cutting down of that thicke wood, and making way through thicke and thin. to lay it for an open champaign, that was before the receptacle of a thousand dangerous treacheries. In very thort space were the trees laid along on the ground, the place made light some and open, and a very commodious scituation prepared for the foundation of a castle. The plot The compesses of the old ruined Castle was compassed about with a wall of a thousand and seven hundred at Tomasia by yards, and in the midft therof was erected a ftrong Keep, fundry lodgings and chambers buil- Fetat. ded and 200 pieces of Ordnance distributed upon the new wals. After that, the Generall sent Refusion Baffa and the Baffa of Caraomit, with 20000 of his most choice souldiers, to conney fuccors to Teflis who marching closely together in the direct way, in one day arrived at the faid Fort; wherein they bestowed their supplies, and changing the Gouernor thereof, substituted in his room one Bagli, being then upon this occasion only called a Bassa. Whilest Resuar yet lay thus incamped under Teflis, Dant Chan the brother of Simon, who in the beginning of thesewars, at the comming of Mustapha the Turks Generall into Georgia, had fled out of Teflis, came now with all his family, and offered himselfe as a subject and devoted vasfall to the Turkish Emperour: whom Resuan entertained with great promises and large assurances of all c good successe.according to his defire.

In the meane while newes were brought to Simon, That General Ferat staying at the streits of Tomanis with his army had fent Refuan Baffa with a far leffe number than indeed he had to fuccor Teflis: Vponwhich report he tooke courage to encounter Refuan, and to give him bartell. Vpon which resolution without further delay, being accompanied but with 4000 Georgians, partly subjects of his owne, and partly of Manucchiars, he with all speed possible went again Refuan. But while & Simon was going thitherwards, Generall Feral fearing the worft. had already by chance dispatched away the two Bassa's of Caramania and Marasawith 10000 foldiers, to the end that joyning themselves with the soldiers of Resuanthey should at all aduentures be so much the stronger. Now Simon going resolutely on, sound Resum incamped D with 6000 foldiers only, at the foot of an hill, on the backe fide whereot lay all the reft of the army, and presently gaue a charge vpon him when the foldiers behind the hill being aware of his comming, were ready all at once with their weapons to receive him. Who now perceiving his error, repented himself to have so rashly assaulted his enemies, seeing now no other remedie but to be veterly vindone. But feeing that he had now fo far ingaged himfelfe, as that hee could not by flight but increase his grief, and make the issue more lamentable; with these few fouldiers which he had, he endured the fury of the great army of Refuan, to that on both fides therewas ioyned a most cruell battell: wherein the strange and vnusuall valour of those few Christians was much to be wondred at: yet in the end the huge number of the Turkish swords and speares so prevailed upon that small number of the Georgians, as that they were brought E to great extremitie: yea Simon himfelfe having his horfe flaine under him, fel downe headlong to the ground, and in his fal was very neer to have bin taken prifoner, as was his lieutenant and many other his followers, had he not been relieued by an vnexpected and maruellous chance: $imon in danfor whiles the battell was even at the greatest heat betweene them, Resuan discovered the two rates, escapely Bassas of Caramania and Maras, who (as is before said) were newly sent by General Ferat by a strange to succour him, but both by the said Refuan, and also by the rest of his army, were indeed chance. thought to be Persians; whereupon they were incontinently surprised with a sudden seare, infomuch that they now became very doubtfull of the victory, whereof they thought themfelues before affured. In this suspence and doubtfulnesse of mind the battell was also intermitted, and the victory by the fight of those their friends disturbed : whereby the Georgians, F and especially Simon, whose estate was almost desperate, tooke the opportunitie to escape and faue themselves; leaving behind them most sure signes of their valour among the Turks, of whom many remained there flaine, many wounded, and many filled with great maruell and vnexpected scare. Thus cscaped poore Simon with the remainder of his followers into his knowne places of refuge, there to bewaile the death and captivitie of his subjects. But Refuan after he had discouered the Bassa's approching toward him, to be his known friends and confederats, fretted in himself exceedingly, that Simon had so escaped his hands: yes holding on his way to Tomanis, he arrived there in great triumph, drawing the standards of Simon al along the ground, and caufing many of the Georgians heads to be caried vpon his foldiers launces. to the great ioy of General Ferat, to whom he deliuered all the prisoners taken in the battell. and wicked Daut Chan, who having in times past renounced his first faith, was become a Per fian and now again despising the vain superstition of the Persians, had yeelded himself to the vanity of the Turks, and made himself a voluntary slave to Amurath.

Now was the year so far spent, that every man began to fear the winters approch; and there fore the General determined to remoue thence, and to withdraw himself into places of more fafety. And so having set all things in order in the new fort, he appointed Hassan to be Bassan of Tomanis, and left with him 8000 fele & foldiers, chosen out of all the army, for the desence of that fort and the country therabout. Deeply had Ferat laid vp the outrage committed by Multaffa the Georgian (being now returned to his old name of Manucchiar) in taking away the Kings treasure, and killing the two Capigi and the Chiaus; and therfore resoluted with him. felf, not to return to Chars or Erzirum, vnles he had first passed into the Country of the save Georgian, and in most cruel maner revenged those notable injuries before received. In three daies he arrived at Triala, and there incamped : but lying there, fuch an vnwonted dearth and scarcity of all things possessed the Army, but especially of viduals, that every five bushels and a half of wheat was fold at fiue hundred Ducats, to the vniuerfal calamitie of the whole

From this place the General was minded to go on forward toward the country of Manuer chiar; but whilst he was upon the raising of his tents, one Veis Bassa of Aleppo came unto him and told him, that it was not good now to spend the time in wandring about those countries. for that there were three very great enemies confederat together, to make this enterprise very difficult, and almost impossible and desperat : one was the season of the year, being now ful of fnows frost and tempest: another was the want and scarines of all things necessary, especially of victuals: the third was the people of Georgia, who by a common uniting of themselves together, and peraduenture aided by the Persians, might work some notable mischief against the army. This speech of Ven so much offended the Generall, that he most sharpely rebuked him, and with bitter terms reproued him; telling him flatly, that he well perceived that K he was brought up among mountains and villages, and of a villein (as he was) upon some superfluitie of grace, or foolish importunity, advanced to the honour of a Bassa, and that thereforche should not have presumed so much as to thinke it lawfull for him, so impudently and malapertly to come and give him fuch advertisements, whereas it had bin his duty rather to have held his peace, and to have hearkened to the commandements of his betters and superiours, yeelding himselfe obedient and denoted with all his power to performe the same. With this rebuke the Generall passed on to Archelech burning and in a maner destroying the country before him, though indeed it was in amity and confederation with the Turks. But the inhabitants of Archelech vpon the comming of the Turks had abandoned the city, and for flare withdrawn themselues into the mountains. In Archelech Ferat incamped, and staied the space L of fouredaies among the rocky crags, and in a barren foile yeelding necessary sustenance neither for man nor beaft; so that every man there endured vnspeakeable miseries : yet for the space of foure daies the souldiers with patience endured this so great a calamity. But in the end, the fall of an huge fnow being added to these extremities, did so greatly increase their griefes, that all the Ianizaries and Spaoglans of Constantinople arose in a tumult, and comming before Ferat, in despightfull and contemptuous manner with very haughty and resolute termes faid vnto him:

The infolent Speech of the Ferat iheir Generall.

And how long shall we endure this thy tedious and insolent government? From this day forward it will be no longer endured that Co much people (bould continue in this famin, afflicted with makednes and many other inconveniences: and therfore get thy felf up and return toward Erzirum; otherwise we shall be inforced to do that which will breed more difflea fure wnto thee than to any man living.

The General in a great agony prefently called a Councel, wherin it was concluded. That they should all send their strong sumpter horses to Ardachan, and the rest to follow him into Manucchiar's Countrey, whither he had appointed to go only to make an inrode, and with the fooil and booty of that country to refresh the minds of his foldiers, afflicted with the miseries both past and present. This commandment of the Generals they all readily obeyed, as well B because he promised them a speedy voyage, as also for that every mandelized the sack of Altunchala, with other the territories of Manucchiar. So Ferat holding on his journy thorow certain low vallies between the high & craggy mountains, continually accompanied with great famin and fearfity, at length brought his army to Clifea, a place belonging to Manucchiar, but as then for fear of the Turks quite abandoned and for faken by the inhabitants, who with their wives and children, and all the best stuffe they had, were fled into remote and safe places, until the fury of the enemy was ouerpast. In the fields neer to this place (abounding with corn and cattel, and plenty of fruit) the General refreshed his whole army; and hoping that all the soldiers would like it wel to stay a while in that such case, determined with himself to crect a fort in that place; and with this refolution gave commandment to Refuan Baffa to gove to the tower, and in the top therof to fet up an Enfigne, with a proclamation and publique report. That he would in the name of Amurath there erect a fort, & fortifie it as he had don the other forts before. Resum accompanied with Amurath the Bassa of Caramania, according to the commandement of the general, in the top of the tower fet vp an enfigne or two, which fo food as the foldiers had espied, the forenamed Ianizaries and Spaoglans thinking themselves too much abused by the General, arising again al in an vprore, replenished with sury and indignation, ran vp in a rage to take down the ensignes that were set vp vpon the tower; and taking them in their hands, rapt the faid Refnan once or twice about the pate, discharging withal many injurious and despightful words upon him, and sharply rebuked him. And then returning to the General (who was now come thither himself to countenance the action of Resuan) with D gestures ful of despight, contempt and disdain, reutling him with many shameful and scorneful terms they protested vnto him.

That they were not come to the wars to exercise the occupation of Masons and daubers, and to bee em- The matine w ploied in such wile and dishonorable offices; but only to manage their weapons, and therby to demerit their solders again or dinary wages, and to purchase to themselves glory and renown at the Kings hand. And therfore if hele: Given & ned his head, and would not see those arms turned against himself, which hitherto had bin the revengers of the enemies injuries, he should resolve with himself to leave these new buildings and unseas inable de-Signements and giving place to the contrary seasons of the years, to have due care of their common desires and necessity.

Whilst they were yet thus expossulating the matter with him, one more bold than the rest, and more forgetful of his duty, did not stick to assault the Generall, and to threaten him to wreak his fury voon him: which in that tumult had haply bin don, had not the Balla of Caramania lent the General his own horse, and so conducted him to his papilion. Yet was hee neuertheles stil pursued by the tumultuous souldiers, and again sharply accused for the stay that he made there, and for not refoluing presently to remove thence; and at last after many reprochful speeches, said expressly. That if he did not the next morning rempone out of those quarters, without all fail he should lose his life for it. For all that, Ferst distaining to yeeld to them that should of duty have bin ready and obedient at curry beck of his and feeking by F all means (notwith standing all this stir) to stay there so long time as should bee sufficient to build a fort, that would so much offend Manucchiar; answered them again, Vpon this answer there followed divers railings and curfings against the King, against the General, and against them all: and in this confused tumult every man betook himselfe to his weapon; in euery corner was heard grumlings and whifperings ful of wrath and indignation fo that there was a great fear of some dangerous event, but greater was the suspition of thege. nerals life. And now every man had withdrawn himself to the garding of such things as hee esteemed most when suddenly and in a trice you might have seen the paullions of the Bass's & captains fal down flat to the ground, all the cords therof being cut in funder by the wrath. ful foldiers; and as it were in a moment, all the muttons and other cattel the Generall & Rat. fa's led with them for their ordinary vie, were feiled upon by the same soldiers, & garded with all diligence possible. And so far was it off, that any man durst challenge or reuenge this their insolencie, that they themselves turning afresh upon their General, being now in a maze and deadly fear, began now the third time to threaten him, That if he did not forthwith remouse from those countries, and turn his journy toward Erzirum, those vallies & fields should with. out all fail become the sepulchres of the Bassa's, and those hils retain the eternal memory of fo bloudy a day.

With a little liberality might the Generall have don with his people what societ hee had listed, but being loth to gratific them in any thing, he was inforced to performe their proud and arrogant demands, and to his great shame to obey them, whom with right viege he might have made obedient to himself: and therfore to avoid their despightful threats to his excee. ding great reproch, he was glad to yeeld to them, in remouing out of thole quarters. The first day he arrived at Ardachan, with the great trouble of all his fouldiers: for wheras the journy was wont to be two days work ordinarily, as wel in respect of the length of the way, as the difficulty of the passage, the General would now needs have it don in one, the rather thereby an grieve his foldiers. But of this his wilfulnes he received even the fame day the just remarks for that the charlots wherin his women rid were conveyed away, together with the Eunich their keepers. Some lay by the Georgians that lay in wait for luch a prey: others fay by the

Ianizaries, who the more to dithonor their Generall wrought him this iniury. Great was the reproch that Ferat received in the Army, but far greater at Constantinople, when thefe news were there known, But there was no remedy, he must now perforce induse it, and discontented as he was to keep on his way towards Erzirum. In Ardachan he took a furuey of his Army, and there gave his fouldiers leave to depart : himfelf afterwards arriving at Erzirum, hated of all his fouldiers, envied by his Captains, derided for the losse of his Women, and fallen into difgrace with every man. No leffe than the rest was the Turkish Emperordifcontented with him alfo, first, for that he had don nothing worth speaking of, in revenge of the shameful iniury don by Manucchiar the Georgian, and yet so mightily discontented his foldiers. Secondly, for that without any care he had suffered Aliculi Chan the Persianprisoner to escape away, about whose flight it was thought he could not chuse but have some intelligence. For Ferat, after he was by new order from the Court, to divert his journey from Nassivan, to the streits and narrow passages of Georgia; being desirous to be throughly informed of those dangerous waies, in this second year when he removed from Erzinum, tooks Aliculi Chan out of prison, of purpose to vie him as his guid in those dangerous freits, and therfore carried him under a gard (what foeuer it was afterwards) of his most faithful vastals; still intreating him wel, and taking such order as that he wanted nothing. At last being come to the streits of Tomanis in Georgia, where the castle (as it is before said) was erected, befrom thence secretly escaped into Persia. The manner of his escape is dinersly reported. Some fay that Ferat in discharge of his promise, for his good direction had gratified him with his liberty. Others fay, That Ford corrupted with mony, gave him opportunitie to efcape. Some M others (with more probability) That his escape was made neither for mony, nor discharge of promife, but by the only vigilancie of Aliculi himfelf, and the fleepines of his Keepers. And that watching the opportunitie of the night (a friend to all escapes) he started away. HowfoA euer it was, in fine he was deliuered from his long captiuity, to the discredit of Ferat, and returned into Persia, to performe such enterprises against the Turks, as shall be hereafter decla-

Sanzacke: and so quieted the passages from fort to fort, as that all the waies from Reivan to Chars, and from Chars to Teflis, were made easie and fase; and all the meanes taken away whereby the enemy might be able to plot any new treachery vpon those passages: which was

B no small peece of good service.

The Persian King in the meane time lying at Tauris with his army, understanding that the Turks had changed their purpose from Nassiuan to Georgia, so that there was no further need to imploy his army against them for the defence of Tauris or Nassiuan; at last resolued with himselfe to licence his soldiers to depart, and to apply himselfe to more private revenges. For calling Emir Chan vnto him, whom he had left Gouernor of Tauris, and Generall for that part of his kingdome; he required of him the occasion, why he had not performed the great promifes which he had made to him before his departure to Heri, nor done his endeauour to hinder the Turks Fabrick at Reivan; and why he went not out with other foldiers appointed for that purpose, and namely, with the Turcomans (as he had promised) to reuenge so great an injury, C and in best maner he could, to have indamaged the Turkish forces ? Sundry excuses did Emir Chan alledge for the colouring of his manifest default, but none sufficient to cleare him of the crimes objected against him by the king and the Sultans: wherefore he was by the King ad- Emirchanhal judged to have his cies burnt out with an hot yron; and so deprived of his fight, to be despois wingbusins pat led of all his goods and thut up inclose prison. Which heavy doome was without further de- rably in prison. lay accordingly put in execution: whereof within the space of a few moneths, the wicked Chan (but yet a famous foldier) miserably died in prison. Whose death so highly offended the Turcoman nation (who had him alwaies in great estimation) that they absolutely denied their defences for the crowne of Persia; and the more, when they heard that the King had bestowed the roome of Emir Chan upon Aliculi; who although he had in many respects descrued all preferments, yet for that he was an antient enemy to certain Turcoman captains, they would not in any wife endure that he should be exalted to so great an honour. And therefore they waxed more diffdainefull and ill affected towards the King, whereby the Persian forces became the more weakened and divided.

The Turks notwithstanding the league yet in force betwixt Amurath and Rodolph the Christian Emperor then reigning, did many times make incursions into the upper part of Hungary, burning the country villages, and carrying away the people into captivity:buc in their return, they were oftentimes cut off by the Emperors foldiers and flaine. Which being reported at Constantinople, much moued the Turkish tyrant : but when he vnderstood that his men had without any cause made those inrodes into the territory of the Christians, and so received E the foresaid losses, he was againe appealed, and in the beginning of this yeare 1584, renewed the league betwixt him and the Emperor for eight yeares more.

Ferat from Erzirum aduertised Amurath of all that had hapned in his late expedition desiring him to command what he would have taken in hand the next Spring. But besides this information from him, there wanted not many others which did the like also, although in another manner: declaring vnto the king (and that in an odious fort) the whole proceedings of Ferat, the escape of Aliculi Chan, the shameful losse of his women, his quarrels with the Ianizaries, his falling our with Veis Baffa, a man well regarded of Amurath himselfe, the disorders of his whole camp for his want of discretion; and to be short, the particularities of al such a sions as had not altogether so honorably bin by him performed that yearc: causes of themselves sufficient to induce the king to remoue the faid Ferat from his General ship. To which occasions, were also added fundry other secret respects: for ever since the last departure of Ferat from Erzirum, Amurath had still in his head, the next yeare following to attempt the enterprise of Tauris, and thereby to ftir vp through the World a famous report of his conquest correspondent to his greatnesse. Now among the captaines whom he esteemed to be worthy men, to whom he might with trust commit this so great an enterprise, he bethought himselfe of of, c man Bassa, left at Sumachia in Siruan by Generall. Mustapha in the first yeare of this war who man Bajja, lett at Suthachia in Shound of had without any helpe of the Tartatians, by his owne industry and valor, to the great contentment of Amurath, brought that large country in to a reasonable obedience to the Turkish Empire: and that which most of all pleased the Turkish Emperour, had in a country so far distant, maintained his army, wherewith he had done all this without any expences at all to his king; having now a good while levied his fouldiers Ripends upon the lands and territories of that region; and ftill exercifed a kind of government and four-reignty ouer those places. Of all which his good proceedings, he had caused intelligence from time to time to be fent vnto the court: by which means, and other fauorers which he had about the King, there was fostered in the minde of Amurath a wonderfull good opini. H Amnrath Ru-detb fer Ofman on of him; fo that now without delay he refolued to fend for him to Constantinople; and for that purpose, before Ferat was arrived at Erzirum, he had dispatched certain Capigi & Chiang to call this famous warriour vnto him : yet wanted there not fome (and those not of the meenest fort) that went about to hinder both his comming to the court, & also these disignements of fo great importance. For Scians the chiefe Visicr (who rather for the comelinesse of his perfon and alliance with the king, than for any other his vertues, was mounted to that high room) did greatly feare, lest ofman whose course it was to fit next vnto him in the order of the great test Bassaes, partly for his experience in matters of war, and partly for the good affection the king did beare vnto him, should at his comming to Constantinople perswade the king to what he lifted, and so peraduenture take from him the chiefest office, & get into his hands the whole government of the empire, whereby fo great wealth was to be gained. Wherefore to ridhimselfe of these seares, he cast about by all means to keep him from comming to the court; but because that to attempt the same openly, might proue a matter both difficult and dangerous. he thought it better to make triall of a more commodious and fecret meanes. This Sciencin consideration of many gifts bestowed vpon him by Mahamet the Cuman. Tartarking, hadmany times excused him to Amurath of divers accusations which ofman by his letters had laid to his charge; For not aiding him in the subduing of Siruan, as he was both by promise and duty bound : and for all his overfights alledged fuch reasons in his behalfe, as if they did not altogether persuade Amurath to be kinde vnto him, yet at the least notto carry a mind of revenge against him and had so far proceeded in countenancing this Tartarian king, that there was betwixt them confirmed an interchangeable amity and mutuall confederacy. Him Scians imagined to find willing and ready by al means possible, to hinder the comming of ofman his enemy to the Court, if he were but made acquainted with the matter. And therefore Sciam, as soone as he understood the certain resolution of Amurath, to call Osman to the court, secretly wrote to the Tartar king, who lay incamped neer to the finnen of Caffa vpon the Fens of Meotis; certifying him, That ofman was to come to the court; and that therefore it were good for him to call to mind, how great an energy he had beene to him, and how much he had endeauoured by letters to Amurath, to turne all his hatred and displeasure against him : and withall, That ishe was able to doe so much by letters, as if Sciaus had not defended him with very reasonable excuses, the King had executed his wrathfull indignation upon him to his great danger; hee I should then imagine with himselfe, what ofman should be able to do, when he should come in person to the presence of Amurath, and without any mediator, betweene themselves determine of all matters what they should thinke convenient. These, and peraduenture worse Letters which Scians wrote to the Tartar, ministred matter enough vnto him to resolue to do what he might, not to fuffer so pernitious an enemy of his to arrive at Constantinople: and especially perceiving that Sciam, in whose breast he reposed all his hope and all his protection, did so greatly feare his comming. Wherefore to rid himselfe of that feare, he commanded twelve thousand soldiers, that changing their weapons and apparell, they should goe and lie in wait for Ofman in the borders betweene Cholchis, and Iberia, towards the Tartarian Nomades, by which way he was to come; and so making an affault vpon him, to bereaue him of his life. M Hoping that such an outrage once done, could not, or would not, be imputed to his procurement, but rather to the Tartar Nomades, or to the Mengrellians, or to the Georgians, or to the Muscouites, or to the robbers by the high way; and to be short, rather to any body esfe, than to him. This commandement of the Tartar King, was accordingly by the fouldiers put

A in practife: who without further stay joyned themselves together, and so rode towards the place appointed.

And now were the meffengers fent from Amurath, come to Ofman, who prefently put himfelfe on his way towards Constantinople, having left behind him at Derbent and Sumachia. two Baffaes, thought to be the most sufficient men in Seruania: having also appointed very good orders in the fame, and an affured establishment of all those countries and places which Multapha had first fubduced, and he himselfe had afterwards maintained under the obedience of Amurath. He had also prouided for the lafety of his own person, in passing those troublesome and dangerous passages through which he was to travell, by chusing our foure thousand souldiers which he had tried in divers battels, and brought up under his owne discipline; through B whose valor, he doubted not safely to passe through the treacheries of the Albanians, and the populous fquadrons as well of the Tartarians as of the Mengrellians.

Thus departed he from Defbent and coasting along the rocks of Caucasus (that at al times of the yeare all white and hoary with continuall flowes) leaving on his left hand Media. Iberia and Colchis, and on the right hand, the famous river of Tanais and Volga, even at his Ofman affait. first entrance vnto the shores of the Euxine sea, he was by the aboue named twelve thousand to about and thousand to a Tartarians, being apparelled like the ues that lievpon those waies, suddenly affailed & fought int. withall. But like as a huge rocke lying open to rempelt and waves, standing fast and vnmoucable in it felfe, refishesh the thundrings and rushings of the great and fearefull billowes: fo flood Ofman fast & firme, and couragiously sustained this treacherous affault, turning the bold

This Tartar King was one of those mighty Princes, who basely yeelding to the Othoman power, led under them a most vile and troublesome life, as their tributaries and vassals, alwaies at commands whose yonger brother Islam (presuming of the sufficiency of himselfe and the fa-E uor of the people) going to Conftantinople, became a futor to the Turkish Emperor, to have his eldest brother thrust out of his kingdome, as a man for his euill gouernment hated of his subjects, and to be placed limitelie in his roome. Which his fuit was so crossed by the Embasfadors of the king his brother (who spared for no cost in the behalfe of their master) that the ambitious youth was fent from the Turks court to Iconium, and there clapt fast vp in prison: where apparelled like an Eremit, he led his life altogether conformable to his mifery, with fuch a kind of external linnocency, as if he had been void of all hope or ambirious defire of a kingdom, but rather like a forlorn and vnhappy wretch with vain affliction & impious deuotion to prepare himselfe to a laudable and honorable death. But whils he thus lived sequestred from all wordly cogitations, upon the discouery of the king his brothers rebellion, he was in F more than post hast fent for to Constantinople, and put into the gallies bound for Cassa, with ofman stranletters to Ofman of the tenour aforefaid. Now in the meane time Ofman had by cunning means the Tartar king got into his hands this Tartar king, being as is reported betraied by his owne counsellours, with bit into corrupted by the Turks gold: whom with his two sonnes of man upon the receipt of the spanisholder. aforefaid lerrers from Amurath, caused to be presently strangled with a bow string, and Islam his in business.

Amarath had in the open Divano deprived the faid Sciaus from the office of the chiefe Vifier, and hardly pardoning bim his lite, at the intercession of his wife, being his sister, had banished him the Court, so that he liued afterwards about Calcedon, vpon the borders of Afia, not far from Constantinople, in a close palace he had there built for his owne pleasure; in whose roome he appointed of man to be chiefe Visier, and to honour him the more, nominated him the Generall of his army against water biff it the Persians. Such power hath Vertue, that even from the yery scum of the rascall fort, and out of the rufticall rout of mountain peafants (which notwith flanding cannot be truly justified of this Ofman, his father being Beglerbeg of Damasco, and his mother, the daughter of the Beglerbeg of Babylon) it doth oftentimes in the course of this variable world draw diversmen into Princes courts, and advance them to the highest dignities. Truth it is, that from a privat fouldier, though well born, he by fundry degrees grew up to the highest honor of that so great an Empire, and was at one instant created the chiefe Counsellor and Generall of the Otherwan forces. Great was the joy that Ofman conceived hereat: & great was the defire he had to make I himselfe worthy of so honorable fauors; and the greater confidence he perceived that Amerath had reposed in him, the more eagerly was he spurred on to doe anything possible whereby be might show himselfe to have descrued the same. And therefore adulting with himselfe, the foralmuch as the greatnesse of the enterprise required a greater army than was levied in former yeares, so was it necessary also for him the sooner to send out his aduertisements into all his subject provinces, and by his own example to stir vp the other captaines and souldiers even in the Winter (though it were as yet somewhat troublesome) to passe ouer to Scutati, and from thence to Angori, to Amasia, to Sinas, and there in those territories to drive out the time, untill his fouldiers which were fummoned, were all gathered together. And because, on this his great speed it might peraduenture fall out, that the enemy misdoubting his pur. M pole for Tauris, might prouide a greater army than they would otherwife, he caused it tobe giuen out, That he must goe for Nassiuan; to the end, that the Persians so beguiled, should not regard the gathering of so mighty an Army as they would have done if they should have

And although the difference offered to his Embassador at Constantinople, distinated him from sending any other for treaty of peace : yet to spy out the secrets of the Turks, and to vnderstand the certainty of their purpose for Nassiuan or Tauris, he sent divers messengers to Ofman, as if he had meant to feele his mind touching a peace; but invery deed for nothing els but to found his designements: which for all that, he could not with all the cunning he could vie possibly discouer, but still remained doubtfull as at the first, the Fame still running for

These Mutes are lufty ftrong fellows, deprined of their speech; who neverthelesse by certaine signes can both aptly expresse their own conceits and understand the meaning of others: these men for their fecrecy are the cruell ministers of the Turkish tyrants most horrible commands; and therfore of them had in great regard, With these Mutes mounted upon faire and fat, but heavy and vnready horses, was Amurath, upon a light and ready horse, sporting himselfe (as the maner D of the Turkish Emperors is) riding sometime about one, sometime about another; and striking

E: h This yeare also happed such a chance as had like to have raised new warres betwirt the A most barbe-Turks and the Venetians: which, for a fmuch as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good rous outrage in silence to passe over. The widow of Ramadan Bassa, late Gouernor of Tripolis in Barbary, Committed by with her fonne, her family, and a great number of flaues of both forts, being about to depart a Vention. from Tripolis to Constantinople, had rigged up a faire gally for the transporting of her selfe and her fub flance, reported to be worth eight hundred thousand duckats; vpon which galley forher more fafety, the had joyned two others as conforts. Thus embarked, the came to the mouth of the Adriaticke; where failing by Corfu, the was by force of tempest driven into the gulfe of the Adriaticke. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senatours, with certaine gallies, had the charge for the keeping of that sea against pyrats, and all other enemies whatfoeuer. He hearing of the Turks comming into the gulfe, without delay fet voon them, and being too flrong for them, tooke them all : and having them now in his power, exercifed most barbarous craelry, as well upon the women as the men for having slain the men, in number two hundred and fifty, and the sonne of Ramadan in his mothers lap, he caused the women, being before rauished, to have their breasts cut off, and afterwards to be cast ouer boord to entertaining them with all affable curtefie, and promising both rewards and hopors to such & as would follow him in his purposed expedition, he leuied a wonderfull great number both of men and monies. And now was the time come that called him away to go toward Erzirum where he was greatly expected of his huge army there affembled together. And nowithfian ding the great dearth of victuall that commonly reineth in those quarters, yet this ber hemale. where he arrived about the latter end of the moneth of July, in the yeare 1585; and there to king a view of his whole army, and of all the provision necessary for so important and famous an enterprise, he dayly labored to hasten his departure. In this city of Erzirum were met toget ther all the foldiers of the provinces that were wont to fend helpe, but yet in greater number than ever was gathered by any Generall before : for that every man for fooke his owne printe businesse, and vpon assured hopes of new rewards and vnwonted honours, were all induced to H follow the fame of this their new Visier and Generalionly the people of Ægypt and Damaigo were busied with other more privat quarrels at home, whereof because they were both of great importance, and also fell out at this very instant (leaving Ofman with his army for a while as Erzirum) I will in as few words as I may make a briefe rehearfall.

to Care to go Herne there.

Amurath had heretofore taken Haffan Baffa the Eunuch out of the Seraglio, from the charge he had there to scrue in the Queenes Court, and at her instance sent him as Bassa to Cairethe great city of Ægypt. Which great office, beside the honour belonging vnto it, is elso benef. cial to them whose good hap it is to be advanced thereunto : the riches, the multitude of people inhabiting therein being fo great, that it feemeth not to be one city, but rather to contain within the large circuit thereof many cities. This man being exceeding couctous, and therfore defirous to handle the matter in fuch fort, as that he should, little need to seeke for any more fuch grants at the Kings hands; fought by all manner of means to oppreffe the wholenstion. and by all importunities to wring and extort from them rewards and bribes, without regard of honesty or reason. By which his sinister and corrupt dealing hee had now made himselfe so olious and intollerable to the people in generall, that they in great number, and many times. began to goe to Constantinople, and with humble petitions to request the King to take from them luch a cruel and vajust Gouernor : so that generally in the Court there was no talke but of the villanies and mischieses that were reported of the couctous Eunuch. At last Amerah feeing these publique exclamations went dayly so far, as that he could not for shame let them go any further without due punishment, he resolued with himselfe to call him to the Court & and having fent vnto him certain messengers, admonished him sundry times to returne home. But the Eunuch loth to leave so fit an occasion to enrich himselfe, did still delay his returne, alledging divers feigned excuses for his longer stay. Which thing when Amuraib understood, thinking himselfe thereby deluded, he determined to prouide for so great a disorder, and by punishing of the mischieuous Eunuch, to satisfie in some part the discontented minds of his oppressed subjects in Caire.

Ebrain Baffa in

There fat at that time among the chiefe Baffa's of the Court, one Ebrain (or as some cal him, Beech to marry Ibrahim) by nation a Sclauonian, a young man of the age of 22 yeares, or thereabouts, of very faire conditions, and of a reasonable judgement; vpop whom Amurath himselfe had determined to bestow his owne daughter to wife, and so to make him his son in law. And therefore I being now minded to remove the Eunuch from his office, and to farisfig the city and being alfowilling withall to give means for his faid fonne in law to enrich himfelfe, he refolued to fend him as general Syndic & foueraigne Indge into Ægypt; giving him in particular charge, to remember how wickedly his predecessor had dealt before him. And so this new Bassatook his journy towards Ægypt, although there ran before him a great rumor of his comming, and of the great authority wherewith he was fent. At which report, as the Agyptians reflection tent and joyfull, so the Eunuch waxed very sad and sorrowfull: persuading himselfe, that this alteration could not but engender some strange iffue and effe & against him. Whereuponalpiling himselfe to provide better for his owne affaires and the safety of his life, he resolved not to stay the comming of the new Gouernour; but departing out of Ægypt, her with M great care and circumspection for feare of meeting with Ebrain, trauelled towards Confian tinople in hope to appeale the Kings wrath, or at least by mediation of bribes, and by the intercession of the Queene, to finde him more favourable than hee thould finde Birde who without doubt would not have spared any extremity of cruelty, to have berest him both of his

A goods and life together. Amurath advertised from Ebrain, of the sudden flight of the Eunuch Bassa out of Ægypt, & hearing withall, that he kept not the high way from Caire to Constantinople, began to feare, left when he came into Soria, he should sty into Persia to the King, and fo worke him double and treble damage; as one that had already gathered a huge treafure, and having long lived in the Court, knew the most secret affaires thereof, and had learned all the priny denices and fashions of the Seraglio. Whereupon he with all diligence dispatched his Imbrahur Baffi (whom we call Mafter of his horse) with forty of his Capigi (all Gentlemen Viners and officers of most secret and neerest roomes about him) with charge and commandement, that if they met him they should bring him to the court, ving all the aid and affiliance of his people that might be requifit; and for that purpose delivered vnto him very effectuall B and large letters after the best manner of the Court. This messenger with his appointed train departed, and without any extraordinary inquiry, found the Eunuch in Soria, incamped in the plaines neere vnto the city now called Aman, but in times past Apamea, the principall city of that country. As foone as the Eunuch understood of the comming of the Imbrahur himselfe, The matrixelfe he gaue order to his guard of flaues, which in great number with speares and arcubuses did of the costing ordinarily kept his paulion, that they, should not grant entrance into his tent to any, but only vnto the Imbrahur himfelfe, and if need were, by force to keepe the rest of the Capigi from comming in Which order was in very good time given; for as foone as the kings officer had discovered the tents of the fugitive Bassa, in all hast he ran towards the same, and seeking out the greatest among them, went presently thither, to have entred with all his followers: but the C flaues being in armor, opposed themselves against them, and permitting only the Imbrahur to enter in entertained the rest of his traine without. The Imbrahur boing come in read vnto him the commandement which he had from the King to bring him to the court; and most instantly moued him, that without any further refistance, he would quietly go with him. To whom the wary Eunuch answered, Behold, how without any calling of the King, or conducting by you, I come of my lette, well assured to finde not only pardon and pitty, but also favour and grace in the light of my Lord whole woright and milde nature the wicked treacheries of my falfe accusers cannot abuse, to the prejudice of me an innocent. And so without more ado they went all to Constantinople : the Eunuch fill standing voon his guard.

The politike and crafty Eunuch had in this meane time dispatched diners posts with let-D ters to the Sultan ladies, certifying them of his comming, & principally befeeching the queen to prote & him, and to appeale the kings wrathfull indignation that haply he might have conceived against himsand so at length they arrived at Scutari. As soone as Amurath understood The Ennach of his comming thither, he caused all the treasure which hee had gathered to be taken from at contents. him, with all the rest of his privat substance, and the wretch himselfe to be clapt in prison in nogle, and his the Iadicula or seuen towers. Where after he had languished many daies, still searing some sail gotten deadly blow, he at length received from the Queene, an vnexpected, but most welcome aduerrisement, That he should be of good cheare and quiet himselfe, for that his wealth had already faued his life, and that the hoped in thort time to procure him also his liberty. Which indeed the brought to passe; for the her selfe made earnest petition to Amurath her husband,

E that for a fmuch as he had bereft her Eunuch of all his goods, he would yet at last deliver him out of prison, and restore him vnto her againe. Which request of the Queenes was granted accordingly, and the Eunuch enlarged : but the treasure that he had so vnjustly scraped together in Ægypt, that remained still among the gold and other jewels of the Kings.

But Ebrain Baffa with his new commission now arrived in Ægypt, had in short space by far more finister means than had the Eunuch before him, scrapt together such an infinit heap of tiches, as was able only of it felfe to make him worthy of his promifed wife, and therfore he was called home to the court, to accomplish the intended mariage. With this commandment to returne to Constantinople, he received also in charge, to make his journey through the people of Drufia; and fuch as he should find loyal, to confirme them in their due obedience, & to make them pay their antient duties; but fuch as he should find stubborne and disobedient he should quite root them out and destroy them. This commandement Ebrain presently put in execution, and having packed up together all the riches he had gathered in the time of his gouernment, and raifed good flore of foldiers in that protince, he tooke with him thirteen Sanzackes, that were ordinarily accustomed to sit as affistants under the gouernment of the Bassa in the ruling of the populous territories of Caire, and so set forwards towards Gaza, patting & ouer those valt and huge wildernesses of sand that lie betweene Caire and Gaza. From Gaza. joyning the Sanzacke thereof with him, he went to Ierufalem; and from thence, earling the Sanzacke there also to follow his traine, he surned by Saffetta, by Lezium, by Naplos called in times past Samaria) Rill taking with him the Sanzacks of all those places, and at latter. ned himselfe towards Damasco; so that before he joyned with the band of Damasco, he had gotten together eighteene Sanzacks, with all their squadrons of souldiers and slades Besides these, he had also his own privat Court, which was wonderfull populous, and swe handred le nizaries of Constantinople, whom Amurath would needs have him to take with him athis departure from the Court, so that he had in his army almost twelve thousand horsemen. From Damasco, Veis the Bassa was come as far as serusalem to meet him, with all the souldiers will he his gouernment, in number about two thousand persons. Besides that, there came vnto him by the way of Sidon, the Aga of the Ianizaties of Cyprus, with all the band of that defolate and destroicd Island: which captaine with his foldiers was transported ouer into the main; in those gallies that by the Kings appointment were sent to fetch Ebrain. who now drength. ned with all these souldiers, had purposed the etter ruine of the disobedient Drusians, and the raising of his own glory by triumphing over them.

These Drusians, against whom these great preparations were now made by this new Captaine, and of whom the Turkish Emperor is so suspicious and doubtfull, are supposed to beby difcent Frenchmen, the relikes of those that with great denotion did in times pass fight those memorable and Christian battels in Iury, and recouered the holy city sbut being afterwards 1 brought low, partly by the plague, and partly by the fury of the Barbarians, mingled their feed with the circumcifed nation, and fo together with their authority & command, loftelfotheir first faith and religion: yet so, that they grew into an harred of the Turkish superfliction, &c abhorring the circumcission of the Iewes, betooke themselves to a new Prophet of their own called I finan, whose doctrine they follow. The right Drussans live vncircumcifed, neither do they forbeare wine, as do the Turks: they make it lawfull among them (most vnlawfully) to many with their own daughters: the Turkish gouernment they have sought by all means to eschue, and notwithstanding all the endeuors and attempts of the Turkish tyrants, but especially of Selymus the second, yet have they alwaies bin subject to their own natural Princes, and would neuer admit any captain or gouernor of the Turks within the countries which they poffelled. They are a people very warlike, stout, resolute, and religious observers of their own superstitute on in battel they vie the arcubule & scimitar, yet some of them at this day do serue with lances and darts: they are apparelled after the manner of the Easterne people, with a turbanton their heads, & breeches they never weare, but in flead therof they couer those parts with their coat; which reacheth down to their knees, buttoning it up before; their feeding is groffe, and of The countries mountaine meats: they inhabit all the countrie that is inuironed within the confines of lopps, aboue Caelarca & Palestina, and within the rivers of Orantes & Iordan, stretching it self even to the plaine of Damasco, neere to the hils that compasse it about vpon the coast of mount Libanus. They were all in times past good friends & confederats, so that they were greatly escemed : but noow being at variance through greedinesse and couetousnesse, they were divided I Fine chiefe Tuamong themselves, one seeking the destruction of another. At this time they were governed not among the by five chiefe captains or governors: one of them was called Ebne. Man, and of the Turks Man-Ogli; another Serafadin; the third Mahamet Ebne-Manfar; the fourth Ebne-Free; and the fifth Ali-Ebne Carfus, by the Turks called Ali-Carfus Ogli. Vnder thefe (who indeed carry the title and authority of an Emir, that is to fay, King or Chiefe) there are divers their lieutenants or deputies whom they call their Macademi or agents. Ebne Man or Man Ogli inhabited the moustains and fields that are contained under the jurisdictions of Cæsarea, of Ptolemaida, of Tynis, and of Sidon, and had his refidence for most part vpon the hill, in a town called Anderaghe was very mighty in men & armour, and fince the time that by treachery his father was murhered by Mustapha then Bassa of Damasco, alwaies a ideadly enemy to the name of the Turkes. M Ebne. Free, Ebne-Carfiu, and Bbne-Mansur were alwaies great friends ; but now especially at the comming of Ebrain Baffa they shewed themselves more streightly consederated together. Serafadin and Man Ogli were euer opposite against them : so that the one sideprocuring the ouerthrow of the other, they loft their strength, and left no meanes to defend them-

A selues against the Turks, who had long lien in wait for their liberty. Now as soone as the news came among them, That Ebrain being departed from Caire, was comming into Soria to fubdue them: the three confederates aboue named refolued among themselues to goe and meet this great Baffa, and to submit themselves vnto him, of purpose to turne all the intended mischiefe vpon Serafadin and Man. Ogli their enemies. And so having packed vp great store of monev, cloath of filke, cloath of woollen, and cloath of gold, with many loads of filkes, and other things of exceeding value, enery of the three being accompanied, one with some two thoufand, another with some three thousand men, they put themselves vpon their journey towards Three of the Ebrain, and met him at Icrusalem, where he was already artiued. This their comming Ebrain Drusantords tooke in wonderfull good part, and courteously accepted those their rich and great presents remain with which they brought him; and by the offers of their fidelity, and the gricuous acculations they rieb prejeate, & made against the other two Drusian lords their enemies, began to conceine great hope of his of mea. intended enterprises for why, he saw that nothing could more easily compasse their overthrow, than this their discord. Being thus accompanied, he came by the way of Damasco, to the champaigne of Bocca, and there incamped. This was in the month of Inly this yeare 4585. The whole army that was with Ebrain, reckoning also the foldiers of the three Drusian lords, was about the number of twenty thousand horsemen strong. In this place there came people out of all quarters thereabouts, with presents to honour the Bassa; to whom he likewise yeelded such small fauors as his couctous nature could afford them.

From this place also Ebrain presently sent letters to Serafadin and Ebneman, whereby he in-C uited them to come vnto him, to acknowledge their obedience vnto the Sultanifor that otherwife they might affure themselves to be in short time deprived both of their estates and lives. For all that, Man Ogliwould not by any meanes come in. But Serafadin being poore both in wealth and forces, refolued to come, in hope by rich prefents to purchase his attonement with the great Bassa. And therefore having packed up together divers loads of silke, great store of money, and many cloaths of good value and beauty, and also attended vpon with divers of his subjects, he arrived at last at the pavilion of Ebrain, with these his rich presents, which Serafadin comwere there readily received, and he himselse with great attention heard: whose speech in ef- meth with prefect tended to no other thing, but only to perfuade the Baffa, That he had alwaies beene a denoted vasfall vnto Amurath, and that he had carried a continuall defire to be imployed in any

D his feruice; and that now being led by the fame affection, and affured of his fauour, by the friendly and courteous offers made him in his letters, he was come to thew himfelfe vnto him to be the same man, and so profered him what soeuer lay in his slender power to performe. Whereunto Ebrain made no answer at all; but onely asked him the cause why he lived continually in discord and brawles with the three Emirs (who also sat at that time in the same paullion.) Whereunto Serafadin answered, That it was not long of him, who as one defirous of peace, had not at any time taken up armes, but in the just defence of himselfe, against the injuries of those his enemies, who because they were more mighty than he, sought continually to oppresse him. Hereat the three conspirators arose, and with their grim looks bewraying their inward hatred, falfely charged him to have beene cuer the author of those brawles; ad-B ding moreouet, That his infolency was at that time growne fo great, as that no strange vessell durst for feare of him arrive at the ports of Sydon, Tyrus, or Berito; nor any merchant cimerchandise passe ouer the plaines, but that those countries, as though they were a prey and spoile to the theeues of Arabia, were generally shunned of all trauellers both by sea and land, to the great hinderance of the Sultans customes. Serafadin would hereunto have gladly replied, but preuented by Ebrain, and furcharged with many injurious words, was committed to the custody of the two hundred Ianizaries of Constantinople. And so being by them brought into a rotten tent that was appointed for him, was every night from thence forward put in the flocks fast chained, and continually guarded with a rrusty gard of the same Ianizaries. In the meane eime came the answere of Man-ogli, who wrote backe vnto the great Bassa Ebrain as fol-

To the Lords of Lord, Sourceigne about the Great Ones, the mighty, the noble Captaine confinto the Aluttrof Man grand Lord, and the worthieft among the elect of the Prophet Mahomet, the noble and famous Lord Ordies, to E Ebraim Baffa, God gine good successeto his hanghty enterprises, and profestly in all his honour. I wish (cuen as thou doest louingly inuite and exhort me) that I might come before the and follow thee, and forme & thee alwaies in any occasion that it may happen thee to fland in meed of my helps. For thumshat then wouldest rest assured of the reuerence that I beare sowards the Lord, and of the most fermentas then wouldest rest assured to imploy both my life and my substance in his service i whereof I had also river (ome testimony, though but small, in the managing of his customes that I have received inherein I have alwaies so carried my selfe, as that I am not his debier of one after: a thing I win that Ebnedlanting was is now with thee) hath not done. For although by his comming to meet thee auen as far as Ierufalen, he would make a show of his fidelity, yet doth hee vsurpe more than two hundred thousand duckets of the Kings, which he doth most unjustly detaine from him of his customes. But my hard fortune will not grant me the favour that I may come unto thee : for there are at thus time present with thee three of mine ene. methe fauour inas I may come contented to have alwayes disquieted and troubled my stare, doe non H seeke to bring me into so great hatred with thy heart, that if thou haddest me in thy hands thou wouldest without any consideration bereaue me of my life. And I am assured, that this sending for me important no other thing but only a desire thou hast to imprison me, and so to kill me: for I know how much then me given to great enterprises. Besides this, my comming is also hindered by mine antient outh that I tooke; when as being yet but a childe, I saw mine owne father so villanously betraied by the murthering sword of Mustaplia, being at that time the Bassa of Damasco, who under the colour of unfeigned friendship, en him into his hand, and traiteroully strucke off his head. For in truth I carry the image of my father reucrend head, all pale, and yet as it were breathing, imprinted in my minde, which oftentimes presented it felfe unto me, as well fleeping in the darkeneffe of the night, as also waking in the light of the day; and talking with me, calleth to my remembrance the infidelity of the murthering Tyrant, and exhortethmeso keep my felfe aloofe from the hands of the mighty. And therefore I neither can nor may obey thy requelts. and in that reflect it grieucth me that I fall feeme disobedient unto thee, being in any other allien and in all my cogitations wholly addicted to doe any service not only to thee, who art most worthy to be reverenced of far greater perfons than I am, but also to every the least vallals of Amurath, Thou wilt parden me I hope, and thou halt well perceive, that if there be any thing neere me that may be acceptable waterbee. all that I have what socuer, though in respect of thy selfe it may seeme wile and base, get is it thine, and is now reserved wholly for thee, and not for me. Farewell; and command me, and hold me excused were these just causes which thou hearest, for my being so backeward in comming to honour thee, as my duty requireth.

The poore and the least among the flaues of the grand Lord,

The Sonne of Man.

Man Oglies.

Ebrain perceiving by this letter the resolution of Man-Ogly, resoluted also in himselfe to go upon him with all his army, and either by force or fleight to get him into his hands or at leaft to draw from him so many arcubuses, and as great gifts and tributes as possibly hemight: and therefore rifing with his campe, and turning himselfe toward the country of Man-Ogli, hebutned and destroied foure and twenty of his townes, and so mounting vp certainerockes of Libanus, vpon the top of a large hill (that standeth ouer Andara and other places belonging to I Veil Buffa and Man Octi) he incamped himselfe. But whiles the army was thus marching forward, Veil Buffa of Damascowith a great part of his people, and his sonne the Sanzacke of Ierusalem, with his foldiers likewife, to the number of fifteen hundred persons, having separated themselves from the rest of the army in manner of a rereward; as they were busic in raising their tents, upon the fudden were furiously assaulted by a great band of Drusians of the faction of Man Ogli, and discomfitted. Which victory the Drusians so prosecuted that they became lords of the paville ons, the wealth and armour of the Turks; and leading away with them their horses and their carriages, put to the sword fine hundred persons, and scarce gaue any leisure of escape either to the Bassa the father, or the Sanzacke his sonne, who sled streight to Ierusalem, and neger to turned againe to Ebrain; but Veis his father still followed the army with those few which be had left, and was thought worthy of all men to be pittied.

Vpon the hill aforesaid, Ebrain continued twenty foure daies together, with abundance of all things necessary for victual:during which time he attended nothing els, but to try all denis fes how he might draw mony and presents from Man-Ogli, or how he might traine him into

A his hands. For the compassing wherof he dispatched one Gomeda (Ebne-Mansars Agent) vnto Ebrain fends Man Ogli being in Andrea, to tel him, That for a fmuch as he would not give credit to the pro- for arcubules mile that was made him, nor adventure himselfe into the hand of his friend, he should fend hierall the arcubules he had; for that the Sultans pleasure was, that his people that went not to the wars in his feruice, should not be furnished with so great store of weapons, to the danger of their neighbors, and of the subjects themselves. With great griefe of mind did caten beli behold the messenger, as the man whom he well knew to be the agent of his deadly Enemy : vet in regard of him that fent him, he forbare to doe him injury, or to give him any reprochitelling him, That all his people and weapons were dispersed abroad ouer his territory, fo that he could not tel what arcubules to fend him:with which cold aufwer Gomeda returned Which thing when Ali Bassa of Aleppo vnderstood, he offered the Generall to goe himselse unto him, and that to some better purpose. Many reasons did Ali Bassa vie to persuade the warv Drusian to come and yeeld his obedience to Ebrain, swearing that no harm should bee don vnto him, and withall promifing him great and honorable fauors. But never could be tomoue the resolute and provident mind of Man Ogli, or win him to yeeld himselfe into such a mans hands whom he thought to be fo murderous: yet at last with much ado, he so far preuailed with the Drussan Lord, that in signe of the reverence he did bear toward the Generall, and his obedience towards Amurath, he was content to fend a prefent to Ebrain. And therupon he gaue him 320 arcubules, 20 packs of Andarine filks, and fifty thousand ducats to carry to the Bassa for a gift and to reconcile him vnto him. For the better effecting wherof hee sent C his own mother unto the great Baffa, who in the behalf of her fonne performed a very worthy meffage, excusing him as wel in respect of his enemies that fate there so neer vnto him as also in regard of the oath which he had folemnly fworn, That for the treachery of Mullapha, hee would never commit himself into the hands of a Turk; and therefore belought him to accept of the gifts that were fent him, and withall a mind and heart most ready to ferue and obey the King in all occasions; and that he would hold him excused, for that his excuses were but just reasonable. Wherunto the Turk replied, That although she had found so foul a fault in Mu- The metable fapha (who vider the assurance of his promise and sidelity had betraied her husband) yet for differenting of all that the ought not to fear any fuch infamous or wicked act at his hands, who flood youn his honour, and the word of a fouldier. And fo by oath protesting all faithfull and constant

D friendship towards him; in token of his sincere meaning, he cast a white vail about her neck, and put another vpon himself, and the third he gaue her in her hands: Willing her to report vnto her fon the othes he had made, and to carry that vail, and bring him with her; protesting no otherwise to intreat him than as a friend and a brother. The peaceable old woman went away accordingly, but thee neither could nor would go about to alter the purpose of her for. but returned to Ebrain such an answer as did not greatly please him. After which time hee fought more than ever before to get the wary Drussan into his hands, or at least, without regard of thame, to draw from him moe presents and weapons. And therfore once again he sent the crafty Gomeda, to exhort him, ypon faith and promife given, to come vnto him; but for all the craft and lying speeches that the treacherous messenger could cunningly vie he could obtain nothing of the Druffan lord but good words only wet at last after much finenesse, he preuailed formuch, as that Man. Oeli was contented by him to fend another prefent to Ebrain; with an expresse condition notwithstanding. That hee should cause Ebrain to depart out of those quarters and that he should not himself return any more to request any thing further of him. Which he very largely promifed, only defiring him to fend a good number of Arcubules, therby to content the Baffa fully: so he gaue him fifty thousand ducats more, and foure hundred and fourfcore arcubuses, with a thousand goats, a hundred and fifty Camels, an hundred and fifty Buffles, a thousand oxen, and two hundred weathers. With this rich Present came Gomeda to Ebrain, declaring vnto him, that this he had got from him vpon promife that he should not molest the Drussan any more. For which promise so made, Ebrain sharply reproduced Gomeda, and threatened to make him know what it was to take upon him to dangerous a liberty; and for the greater despight both to the one & the other, Ebrahin would needs have Gomeda himselfe to returne again with the like message to trouble the Drussan. Wherefore although he went in great feare of some mischiese by the hands of Man-Ogli, yet was there no remedy but needs he must follow the commaund of him, in whose power it was to take from him both his honor and his life, and therfore on he went. But as foon a Manibyll Q faw Goneda, thinking as the truth was, that he came again about his wonted requests, her was at the very fight of him to fat mooued, as that he was cuen at the point to have throwned at at the very light of the land and the regard of more dangerous effects with his fury: yet spared he not with ignominious words and deadly threats to dis burthen his choler, Notwithstanding Gomeda could doe no leffe than accomplish the effect of his fraudulent de fires, and fo wrought with him, that he drew from him foure burdens of Arcubules more and fwords, ten gilt daggers, certain filuer belts, ten packes of filke, and some few pence. Causing him withall to protest vnto him, Neuer to suffer himself to be persuaded to come again, for if he did he threatned to kill him, happen after what would of it. With great ioy and triumph did Ebrain receive this present, and thinking now with himself that he had gotten a sufficient w booty from him, he determined to rife with his army, and to facke all the reft of Man-Delies country. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir-Ebne. Free, burnet Andrea, the place of Man-Ogli his refidence, and in two daies burnt and destroied 19 of the towns, with unspeakable cruelty committing all things to fire and sword. After all this fac. king and rating, Ebrain fent divers messengers to Man-Ogli, to try whether he would be ver perfused to come to him. But nothing could mooue the resolute Drussan to commit him. felf into his hands, but rather increased his constancie to avoid a most certaine death. Now the great Bassa stil thirsting after bloud and reuenge; understanding by a spy, That the Care tain of Andrea (being one of the factors of Man Ogli) with 350 fouldiers was got vo to teet tain hil, into a place of great securitie, he sent Emir-Ebne. Free to intice him, and totellhim, That feeing his Lord Man. Ogli would not come and yeeld himselfe, he should come to firm which if he would doe, he would affuredly in despight of Man. Ogli make him a Sanzacke of fome place he most defired. The ambitious and vnheedy Macademo suffered himselfe to bee Man Oglibis easily persuaded, and being accompanied with his 350 followers, went with the said Ebni fiee and came at last to the paulion of Ebrain, having first caused his aforesaid men to stay behind siced to come in a valley two or three miles off. But Bbrain would not fo much as fee the Macademo . als flain quicke. though both in respect of the nimblenes of his person, and also the fiercenesse of his looket. he was worthy to be looked vpon; but commanded him to keep in a feueral place from Strale din, and in the mean time deuised, how hee might with the least losse of his ownemen, put to death those three hundred and fifty, the Macademo's followers: which was by training them K by means of the faid Ebne free, into a certaine Vineyard, and so having brought them into a fireit, suddenly to fet upon them and kill them. Which was accordingly performed; for being by the treacherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their flaughter, fearing no thing leffe, they were fuddenly inclosed by the Turks Sanzacks or Ianizaries, and flaine every mothers fon. This massacre thus finished, Ebrain commanded the Macademo to be brought before him, and without delay to be stript and flaied quick. Who being come, stoutly upbraided Ebrain with his promise and his oath: and among other speeches which he vetered whilst they stripped him, said, Cut me off my members, and first putting them into the prinities of that info mous Ebrains wife, put them afterwards into the mouth of him (elf: for fo I trow he will be contented and fatusfied with my flesh. And to them that were the executioners of his painful death, hee faid, I It is your great good fortune indeed that with such violence, and needlesse deformity you are now able to fill my bloud, and to take my life from me: wher as none of you all had bin able, or once durst mante man, to have drawn one drep of it from me, no nor to have endured my countenance. But go too, proceed in 1961 wicked & unsatiable defire of my bloud, and fulfill the cruell command of your Vifier : for in the end there will also light upon you the inst reward of this so will anom a fact. With these and other such like speeches the miserable wretch was stripped, and three great gashes made on his backe, where they began to flea him: he in the mean time not ceasing to blaspheme their religion, and to curse their King and their false prophet also. But the barbarous soldiers proceeding in their cruel action, made other-like gashes upon his breast and stomack , and so drawing the skinns downward, could not bring it to his nauel, before he was with the extremity of the pain dead. M

to Sidon, where his gallies lay at rode, commanded, That dif batking 4000 fouldiers, they should fack all those countries along it the sea coast, even as far as Casaria in Palestine, sparing neither age nor fex, of what condition focuer. Which his cruel command was prefently out in execution, and three thousand soules brought away captines, great booties made of much rich merchandise, many towns burnt, sundry castles rased & layd euen with the ground. and to be short, all the whole countrey both of Serafadin and Man-Ogli layd veterly waste and

Ebrain was now in readinesse to depart for Constantinople, where hee was by Amerath expected as wel for his gold, as the accomplishment of the mariage. But bethinking him felf that whatfoeuer he had hitherto don, would bee accounted little or nothing, vales hee prouided in some fort for the quieting of those people under the Turkish obedience, he determined to nominat one of the three Drusian Bmirs that came to him to Ierusalem, to be Bassa of all those regions. And because Emit Aly Ebne-Carfus was the richest and most obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge vnto him, and honored him with that dignity, yet not without a bribe, but for the price of an hundred thousand ducats. Wherfore he apparelled him in cloath of gold, gaue him a horimans mace and a fword all gilt, and delivered vnto him the Kings commission, causing him withal to swear faith and obedience to Amurath. And to having (at least in thew) fer in order the affairs of those mountaines, which an hundred of the Turks great Captaines had in former time vainely attempted, hee returned to Damasco. where he fluied twelve daies, by shamefull shifts extorting money from divers persons. At last having no more to do in those parts, he turned himself towards Gazir and Baruto, places vnder the government of Ebne. Manfur, where he arrived with all his army, and found the Gallies which he left in the port of Sidon, now in the hauen of Baruto, as he had before commanded. Now upon a certain hil aboue Baruto, neer unto the sea, Ebrain had pitched his own tent only and no other; and having fent all the rest of his best and goodly things which he meant to carry with him to Constantinople, abourd the gallies, shrouded himselfe onely under that narrow and base tent. Thither he called Ebne. Mansur, and in pleasant manner told him, That Ebrain Notanow it was time for him to make paiment of the debt of an hundred and threefcore thousand bly differential ducats, which he owght the King his Lord for the custom of Tripoli and Baruto; for that he Mapler, could not longer flay in those quarters, but was to return to Constantinople, which hee knew not how to do, vnlesse he caried with him the discharge of that debt. Wherunto Ebne. Mansur made answer, that it would not be long before his Macademo's would come with his monies. and that then he would without further delay make paiment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be but an excuse, and therfore determined with himself to thrust him into the gallies: and because he could not carry the mony vnto the King, yet at the least to bring him his debtor. But forasmuch as he doubted to put this his determination openly in execution, for feare of some insurrection among the people, as well for that he was within the territories of the said Ebne-Manfur, as for that he faw him to be greatly beloued and fauoured of the other two Diufian Lords, Ebne Free and Ebne-Carfus, he therefore thought it better policie, by concealing this his purpose, to shew him in his outward actions all good countenance, and by secret and fubtil means to take him prifoner. Wherupon free deceitfully told him. That forafmuch as he was to stay there about his businesse that night, and was resoluted the next day to make a road into the Country of Man Ogli; he therfore praied him to do him the fauour to be his guid; and for that purpose when he should send for him at midnight, that he would come unto him very fecretly, because he was minded to depart without any stirre, only with five hundred men in his company. The Druffan Lord verily beleeved the matter, that fo it was, and withall was in good hope, by that means to find fome way to escape his hands. Wherupon being called up at midnight, he readily went to the tent of Ebrain, who presently charged him (whom aff menthought he had especially affected) with many abhominable and foul terms, Ebat-Mansher Caufing a chain to be cast about his neck and his arms, and so fast bound to be caried into the integral feat Gallies. And yet not fo contented, took the spoil of all his Country, whereby there was leuied fuch a prey as was maruellous to behold: for befides mony (wherof there was a very huge fum) the store of cloaths of filk and gold was such, and so great, as might better beseem some great Prince, than fuch a mountaine ruftical Lord as he was. When the Baffa had conveyed

Veis Bassa and Alis Bassa; and having staid there some sew daies, wherin he committed sundry & villanous and abhominable outrages, hee caused the said Serafadin to be put into the Gallies with all his filks and other wealth, and so departed for Constantinople. Where at such time as he entred into the chanel of the city, accompanied with 24 gallies, he was incounted and received by a wonderful number of his friends and fauourits, and faluted with an honourable peal of artillery out of the Seraglio. But now for a funch as we have before made mention of the Sanzack of Ierufalem and his flight, it shall not be altogether impertinent to our history (though somwhat out of time) to declare in few words what past between him and the Arabians of Palestine a little before the comming of Ebrain the great Bassa into those quarters : by which little the desirous Reader may casily perceive the woful and troublesome state of that somtime most blessed and sruits. ful but now most miserable and barren land of Jury, and of those places in holy writ somesh

Troubles in the land of Jury. [

In the confines of Sodom, and in the places that lie not only betwirt the lake Afphaltites and Damasco, but also in the plains and in the vallies of Iericho and of Samaria, and in other places about Bethlehem, Emaus, Bethany, Bethfage, Capharnaum, Nazareth, Leuir, Bethfaida. Naplos and other Townes of name thereabours, there do haunt and live certain Arabian captains, who spreading themselves even as far as Rama and Ioppa, over-run at their pleasure al the countries there round about, and continually commit gricuous outrages, as well against & the faid Cities, as also vpon the goods and wealth not only of the inhabitants there but also of strangers: yea, and their insolencie oftentimes groweth so great, that they date to assault the fenced cities; besides the spoiling of Trauellers, that by reason of their businesse have occasion to passe from one city to another. They are good horsmen, but they vie no armour, their horses are very swift torun, and spare of diet, and are themselves hold and adventurous thecues. These Arabians having had intelligence, that the aforesaid ambitious youth, appointed Sanzack of Ierusalem, was in mind to raise all the Sanzacks thereabout, and joining himlelf with them and his father the Bassa of Damasco, to restrain their infolent liberty, & to work their destruction; resolved with themselves not to stay until hee and his Consederates were ready, but rather by fundry inualions upon him, even unto the gates of lerulalem, to prouoke him to come out into the field. And the rather to induce him so to do, they compated with a certaine Subbaffi of Bethlehem their friend, to incourage and animate the Sanzaeko therunto, by promifing him good fucces and prosperous eyents. The ambitious your many feduced with the glorious persuasions of the false Subbassi (of whom hee made good rector ning) and prouoked by their infolencies, refolued, as they had wished, to iffue out of the city into the open field, and therupon having armed an hundred of his Vaffals, and raifed all the horimen that were under his gouernment, to the number of fix hundred, he made a rode toward Iericho, sending before defiance unto them. Against whom the Arabians came accordingly and with their arrows and Indian canes ouerwhelming his arcubusca, as if it had bin a raging floud, wrought him great wo: when as in the very nick, the battel vet being at the hotel, the M traiterous Subbassi fled towards Bethlehem, and left the souldiers of Ierusalem in the hands of the Arabians, who put most part of them to the edge of the sword, and scattely gaue liberty to the Sanzacke to faue himselfe by flight. The Sanzack certainly informed of this fraud of the diffembling Subbaffi, to be reuenged vpon him, began also in like manner to diffemble.

A with him felding that he would once more try his forces against the same Arabians; and so when the matter, that the Subbaffi arming himfelfe, came vnto him without any suspicion of the mischief intended against him. But as soon as he was come the Sanzacke tooke him, and presently caused him in most cruel maner to be flain quick.

Thus having passed over the troubles that stayed the people of Egypt and Damasco, and guicke she countries cherabout from reforting to Olman the Turks great Generall at Erzirum, let vs again return thither where we left him, taking a view of the preparations against the Persian. and profecute those affaires, which of all others most exercised the forces of the two mightiest Mahometan Monarchs; and with the expectation therof filled the World from the East to the West Was a ball Man,

The streit commandement of Amurath, together with the same and reputation of ofman the General had drawn together fuch a world of people of all forts to Erzirum, as that it feemed northe power of one king alone, but rather the vnited forces of many kings. Wherfore Officen perceiving that he had gathered together too great a number of people, and too huge an Army, and that it might so fall out that hee might want victualls for so many (neither Degreatly flaving his enemics forces, as that he needed to lead fo populous an Army against them) determined to discharge a great number of such as he thought most weake, and least able to endure tradel : for that out of this great multitude he drew about 40000 persons, who Hoerally according to euery mans ability redeeming the ordinary perils of the wars, returned him to their own dwellings. And fo in Ofmans army remained 180000 persons or therabout. The number of d With this multitude the General departed from Erzirum about the 11 of August this yeare Ofmaniaring. 1 585; towards Tauris; continuing for all that the speech for Nassivan. But he had scarce marched two daies, when divers foldiers of Grecia and Constantinople presenting themselves before him, vpbraided him with great improvidencie, telling him, That they began already to feel the want of victual, by wanting the same day their ordinary allowance of Corne for their horles: fo that if in the beginning, and as it were in the entrance of fo long a journey, they felt flich want, they could not tell with what judgement or discretion he meant to lead so great a company forfar as Naffivan; nor by what cunning conceit he had prefumed to fustain so great an after in the ferrice of their Lord. Ofman quietly heard their complaints, and prefently proaided for them, by causing such store of barly to be distributed among them, as they desired: B) and funerely punished the officers who had the charge for allowance of corn who most coue. willy began to make merchandile of the common prouision, by converting it to their owner phoat vies. And having thus quieted their troubled minds he proceeded on his journy, & by the way of Haffair Chalaffi and Chars, arrived upon the Chalderan plains, famous for the memetable battels there fought between Stlymu and Hylmael. In thefe plains he took a general seview of his Army, wherein he wanted a number, that by reason of ficknes beeing not able to com hime the journy, were inforced to fray behind, some in one place, some in another. Reinb uling thence, he rook his way not to Nassivan, as he had still hitherto gluen it out he would but add directly to Tauris. Which fo fudden an alteration of the journy, to foon as the fouldiers of Grecia and Constantinople heard, they fel into a great rage, and comming againe before E the General, revelled with hith in this fort to his face !

And although hee could indeed have readily so wied the sharpest and hardest prouisions and remedies for it, that in such occasions reading rily applied yet vpon good aduice he forbare to to doe, and in stead of rigor and profiberes resoluted to work by more easie means. Wherupon causing many of the captains and chiefe men among those seditious soldiers to come before him, he first persuaded them.

That the former (peech for Nasinan was not raised at all by him, nor that he was minded at that timete go for Tauris but all that was don, he had don to fulfill the commandment of the Sultan, who had chareed him to to do to the end to leffen the Persian preparations, which they would have undenbredly made fore greater, if the fleech had bin given out at first for Tauris. Which bis princely case for their leften the for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in fo doing they fould fell preferue that great on nion which both the King and the world bad conceined of their valor and findlity. Neither needed they a fear that the foldiers which were difmifed might weaken the Army ; for that they themelves were we only fufficient to pierce into Tauris, and to open the way upon the enemy but to dannt them even with their looks : and that those which were discharged, had but purged the host of all comardise, and left nuhim in it but vertue and courage.

By this mild answer of the General the cumultuous soldiers were sufficiently pacified be much better apaied & contented they were, as foon as he put his hand to the common purch and bestowed among them a small quantity of monies : for by this his kind viageal their so macks were ouercome, and they themselves became so willing and so couragious, that no they durst venture not to Tauris only, but to Casbin, year even to the farthest parts of all the Persian kingdom.

These important outrages thus appealed the General surned himself with all his army to. wards Coy, a City scituat beyond Yan, in the midst betweene Tautis and the Martian Mere. where he refreshed his Army with all things he could delire. From Coy hee pelled to Merant, a city subject to the Persians, plentiful also of all things needful both for man and beat. From thence he leaned down toward Soffian, a fruitful place subject also to the Persians from whence he began to discouer Tauris. Great was the joy of the whole camp and now the matinous foldiers of Grace and Constantinople could highly commend the aduice of the General, or rather of Amerath himfelf, in giving out the rumor of Naffiyan for Tauris, as the paly means wherby they were come in quiet to far; the Pertians being wholly occupied (as they fuppoled) about Naffivan. Of this city Ofman Baffa having taken diligent view, caused his Fents to be pitched on the South fide therof, where was a spacious garden all flourishing, and behutiful, replenishenish fundry kinds of trees and fweet finelling plants, and a shouland formcains and brooks derived from a pretty river, which with his pleasant stream divided the garden from the city of Taisris and was of forgreat beauty, that for the delicacie therof it was by the country inhabitance called Sechis Gener, that is to fay, the eight Paradifes; and was in times past the flanding house of their Kings, whilest they kept their residence in this City : and after shey had withdrawne their feat from thence to Cashin, became the habitation and place of abode for the governors of Tauris. Of these gardens and places Ofman made choice to build his caffe in where he gaue the model him felf, & commanded that all the whole circuit of those pleatant greens I should be inviroged with wals, and trenches digged round about them; to conver the wines from the aforesaid river. At the discovery wherof the Turks imagining that the Persians were come in great number to affail the army, order was given by the fick Generall, That Cicala Baffa and Mahamet the Bassa of Caraemit, with the people of Grecia and all their owne forces, should go to incounter the enemy. Who presently with their ensignes displaied (under which there flood about 24000 strong, besides a number of setuile people, yet men exercised in labours and perils. in all wel neer 40000) fet forward. Now the 500 Persians with a maruellous cunning kind of skirmishing dallied with the Turkish souldiers, and drew them forward for the space of eight miles and more: and being brought so far on, and now forewearied with the skirmish, were lustily assailed by the Persian Prince, who with part of his army, to the number of about 20000 persons, couragiously set upon the two Bassa's, and joined with them the deadliest and cruellest battel that euer was written of. Wherin the Persians having given a perillous onfet, and don great harm, it was thought that they would have contented themselues with so lucky an incounter, and so have retired. Which the Turks minding to prevent and not to return without a notable victory, hardly pressed vpon them, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and fo to give them a bloudy and deadly ouerthrow. But the Persians hauing quietly and with great affurance for a reasonable space induted the charge, at last as if they had bin fresh men made head vpon them afresh, and began a most terrible battell anew. wherin the Baffa of Caraemit aboue named was put to flight, and being wholly difinaled and discomfited, fled back again to the camp, carrying with him the most manifest tokens of the vnhappy iffue of the battel. Gisala the other Baffa notwithstanding valiantly and with great C cunning stil sustained the sury of the Persians, laboring by all means to incourage his souldiers. and to have restored the battel : but when he had don what he might, overcome at last by greater valor, he was inforced to betake himfelf to flight alfo; and fo altogether difcomfited, came to the camp without any enfigne, having left behind him 8000 of his foldiers dead up. eight these on the ground.

The Persian Prince incouraged with this so fortunat a victory, by speedy heraulds sent to the fick Visier (whom he thought notwithstanding to have bin in health) and gave him to vnderstand, That if he were willing to fight, he was ready for him, and in what fort societ it pleafed him to accept of battel, to make him good account of his valor, and to cause him to know. not only that Amurath his master had most unjustly raised this was, but also that it had beene D good for himself not to have taken the same in hand. Of this offer Ofman accepted:but being not able himself to answer the prince in person hand to hand, by reason of his sicknes, which euery hour mortally increased he sent out all his captains with his army to dare him battel.

The prince lay ten miles or therabouts distant from the camp of Olman, toward whom the Turks fet forward in this manner: The main battel was guided by the Baffa of Caraemit and Cicala Baffa, with all the fouldiers of Affyria and Babylon: The left wing was led by the Baffa of Natolia, with the band of Grecia; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Baffa of Caramania, with the people of Soria; to the number of threescore thousand, besides those that were left behind at Tauris, with the trufty gard of the Ianizaries, and the Artillery, for the fafegard of the fick Visier. In this order they confronted the Persian prince, who was himfelf in the midst of his army, with all his people in very good order, having on the one side the soldiers of Persia and Hircania, and on the other them of Parthia and Antropatia, in all to the number of forty thousand. The Turks feared nothing more, than that the Persians fetching "great compasse about, should with all celerity and fury fet voon their Tents, and the riches they had layd vo together in their paullions: and therfore at every motion of theirs they continually feared this fudden out-rode. Whereof they had so much care, that retyring themselues as much as they might, and seigning as if they had given place to the Persians, it wanted nor much, but that they had brought them even within the just level and mark of their Artillery. Which the Persians perceiuing, without any further dallying hardly began to asfaile the maine body of the battell. The Prince himselfe beeing entred amongst the souldiers of the Bassa of Caraemit (who as Generall sustained the place of Osman) and pressing into the middest of the battell dispatched enery man that came in his way, and having singled out the Baffa from the rest, smore off his head, and gave it to one of his followers to carry vp. Turks, and exceedingly incouraged the Perfians; who imbrued with the bloud of their Enc. 6 mics, and intermingling themselves more and more among stehem, made of themse most coninfed and generall flaughter; wherein beside the Bassa before named, there died the Bassa of Trabszonda, the Sanzack of Brusia, with fine other Sanzacks, and as it was commonly repose ted, 20000 Turks more. It hapned Amurath Baffa of Caramania to bee there taken prilongr, with divers other common foldiers. But night comming now on, & the Persians being come formwhat too night he Turkish artillery, they gave over the fight & retyred themselves back to the place where the King lay incamped with the rest of his army.

But now were divers daies spent, wherin the new fortres at Tauris (as we have before favd) was fully finished, when the soldiers of Grecia & Constantinople, wearied to see their friends and fellows thus flain before their faces, and having also fafely layd up in their owne custody to fuch prevs and booties as they had gotten in the fack of the City, resolved with themselves to procure their own departure; and so much the rather, for that the Winter was now fast comming on. And forasimuch as the Generall was through the immoderate flux of bloud brought weak, and in despair of life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his physitians, and therfore not to be spoke withall; they were faine by the mouth of such as were their truste friends about him, to represent vnto him the necessity of their returne, and withall, after many reverend intreaties, cauled it also to be signified vnto him, That if hee stood obstinate, and would needs flay dallying out the time, in those dangerous places where no need was, they should be inforced to withdraw themselves, and to forfake him. Ofman, who had now nothing cls to do in those countries, but only to leave some convenient garrison in the new forces at 1 Tauris, liberally promifed to fatisfic their requests, by departing thence the next morning. So calling ynto him Giaffer the Eunuch Baffa of Tripolis, a man of a crafty and cried heture hee made him governor and keeper of the new built fortres at Tauris. And the more to encourage him to take that charge vpon him, he gaue him freely for the space of three whole yeares not only the office & authority, but also the rents and revenue of the Bassa of Caraemit, lately flain by the Persian Prince, and withall honored him with the title of a Bassa of the courts fo that after hee had finished his three yeares office of Caraemit, hee was then to goe and fit among the fourraign feats of the Baffa's of the port. The Baffa feeing so fair and so night way for him to mount to those high honors (greater than which there is none in the Turkish empire) readily accepted the offer, & dispatching his lieutenant to Caraemit, to govern those # countries in his absence, with a hundred of his own followers; settled himself in the sayd Fort with a garrison of 12000 soldiers, furnished with all necessary provision wntil the next spring. The General having thus fet all things in order, and carefully provided for the fafety of the Fortreffe, departed according to his promife, and the fame morning (which was the 87 day after his departure from Erzirum) came vnto a place called Sancazan seuen miles distant from Tauris.

The Turks were now upon the point of their incamping, in a confused disorder and hurleyburly, when those that were hindermost in the army heard the neying of horses, and the noise of drums and trumpets, as if it had bin the comming of an Atmy. Which when the whole Camp understood, they ran all headlong and disordered as they were, to the rescue, on that L fide where the noise of the horses and warlike instruments was heard. But whist the Turkes were thus intentiuely busied on that side to expect the comming of the enemy, the Persian Prince without any figne or token of battell, with 28000 horsemenwas ready vpon them on the other side: Who having discouered their Camels and other Carriages, wherupon their booty, their spoiles, and their riches were laden, which they had taken at Tauris, beside much of their prouision of victuals for the sustenance of the Army, he turned vpon them, and with s provident and safe convoy had taken for a prey eighteen thousand of the Camels and Mules well loden with the same booties and victuals, which the Prince sent presently away with six thousand of his souldiers: and he himself with his two and twenty thousand Persians entred into the Turks army, who now to with stand his assault, had sonthat side also made head against M him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withall, to fee what a thottall battel was made, what fingular proweffe thewed even presently in the forefront botho battell; for in a moment your might have feen the tents and panilions turned upfide down, and their incamping Lodgings

A replenished with dead carkasses and bloud, victorious death raging and reigning in every corner. The Turks themselves were astonished and maruelled, to see their enemies (so few in number, and intermingled among to populous an army of warlike people) more like fatal ministers of death, than mortal men, to brandish their swords over them as if it had been light. ning and to make to generall a flaughter; & do to this day with great admiration recount the valor and proweffe of the Persians. But they all now doubting lest the enemy in his fury should forcibly have entred the very lodgings of the fick Visier, it was commanded (not by himfelf. for he lay now at the last gasp; but by him who that time commanded in his name) That the artillery should speedily be unbarred and discharged; which in that medly and consusion of both armies, without any exception or distinction of persons, ouerthrew both friends & foes. and did more harm perhaps among the Turks themselves, than among the Persians; for at the first thundring noise therof the prince with all speed retyred; after whom presently followed al the rest: to that the Turks which remained behind, were more anoyed with the deadly shot than were the Persians, who flying away could not feel the damage, but that the Turkes must first be wel payd for their labor. The Turks pursuing the slying Persians, made shew as if they would gladly have overtaken them, but night comming on they feared to proceed any farther than they might without danger returne. In this battel of Sancazan were flaine 20000 20000 Turks Turks, without any notable losse of the Persians.

Among the rest, in the same place died the Visier Ofman, General of the late dreadfull, but General of now defolat army, not by the hand of the enemy, but confirmed with the vehemencie of an A. man dieto. C gue and flux of bloud. Whose death notwithstanding was kept secret from the whole Army, every man verily thinking that it was but only the continuance of his ficknesse, because the chariots wherein he lay were still kept close; and in his name Cicala Baffa (for so he had commanded in his wil) gaue out answers and commandements to the whole army. Nevertheleffe it was disclosed to the Persians by means of three yong men, who in the life of Osman having charge of his jewels and treasure, were with the best thereof and the fairest of his horses fled to the Persian King, to whom they reuealed the Generals death. The Persians (who before had thought it not possible for so great cowardise and dishonorable kind of sighting & ordering an army to have proceeded from the vertue and valor of O sman, of whose worth they had too manifest a trial and experience in times past) now understanding of his death, were therby D incouraged to attempt the vtter ouerthrow of the Turkish remnant, and so to give them an honorable farwel. Wherupon the Persian Prince with 14000 men followed the Turks, who had now raifed their camp, and were remoued to a certain river of falt water, not far from Sancazan, where the prince caused a few tents to be pitched, about four or fine miles distant from the Turks camp, the aforefaid brook running in the midst between the two armies. Now the Prince had purposed to affail the Turks in the morning, whilst they were loding their carriages, hoping in that confusion to have wrought them some notable mischiese : which his defignement was reuealed to the Turks by one of his spies whom they had caught; and therfore did neither rife so early in the morning as their maner was, nor load their stuffe vntil such time as they were all armed, and on horse-back ready to receive their enemies. By which their wa-E ryand vnusual manner of rising the Persians perceived that their purpose was by some means discouered. And yet considering, that if they should lose this occasion, they should finde no other good opportunity to anoy them before the next foring, they veterly refolued to aduenture the affault: and having observed that the enemies Artillery was on the right side of the army, they in the fight of cuery man began to enter on the left; but the Turkes prefently for vncouered and vnbarred their artillery against the assailants, as was to their great losse & danger. Howbeit they were so nimble and so quick to shroud themselues under the enemies Army, and to avoid the mischieuous tempest, that being come very neere the Turkes squadrons, they must needs join battel with them. The Persians had purposed before, as soon as they faw the Turks begin to stir, to retyre, and so to draw them on into a very filthy and deepe marish, F which being then dry, was not feared or doubted of any, but only by those that were acquainted therwith, or born therabouts. Which their policie the rebel Maxut Chan, and with him Daut Chan (as being well acquainted with those places) perceiving, gave notice therof unto Cicala Baffa, who prefently caused a great compassing wing to be made, commaunding them to let upon the Persians, and to charge them home: which was forthwith put in execution, so that their forefront opened it felf with very large and spatious wing supon the Prince Who ch no fooner faw this their vnwonted order of comming on but by and by he perceit at hat his purpose was discourred and therupon without any stay he began to tetyre, calling a people after him : which could not fo fuddenly be don, but that 3000 of them remained belief milerably fifled, ouertrodden in the mire, with very little loffe to the Turks. And this onely battel, of fine that were fought under Tauris and in those quarters; was lesse murtilisto the Turks than to the Persians.

The Prince returned to the King his fathers camp, recounting vnto him the whole action together with the departure of the enemy. And so the Turks came to Salmas, where the death of the General was published. From Salmas they went afterwards to Van, where they tooken furuey of their army; and found wanting therin about eighty fine thousand persons, or as some fav more. At Van all the foldiers were difmissed, and Cicala from thence gave notice to murath at Constantinople, of all that had hapned. Where first was published the death of Ofman the General (for whom were made many fignes of great forrow) and together with his death were blazed the bloudy and mortal actions that were in that expedition performed to that the whole city seemed to be greatly discomforted, and in many places were heard much fecret railing upon the king, many curfes of this war, and infolent maledictions of these manifold mischiefs. After that, was dispersed the great fame of the new forces erected at Tautie of the facking of the city, and of all the loffe that had hapned therin; and a general edic onb. lished in the Kings name, That through all the Cities of his Empire they should make the lemn feasts, with other expresse tokens of ioy and reioycing: Which was accordingly done both in Constantinople and other places. There was also word fent to the Embassiours of Hungary, of France, of Venice, and of other Countries, That they should do the like but they all with one accord answered. That it was never the custom of Embassadors to make any such fignes of rejoicing, but onely when the King himfelfe in person returned from any the like victories.

In the mean time confultation was held at Van, for the fending of furcours to Teffis in Georgia. Vnto which important service Daut Chan to deserve some reward at the hands of Amurath, offered him felf: Vnto whom Cicala Balla delivered thirty thouland Ceechini to be conveyed to the fort at Teflis. Which piece of feruice the Renegat performed, and without any trouble relieved the fouldiers in the fort. Which was fo well accepted of Amurath, that & he for the fame good feruice honored him with the dignity of the Baffa of Maras, Marnt Chan also the other Persian Rebel, that guided the Tutkish Army to Reivan, and afterward to Tauris, was in like manner by the fame Amurath honoured with the great rich office of the Baffa of Aleppo.

The miferies the Turkish army indured in this expedition for Tauris, beside the losses before rehearfed, were wonderfull : for as the Sanzack of Aman (a city of Soria in antient time called Apamea) present in all this action, reporteth in a letter which he wrot vnto Ali Bassa of Aleppo, There was such a dearth in the Turkes Army, that they were inforced to give their camels bisket and rice, and when that failed they gave them pack-faddles to eat, and after that pieces of wood beaten into pouder, and at last the very earth : which dearth indured vntil [they arrived at Van. And at Tauris whilst the forces was in building they were of necessity constrained to give their horses their dung in very dry pouder. By reason whereof there sollowed a gricuous mortality of horses, camels, mules, and men; and the stink that grew of this mortality was so great, that every man was faine to carry a piece of a strong smelling Onion vnder his nose to avoid the heavinesse therosi

The fort fo lately built in the royal city of Tauris exceedingly grieved the Persians ingenerall, but especially the King and the prince his son: to let it alone they reckoned it too great a shanie; and how to demolish it they wel knew not, finding themselves not only destinated artillery, but also of such sufficient strength as was requisit for performance of so great anciaterpriseivet prickt on with the defire of glory, & the necessity of the cause, they determined M euen in the depth of Winter to gather new forces, and with trenches of earth to approch the ditch, and to try if they could advance a countermure as high as their wals, & fo to attain to the conquest therof. But in the gathering of their men they discouered new difficulties so, to hire any fouldiors either from Heri or Cheilan, was denied them by water and same change and their Turcoman nation, which might have bin the readiest and the neerest at such a need. for the late death of Emir Chan, and for the succession of Alicali, were growne very contumatious: fo that neither the King, nor the Prince, nor the Presidents and Gouernours of that kingdome, could tell which way to turne themselves. At last for the common safety, the, determined to draw, the Turcomans to a reconciliation; hoping that by promifing them any honest fatisfaction for the wrong wherewith they challenged themselves gricued for the death of their captain, they would become more tractable to do them feruice in their common necessicies. Wherupon the king fent kind letters to the heads and captains of those nations, and principally to Mahamet Chan, and to Calife the Sultan, declaring plainly vnto them the perils of his flate. and of the liberty of the whole kingdome, with the confidence he had in their valor; and that therefore forgetting all that was past, as done not in shame or scorne of their nation, but only for zeale and loue to the kingdome, they would demand fuch fatisfaction as they defired, and that he would be ready to agree to any just request they should make. To which letters they readily answered, that they would come vnto him, to put in execution what socue he should for the common necessity or honour of his State command. Now they had craftily among ft themselves already concluded not to suffer any other to sit in the room of Emir Chan their late Gouernor, but only young Tamas the kings third fon. Which conclusion they had plotted to themselues, with a resolution in the end, to cause him to be accepted for king at Casbin, in defoight of the King himselfe and of the Prince Hamze : nothing regarding, that by this a Sion far greater troubles would arise in Persia than cuer were yet heard of; but only being wholly Wherunto the diffembling Mahamet Chan made answer. That their de-D fire aboue all things was to do him pleafure and feruice; not doubting but he would appoint them fuch a chieftain, as should be valorous, noble, and acceptable vnto them. The king could stay no longer, but franckly declared onto them, That to affure them of his good will, and 10 give them an hostage in pawn therof, he had made choice of young Tamas his fon, to succeed in the roome of Emir Chan their late Governor. As foone as Mahamat Chan heard this resolution of the king, who beside all expectation, voluntary of himselfe yeelded them the means to put inexecution what they had maliciously before contriued against the peace and liberty of the kingdome: he became more jocond than he was wont to be, and outwardly shewed himselfe ready for what focuer the king should command him; and in the names of the rest, yeelded also large promises of fidelity and obedience, so that the matter might be performed for which Li he had now given his word.

The king, who defired nothing more than to fee, the fort of Tauris rafed (which could hardly be done without the helpe of those Turcomans) contrary to the aduise of the wisest of the Sultans, and of the Prince, fecretly, and as it were by stealth, gaue his your fon Tamas into the hands of Mahamet, as chiefe of all the Turcomans. Who to nourish the good opinion and credulity of the king, and to secure the prince and the Sultans, gaue a lufty beginning by the help of his followers, with trenches and rampiors to approch the fort. Neither was there any great time spent therein; for they had now almost made their trenches and mounts even with the enemies wall, and the ditch it felfe was almost filled up with earth, so that there wanted but little more labour to begin the defired affault : when contrary to all mens expectation, the falle F and wicked traitor Mahamet Chap with ali his Turcomans, leading away with them the childe The Turcomans

Tamas, departed in the night time, and vpon a fudden, from fo noble and honourable an enter-forface the fiege prise; and blinded with desire to put in execution his ill hatched purpose, couertly & without believe, any noise remoued from the befieged wals, and put himselfe on his way towards Casbin: still tearming Tamas by the name of the King of Persia, and fundry wayes abusing and mocking

the poore old king and the prince. This fo fudden and fo dangerous a rebellion, whereby not G only so honourable and so necessary an enterprise was to be abandoned, but the whole state of the kingdome like to be indangered, exceedingly gricued all good men, but most of all the old King and the Prince his son:who no lessecarefull of his rightfull succession, than was the aged king of his present estate, both now hazarded by this rebellion, wholly insenced with grieseand anguish of mind, began to cast a thousand devices in his troubled head, what course to take, and what to resolue vpon. To abandon the siege it grieued him aboue measure, and to suffer so pernicious a rebellion to go forward, seemed too dangerous for the state of Persia and to provide for both these mischieses at once, was altogether impossible. In these huge waves of contrary, thoughts, he resolued at last to turne himselse against the Turcomans, and to suppresse that rebellion, as most dangerous to the State. And so with twelve thousand soldiers, and a part also of the kings ordinary guard, all couragious and hardy men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans, and marching directly toward Casbin, he ouertooke them at a place called Califleza, a daics journy on this fide Casbin, and there joyned battell with them. Wherein many of them being forry for that they had done, would not fo much as draw their fwords against the Prince: many others fled also away for feare, so that he easily obtained a wished victory The feditious Mahamet Chan was taken prisoner; and by the Princes commanded fromfied, of ment presently beheaded: so was also Calife the Sultan, and divers other captains of this pesti-And calle the lent conspiracy. Yong Tamas was also taken, & by the direction of the Prince sent to the castle of Cahaca. Fine thousand Turcomans of the late followers of the rebel Mahamet, fled out of the battell towards Babylon by the way of Siras, and yeelded themselues to Solyman Balla of 1 that city; who afterwards repenting themselves of their solly, sought to returne againe into the favor of their king, but all in vaine : fo that being become rebels to the one, and sufpected to the other, they did at one time lose their country, their liberty, their honor, and the favor of all men as well friends as foes. The Prince after this victory held on his way to Gasbin, and there staying, laboured to gather the dispersed Turcomans, especially those that (moued with the honesty of the cause) would not beare armes in so vajust an action, intending afterwards to returne to Tauris, to attend the belieging and conquest of the fort. This was theend of this dangerous rebellion, the chiefe cause that Tauris was not againe recoursed out of the hands of the Turks, to the great weakening of the Persian kingdome.

Now Giaffer the Eunuch Bassa Gouernour of the Cassle of Tauris, fearing lest the Persian with to cita. Prince would with a greater army again return to the fiege; perceiving himselfe to wax every day weaker and weaker, by reason that many of his men secretly fled from him, beside them that perished with fickenesse, and others slain in adventuring too boldly to go abroad to seeke for victuals; sent oduertisement thereof to Cicala Baffa at Van : fignifying further unto him by writing, That if the Prince should again return to affault the fort, he should of necessity beenforced to yeeld it and that therefore as he tendred the honor of his Sultan, he would be carefull to fend him succour, whereby he might be able to maintaine the fort radding moreouer, That now it was most easily to be done, because there were no forces of the enemies in those quarters, fauing onely a few which remained about the King, lying 12 miles off from Tauris. Cicala moued with the importance of the enterprise propounded, and withall desirous to gaine L fome credit of glory and renowne with his king, entertained the advices of Giaffer, and getting him to horse with a traine of three thousand harquebusiers and good store of munition, set forward toward Tauris. The Persian king aductised therosisent out spies to learn what way they held, meaning to meet them and to fet vpon them: but these spies comming neere to Salmas, were apprehended by the forerunners of Cicala, and being put to torture, requealed at last, how that their king was in atms, and on his way towards Sancazan, At which news Cicala was greatly aftonied, as well for the danger whereinto the forces and municion which he had with him were likely to fall, as also for that by any losse which his troups should sustaine in this expedition, the city of Van (being indeed the greater and most noble frontier town in all those countries) must needs be in hazard to be lost, having left in it but his lieutenant with a very few M foldiers. Whereupon he determined to relinquish this dangerous enterprise, and to withdraw himselse backe to the defence and preservation of the city committed to his trul and go nernment. But although these expected and desired succours were not conueyed to Tauris as was intended, yet had Giaffer as good fortune as he could wish : for the preparations of the

A Princewere follong and troublesome, and his returne so much prolonged, that there was time enough yeelded unto the Turks great Generall now newly chosen (as by and by shall be declared) to gowth a strong army into those quarters, and so to preserve all that which the only expedition and celerity of the enemy might have put in great hazard, and almost have brought to a desperat case.

In the mean time, Amerath the Turkish Emperor was greatly troubled at Constantinonle in making choice a new Generall: on the one fide, Ofman Baffa having by his last will left Sinan Civala to be his fucceffor, as a man of approved valor, and the many dangers he had run thorow in the late service about Tauris, with the great fauours he had in the Court, did not a little encline the King to his election : on the other fide, he heard of a publike rumor spread among it the foldiers, that they could by no meanes endure to be commanded by to young a captaine: and that some in plaine termes should say, That they would not obey him: Which caused Amurath to doubt, that some dangerous discord might thereof ensue in the army, if he should proceed to make choice of him. Then there was also Ferat Baffa, the fame man which had already fusial for that charge before of man, who now very ambitiously fought against for this honour, having of late performed fome good feruice to the good liking of the King. Of any other to make better choice he had none, so that he stood in great doubt what to do. In the end, because he was in good time to provide for his affaires, he made choice of Ferat Bassa, the fame man whom he had before made proofe of : a man of great fidelity, of an honourable carriage, and already experienced in the leading and commanding of fuch an army to whom he C granted the ordinary authority, to mannage at his pleasure such affaires of the empire as concerned his journey. Vpon this resolution, generall precepts were fent out to all cities within the kingdome, to the Baffaes & other Gouernors, with speciall commandement, that all their foldiers, together with their taxes, tenths, munitions, victuals, armor, artificers, and to be thort all their necessary furniture and provision should be ready and in order, upon the first warning should be sent them the next Spring. Great prouision of money was made, and in Soria (be. The returns of fides the ordinary fum that is bestowed upon the yearely pay of fouldiers in Reiuan, Erzirum, dred thousand Lori, Tomanis, Teflis, and Chars, which swallow up all the reuenue of that country, and of the duckate. city of Tripoli, amounting to the fum of fix hundred thousand duckats) there was taken up in in prest of privat merchants in the city of Aleppo only, the sum of threescore thousand Cec-D chini, to be repaired vnto them with the first monies that should be received by the officers of his custome houses. A matter that moued an extraordinary grudging among the people, for that it feemed to every man avery frange and intollerable exaction, befide fo many grievances laied upon them, for corne, for carriages, for pioners, and for workemen, to endure this burden also of lending their mony, without hope of restitution thereof: yea, and indeed curry man did greatly wonder how they were thus ill aduised, to make it knowne to the Christian Princes what scarcity and want of mony they had. The Generall had also with him fourchundied pieces of artillery, and did beside so worke the matter, as that Manni Chan (who was appointed Bassa of Aleppo) was granted vnto him to be the guide of his army, as he had been of Osmans; and that Cicala Bassa of Van (scarce his good friend) was removed from thence and sent B farther off out of his way as Bassa to Babylon.

And thus having put all things in readinesse, he departed from Constantinopse in the month 1586 of Aprill, in the yeare 1586; and passing ouer the streit into Asia, came to Siuas something la Feratdeparters ter than he should have done, being hindered partly by the Plague which then raged exece. From Conflantidingly in Constantinople, and partly by other occasions incident to such actions. At Siuas he meth to Sinas. stated so long for the comming together of his army, and in mustering men, that it was the later end of July before he departed thence, staying indeed the longer at Siuas, by reason of the exceeding dearth and want of victuals at Erzitum which dearth was also so great in Aleppo, that a Venice bushell of wheat was fold for twelve Cecchini.

Ferat yet making his abode at Siuas, but ready to depart, was aduertised by certaine Posts F fent from Giaffer the Bassa of Tauris, how that the Persian Prince was housely expected with agreat army, and that if he did foreflow to fend fuccours, and to prevent the comming of the Prince, and so give him time & leisure to assault the castle, he doubted greatly how he should be able to hold the same. Upon which aduertisement Ferat presently removed, and so hasted his journy, that about the beginning of August he was at Erzirum: and still hearing more and more of the Princes comming, flaied not there; but hafted to Van ; where having gathered to G gether all his fouldiers, and taken a new furuey of his army, he departed thence, and being prefently come into the open and large champaignes, to make proofe of the readiness of the foldiers, he marshalled them in such fort as if he should forthwith haue joyned battell with the enemy, and so in seemely order marched on.

The Turkish Generall continually seared, lest the Persians should come upon him with fome fudden affault : befides that, The confrant report of the princes comming to Tauris with his army, much increased his troubled thoughts. But on the other fide, he reposed great confifidence in the conspiracy that was now plotted against the life of the Prince, with the prince of Aliculi Chan the protector and champion of Abas Mirize of Heri: who under colour of accompanying the Prince to affift his forces, had resolutely concluded with himselfe, and ablo. lutely promifed Abu (having also given intelligence therof to the Turkish General) to ridthe Prince Hamze of his life; or at least (which he thought might more easily be brought to pass) in the fundry revolutions and variable changes of the battell, at some time or other to make him fall into the hands of Perat, and so to fettle his lord and master Abas in his estate. Vpon these trecheries Ferat grounding himselse, beganwith greater confidence to dispose his defignements, and somewhat lesse to seare the fame of the huge preparations of Petsia against him. Which preparations in truth, as by most wicked deuises and malitious conspiracies they were turned quite contrary from that end whereunto the Prince Hamze had continually and pointed them; fo if they had bin emploied with such faith and fidelity as fo righteous a cause required, without all doubt the writers of our time should have had matter enough in this I 86 yeare to shew and represent vnto the World such accidents as should be nothing inferior The glory of the to those of the yeare before going. But for smuch as rebellion and discord, the two infernal ministers of the divell, have for the vtter vndoing & overthrow of the glory of the Persia continually favored the Turks army, no maruell it is that the Persian nation cannot vaunt of any revenge taken for the indignities offered them by their enemies; and that our Writers cannot chuse but write of the true and vindoubted victories of the Turks, and the bare shadows of the Pertian exploits; which notwithstanding many Christians vainly believe, because they most earnestly desire them to be true, although they do see to the contrary, by the manifest prospering and euident conquests which the Turks have in divers their States and countries.

The Persian Prince about the later end of July arrived at Tauris with the greatest part of K his army, where he (contrary to the opinion of all men) staid not, for what cause is uncertaine. But vnder Randing that Zeinel Baffa of Salmas, by nation a Curdo, lay encamped before the city, who of a Persian was become a Turke, and had done great harme against the State of Perfia; he determined fuddenly to fet upon him, and to chastise him for his rebellion. According to which resolution, being accompanied with twelve thousand souldiers, he rode to Salmas, where finding Zeinel with all his people encamped as he had beene before informed, he gaus him the affault. Zeinel more ready to fly than to fight, and his foldiers as ready as he, fled prefently, and fell before the Persians, so that the Bassa himselse with a few others had much adoe to escape and saue themselves in the closest corners thereabours, leaving the city committed to his charge, for a prey vnto the angry enemy : who entering into the same, sacked and spoiled L' it, exercifing thereon all fuch cruelty, as partly the naturall defires of fouldiers vieto practile, and partly fuch as the Turks themselues shewed unto them in that miserable and most lamentable facking of Tauris the last yeare. The like spoiles did the Persian army in all those quarters round about, and fowould have peraduenture returned to Tauris, but that certainespies arrived upon them with advertisement, That the Bassa of Reivan being issued out of his fortreffe with fiften hundred harquebusiers, had committed the like outrages in the villages and fields thereabouts, as the Prince had done about Salmas. With which newes the Prince was greatly moued; and immediatly rifing with his army, and marching towards Reiuan, not far from the city encountered the Bassa: who discouering the enemies forces afar off, began in great disorder to fly and retire into his fort, leaving the greatest part of his soldiers (making M not so much speed in flight as himselfe) to the sury of the Prince, who put themall to the fword, and did what harme he possibly could in all the places thereabouts.

At the very fame time great troubles arose in the Drusian country for Man Ogli the valiant Drussan (of whom we have before spoken) in revenge of the injuries done vnto him and his

ple by Ebrain Baffa, and by a valiant kinde of restitution to recompense himselfe of all those bribes and prefents which by fo many shifts and subtilties were by the couctous Bassa wrung from him(as is before declared) had now taken up armes, and having wasted and sacked all the territory of Ebne. Manfur and of his other enemies who had yeelded their obedience vnto the Turks without let forced all that country with sudden inuasions and inrodes, even very neere unto the cities of Balbecke and Tripoli, and did there exceeding harme. For redreffe whereof. Amurath was glad to dispatch away from the court Ali Baffa borne at Aleppo, with the title of the Baffa of Damasco, and with authority to muster fresh souldiers, and so wholly to attend the vtter subuersion of Man Ogli. But comming thither, he found all againe quiet, so that his prefence in that country ferued rather for a reconciliation and peace making among ft them. B than for the profecuting of any further warre; which at that time was most necessary for the Turks to be avoided, as well for want of mony in the common treafury, as for the exceeding fearcity of victuals.

Now the Persian Prince having made an end of the outrodes and spoiles before mentioned. retired himselfe to Tauris, and so towards his fathers campe, where the rest of his army was now arrived, to the number of about forty thousand: of whom the Prince dispatched away the foldiers of Heri to the number of eight thousand, under the conduct of the traiterous Aliculi Chan their Generall: and part also of the Turcomans, under the leading of Emanguli Chan: with speciall charge, That they should by the way in places of most advantage, meet and receiue the enemies army; and in those narrow and troublesome passages to do them what mis-C chiefe they possible could. Which the Prince thus appointed, thinking by this means to weaken the enemies forces, and fo at their arrivall at Tauris, to come vpon them with all his power. and fo vtterly to destroy them.

Both these captains departed accordingly, making shew that they would with all affection Aliceli and accomplish the commandement of their Prinoeiyet neuer was there heard any service of mo. Emarguicoa ment put in execution by them: for Aliculi sul of treason, after their departure began to alledge thing exains many forced reasons & excuses, Why they should surcease from meeting with the Turks; and the Furks, as Emanguli as vet veterly ignorant of the wicked purposes and mischieuous trechery of Aliculi, Prince expefuffered himselfe to be misse led by him also. By the delaies and negligence of these two Per. sted. fian captains, the Turkish General took leifure without any losse or hinderance at all, to arrive D at Tauris, and to put the defired fuccors into the fort at what time the Perfian prince by good Feral values hap had got knowledge of the trechery of Aliculi, and of the designements which many of the success into Sultans had lately contriued, for the betraying of him aliue into the hands of the Turkish the fort at Generall. Of which fulpition he being greatly afraid, durst not only not trust himfelfe to per-forme those battels that he had before determined to have performed; but quite abandoning this noble and honorable enterprise, wholly emploied all his care and study for the fafety of his own person, and so left the triumph of the matter in the power of the Turks. And thus those great hopes and expectations which the Persians had conceived of great exploits to heue bin done against the enemy, did not only proue vain and come to no good iffue, but contrariwise by this discouery were converted into most strange disturbances, and all Persia ther-B by endured fundry alterations and revolutions of most important consequencies. For both Aliculi Chan and his complices were purfued by the Prince, as rebels and traitors: and also Abas Mirize of Heri was manifestly discoucred for a wicked and trecherous contriuer of his brothers death: whereby the common mischieses were encreased more than ever they were before, and the publike calamities yeelded greater hopes vnto the Turks than they had ever before conceined in all the course of these wars.

When Ferat had thus relieved them in the castle of Tauris, leaving for the custody thereof Giaffer the Bassa with his former companies, hee returned towards Erzirum: having first caused a fort to be erected at Curchiue Tauris, a place neere vnto Tauris; another at Coy; and the third at Cum: in energy one of which forts he left a convenient number of fouldiers, with F all things necessary and sufficient for their maintenance, and desence of the places they were to keepe. He sent also succors to the fort at Testis in Georgia, which they had long expected, and now most joyfully received. But the Persian Prince having hunted Aliculi Chan out of the quarters of Tauris hought himselse now wholly deliuered from the great searc of treason and rebellion, wherein he of late lived : and therefore in as great hast as he could, put himselfe

on his journey towards Genge: in which place having gathered together a good number of G fouldiers, he determined to remove thence, to intercept the fuccors that were by the Turks to be brought to Teflis. Now he had alwaies found Emanguli Chan to be both faithfull and wife, and in him he reposed an assured considence to performe any enterprise that he had in hand and communicated with him every device that he had conceived in these wars. And therefore he made head and joyned with him; and lodging most familiarly in his city, he staid there fre the fetting in order and disposing of his aforesaid designements, being very desirous not to lee such an opportunity to ouership, without fignification vnto the World of some notable nouel. ty, which might be correspondent to the same that of matters passed and performed the yeare before, was now spread and published abroad ouer all the World. But when he was even at the very fairest to haue put this his desire in execution, and least of all feared any trechery of treason, vpon a sudden in the night time as he slept vpon a pallet he was miserably strucken through the body, by an Eunuch of his that attended vpon him : and fo the most resplendent and bright lustre that ever shined in Persia, was veterly extinguished. What was the occasion thereof, and who procured his death, divers and fundry are the opinions of men. Some thinke. that his brother Abas Mirize of Heri, who had before conspired to have had him betraied into the hands of the Turkish General, had now by force of money and gifts enduced the wicked Eunuch thereunto. Others deemed it not to have beene done without the privity of his father, as more desirous to prefer Abas Mirize his other son vnto the kingdome. Divers others dodiuerfly reason of the matter: so that to assimme of a certainty, that thus or thus the death of foworthy a Prince was procured, were great rashnesse; and therefore we leave it, with the further processe of the Persian State, vnto the further discouery of time, the antient mother of Truth.

Notwithstanding the league betwirt the Christian Emperour Redolph the second and Amurath the great Turke, many tharp skirmithes of centimes fell out between the Christians and the Turks youn the frontiers of their territories and dominions, especially in Hungary, Croatia, and Stiria: as now in the later end of this yeare 1386 in the month of December, the Triks, after their infolent manner making an invode into the borders of Croatia, received a notable ouerthrow by the Christians being in number much fewer: where among it others, the Bassa of Bosna with his brother was slaine; whose head with certaine prisoners was sent to Vienna to Ernestus Archduke of Austria, the Emperors brother. This Bassa of Bosha and his brother, flaine in this conflict (as we have faid) are reported to have been the fons of Muhamet the late great Vifier, by one of the daughters of Selymus the second, Amurath his fifter. For divers yeres following, Amurath did no great matter worth the remembrance, contenting himselfe (as it should seeme) with that he had already got from the Persians; and holding his league in some reasonable fort with the Christians: yet not so, but that many a bloudy broile, tending at last cuen to the breach of the league, passed betwixt the Turks and the Christians, which for the continuation of the History we will briefely set downe, as they are vnto vs by the Writers of our time reported.

In February the yeare following, which was the yeare 1587, the Christians prouoked by the The caftle of often outrages of the Turks, fetting vpon the castle of Koppan, not far from the lake of Bala- L The cance of ton, being then frozen, by good fortune surprised it. There were at that time in the castle three gary surprised of the Turks Sanzackes, and about a thousand Turks, of whom an hundred and ninety of the better fort, with seuenty women, besides divers of the meaner sort, fell into the hands of the Christians, the rest saving themselves by slight, or by creeping into secret corners: an hundred horses for seruice were there taken also, and so much booty as was esteemed to be worth forty thouland duckats. Of the three Sanzackes that were there present, Alis Sanzacke of Koppan was taken, and brought first to Vienna, and afterward presented to the Emperor: Another of them standing upon his defence in a vault under ground, was there smothered: the thirdesca ped by flight, but was afterwards the same yeare taken with divers others, as shall be forthwith declared. The eight of August following, foure of the Turks great Commanders in Hungary, via. the Bassa of Ziget, the Sanzackes of Mohas, of Quinque Ecclesia, and the new Sanzackeos Koppan, with five thousand souldiers brake into the borders of the Chattians, and in most eruellmanner destroyed seuenteene countrey villages about Limbach : carrying away with them all the miserable countrey people, with the spoile of the countrey. Whereof George County Sering (Sonne to that most valiant County Nicholas Sering flaine at Ziget) comman. der of the garrison of Canisia, understanding, with as much speed as was possible raised such forces as he was able out of his territory betwixt the rivers of Dranus and Mura, and calling unto his aid the County Nadasti, the Lord Bathianius, and some other valiant Captaines that had the charge of those frontiers; with such diligence tooke the streits and passages whereby the Turks must needs returne among the marishes, that the Turks comming backe again that way with a very rich prey and many prifoners, being in the breake of the day hardly charged by those most expert and resolute souldiers, in those streit and trouble some passages about a mile from Canifia, were at length difcomfitted and put to flight with fuch a miferable flaugh-R ter, that many of them yeelded vp their feimitars, pittifully crying for mercy; other fome fled backe into the woods and forrests; and many running headlong into the marishes, there perished, or sticking fast in the deepe mud, cried together for mercy and helpe of their enemies. In this conflict Muhamet the Sanzacke of Quinque Ecclesiz (son to Haly B. (la flaine in the battell of Lepanto) was taken prifoner. Sinan Beg Sanzacke of Mohaz; thinking toefcare through the marish, stucke fast with his horse, and was shot through the head with a small thot and there died. The Baffa of Ziget, with Chafan the new Sanzacke of Koppan, feeing all desperat and lost, fled betimes out of the battell: but he of Koppan wandering vp and downer in the woods, was the next night after the battell with others taken: the Baffa of Ziget almost foent with hunger and griefe of minde, escaped on foot seuen daies after to Bresenza. There C. were taken of the Turks a thousand three hundred, of whom many died afterwards of their wounds. In this battell there were stain of the Turks, with them that perished in the marishes and woods, about 2000, and of the Turks horses were taken about 1500. All the prey before taken by the Turks, with the miferable captiues was againe recoursed. The number of them that performed this notable service, was in all but fifteen hundred foot & five hundred horses of whom there was but eleven flaine, but most of the rest wounded. Foure hundred heads of the flaine Turks were (after the manner of those bordering fouldiers) carried for shew to Canisia, with five hundred prisoners. The Christian souldiers with the helpe of the countrey people, ceased not for certaine daies to hunt after the Turkes that were fled into the woods, as after wilde beafts, of whom they found a great number: divers others also seeing no meanes D to escape, came forth of their lurking places and yeelded themselves.

Amurath vnderstanding of all these troubles that had so happened, commanded Aly the Aly 2-size of Buda strengted. Bassa of Buda to be strangled, for that he had broken the league, and not restrained the info-byte commander lency of the Sanzackes, whom he might have commanded : and in his stead placed Sinan Baf- demont of Afa, whom before in difgrace, hee had now at the request of his wife agains received into fa. Sinan Rassa. uour, and restored to his former dignity. About this time also Sigismund (the King of Swe. gaine received den his sonne) now after the death of King Stephen chosen King of Polonia, and Maximi. into familier. lian the Emperours brother rejected, even in the beginning of his reigne fought to renew the league which Stephen his predecessor and other the Polonian Kings had before made with Amurath and his predecessors the Turkish Sultans. And to that purpose writ vnto him as fol-R loweth:

Sigismund the third, King of Polonia, vnto Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks, fendeth greeting.

He Almighty long keepe and preferuc your Majesty in health and honour. Most Mighty Prince, Sigismand the our best beloved friend and neighbour, after that we by the grace and goodnesse of God were chosen by letter und to governe the king dome of Polonia, and the Embassadours of that king dome had signified so much with Amurath. us; me prouiding us of necessaries, came to Danske the eighteenth of October, from whence we fent Iohn Zamogil our Secretary, to give your Majely to under stand of this our comming: For being told by the F Polonian Embaffadors. Vnto which the Kings request and letters, Amurath not long after returned this answer in writing:

Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turks; vnto Sigismund King of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath his anfwer unto the letters of igi/mund.

And therefore your Embassadour in your name requesteth. That no inuasion on our behalfe be made into the borders of the King dome of Polonia or any harmethere done : and that the most noble Tartar Printe Isban Getai, (whom God bleffe) (bould be warned, that he neither make nor suffer any incut front obe made into the confines of the Kingdome of Polonia. All which things in your letters contained, with the reliable your Embassadour bath by word of mouth delivered are with speed orderly by vs conceived. So know you and give credit whio this our fede. From 1. Conftantinople.

Neither was King Sigiffund vnmindefull of this his promife before made for the fending of his Embassador; but being possessed of the Polonian kingdome, sent Christopher Dziercius (his fecretary) Embassador vnto Amurath, for the confirming of the league: which hee hath cuer fince fo firmely kept with the Turke, that he could neuer by any entreaty of the Emperor, or of the Princes Electors, or others, or in respect of the common danger, be drawne into the fellowship of this long and religious war, so hardly maintained by the Emperorand some few other Christian Princes his confederats; first against Amurath whilest he lived, and ever fince against Mahomet his son, which now reigneth; the issue whereof, God grant it prove not M as well vnto the Polonians as others, farther off, in fine lamentable.

The yeare following, Ferat (yet the Turks Generall in Persia) tooke the city of Genge, being before for feare of the Turks quite abandoned & forfaken by the Inhabitants, who yet vpon his faith given for their fafety, returned againe, yeelding to pay, vnto the Turke a yerely tri-

but of five thousand due ass. But when he would have gon farther into the enemies country. having part of his army cut off by the way, he was by his mutinous fouldiers foulely entreated wounded and enforced to retire. Cicala Baffa also passing over the river Euphrates had in those quarters divers bloudy skirmishes with the Persians, sometime carrying away the berter, and sometime the worle, as the fortune of the field served. Vntill at length Amurath himfelte no leffeweary than his people of that long and chargeable war, and the Perfian King alfo inclining to peace the by the persuation of Sinan Bassa (but lately before received into fanour) was now contented to be entreated to hearken vnto the fame : moued thereunto as well hy reason of new troubles then in other places arising as for the great familie and plague then raging in Constantinoplo. And considering withall what a great Territory he had won from R the Persians, and how necessary it was for him by peace to confirme himselfe in those his new conquests, and by the building of certaine strong forts for the succour of one another, and by the placing of the Timatiots therein, to affure the fame vnto him : all which without peace he could not not not fibly do, as the old Baffa right wifely told him. For which reason he yeelded to peace; and to Embaffadours paffing to and fro, a peace was at length agreed upon betwixt these two great Mahometan Princes: the Turke conenanting to keepe vnto himselfe the places he had already gained; namely, Tauris, Genge, Siruan, and Chars, with all the profits thereof ariling, for the maintenance of his garrifons and Timariors there. Whereof it was thoughtness stirres would eft soones arise; the Turks growne insolent of their late victories. being not able to content themselves with the conditions of the league; and the Persians not C willing to liue in continual feare of the Turks, especially seeing themselves to be dayly by them more and more oppressed; and withall doubting lest the Turk's after they had taken fast footing in those new conquered Countries, and so growne strong, and gotten better knowledge of the passages, should (after their ambitious manner) seeke to possesse themselves of the rest; not keeping the couenants agreed upon betwixt them, nor at all regarding the capitulations of the league. Which was neverthelesse (as we faid) on both sides for the space of ten yeres orderly confirmed with all due circumstances and ceremonies, in like occurrents by the great Potentats of the World vsed : and for the more affurance thereof, one of the Persian Kings fons, or as fome others fay, one of his nephews, given vnto the Turke in hostage, as Amurath required.

These long wars thus ended, shortly after a great sedition was raised at Constantinople by The Isligaries the fouldiers of the court, which returning out of Persia, with great infolency demanded their to a tumnit at pay. For the fatisfying of whom, by the confent of the great Sultan himselfe, the value of the coinewas inhaunfed, and a new kinde of subsidie for leaying of mony imposed upon the subjects in generall, none excepted; who standing upon their antient liberties and priviledges, refuled to pay it, especially the lanizaries and other soldiers of the court. Where fore their Age or captainewas commanded to appeale them, and to perfuade them to pay the demanded tribute: in attempting whereof he was in danger to have been flaine by the infolent Ianizaries ; and yet neuerthelesse for prevailing no more with them, was in displeasure thrust out of his office, and another placed in his roome that should have married Amuraths daughter; of whom B for all that, the Ianizaries would not accept in any case, but threw stones at him and threatned to kill him. The next night a great fire arose in the city; for the quenching whereof, the Iani- Great barme zaries were commanded (as their duty was) to put to their helping hands: which they not only most obstinately refused to do, but also kept backe others that brought water for the quenching thereof, and together with the other foldiers of the court, did what they might to make it burne the faster. With the rage of this fire were confumed scuen of their Temples, 25 great Innes, fifteene thousand houses, with many warehouses and shops. To appeale this dangerous stirre, and to preuent surther mischiese, commandement was given to the Beglerbeg of Grecia and David Paffy a lew (the first authors of this new imposition) that they should either gather the aforesaid tribute by them deuised, and pay the soldiers, or by some other meanes to

F give them contentment. But here began the Priests publikely to dissuade the people from paiment of this new tribute, or any other fuch like; perfuading them in any case to defend their antient liberties and customes: wherupon the churches were by the Priests shut vp, publique praiers for the health of the Sultan intermitted, the Bassa's houses assaulted, and all the city on a new hurley burley. For the appealing whereof Amurath was glad to yeeld vnto the Ianizaties, to pay the fouldiers out of his owne treasure, to renoke his mandates given out for a the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliver the two perfuaders thereof to the pleafure of the lanizaries; who drew them up and downe the firees at horses tailes, and afterwards cup. ting off their heads, in scorne to fied them from hand to hand one to another, as if they had big tennise balls.

Sinan Baffa of Ruda inuadeth of Hungary.

Sinan outr.

About the latter end of September, Sinan Baffa of Buda, having wish the affiliance of the Sanzackes about Fille raifed an army of cleuen thousand foldiers, with purpose to have spoil led all the upper part of Hungary, came the fixth of Oktober before the castle of Putnoe, and gaue thereunto summons : but finding them in the Castle better provided and more resolute than he had before supposed, he departed thence, and passing the river Schayo, came to Sizo. a towne of about five hundred houses, which after a forc battery he tooke, and burnett downe to the ground. In the meane time Glaudius Ruffell Generall for the wars in that part of Hunba. ry, having affembled his forces, came vpon him, and after a hard fight put him to the work. when he had flain of his Turks about two thousand fine hundred, besides three hundred other drowned in the river Schayo. Shortly after, the Christians in like manner breaking into the frontiers of the Turks, tooke from them the castles of Blauestein, Gestes, with some other small forts thereabouts in the upper part of Hungary. 1589

Sinan for that he had contrary to the league, and without the commandement of Amerah. fo vnfortunatly attempted war in Hungary, was the next yeare in great displeasure fent form Constantinople, and Ferat Baffa of Bofna (late General of the Turks army against the Persians.

and now but newly come home) placed in his roome at Buda.

Amurath before not ignorant of the great preparation that Philip the King of Speine had made, and of the inuincible Armado (as it was termed) by him fet forth for the inuation of England (the fame whereof had of long before filled a great part of the World) as allo of the euill successe thereof the last yeare, viz 1588, and of the purpose her Majesty of England had for the troubling of his rich trade, especially vnto the West-Indies, and for the relieuing of Don Anthonio, by him driven out of Portugall:wrot vnto her about this time concerning those and fuch like matters as had beene moued by her Agent, as followeth:

Nicholaus Reufnerius Epift. Turcic, lib.12. Pag-42.

Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks, vnto Elizabeth Queene of England, France, and Ireland, greeting.

Amerathe Let- MOst honourable Matrone of the Christian Religion, Mirror of chastity, adorned with the brightnesse ters unto the of fourreignty and power among ft the most chaste women of the people which serve tela, Wistrie of great kingdomes, reputed of greatest Majesty and praise among the Nazarites, Elizabeth Quene of England to whom we wish a most happy and prosperous reigne. You shall understand by our high and smpersall letters directed unto you, how that your Orator refiant in our stately and magnificent Court, hath presented unto the throne of our Majesty accreaine writing, wherein he hath certified us, how that about foure yeares ago you have made wars upon the King of Spaine, for the abating and breaking of huforces, wherewith he threatned all other Christian Princes, and purposeth to make himselfe the sole Monarch both of the mand all the Worldbeside. As allo how that the same King of Spaine hath by force taken from 1 Don Anthonio (lawfully created King of Portugall) his king dome: and that your intention is, that his hips which go and come into the Indies, may from henceforth be imbarred and strayed from that nauige. tion: wherein are yearely brought into Spaine, pretious stones, spices, gold, and silver, escemed worth many millions, wherewith the aforefaid King as with a great treasure enriched, hath meanes to molest and trouble all other Christian Princes: which if he shall still proceed to do he will make himselfe dayly stronger and stronger, and such an one as may not easily be weakened. After that, your aforesaid Orator requefled our Highnesse, in the beginning of the next Spring to fend out our Imperial fleet against him, being assured that the King of Spaine could not be able easily to with stand it, for that he had now already rectined a great overthrow by your fleet : and being scarce able to with frand you alone, if he should be on diuers parts innaded, must needs be overcome, to the great benefit of all the Christian Princes, as also of our M Imperiall flate. Besides this, that whereas the aforesaid Don Anthonio is by force driven out and depriued of his king dome, that we (to the imitation of our noble Progenitours of happy memory, whose grants the Almighty lighten) should also give the aid and succour of our magnificent state, as didthey, unto all fuch as had recourfe unto their high Courts and palaces for reliefe. In briefe, all thefe things, with many

A others which your aforesaid Orator hath at large declared unto our Imperiall throne, we have well under-Rood and laid them up in our deeperemembrance. But for a smuch as we for many yeares past have made wars in Persia with a full resolution and intent otterly to conquer and subdue the king dome of that accurled Perlian heretike, and to joyne the fame unto our antient dominions; and now by the grace of God, and helpe of our great Prophet, are upon the point of the faturfying of our defire: that once done, due prouision hall be assigned unto all such things as you have of us requested or de fired. Wherefore if you shall fincerely and purely continue the bond of amity and friendflip with our high Court you find not find more Coure refuge or Cafer harbour of good will or love. So at length all things Shall go well and according to your hearts desire in your wars with Spaine, under the shadow of our happy throne. And for as much as the Kine of Spaine hathby fraud and deceit got whatfoeuer he holderh, without doubt thefe deceitfull de-R ceivers shall by the power of God in short time be dispatched and taken out of the way. In the meane time we exhort you not to lose any opportunity or time, but to be alwaics vigilant, and according to the conventions between vs, fauourable unto our friends, and unto our enemies a fee. And give nocice here to our high Court, of all the new wars which you shall understand of concerning the said King of Spaine, for the behoofe both of your felfe and vs. To be briefe, your Embassador after he had with all care and diligence dispatched his Embassage, and here left in his place one Edward Bardon his Deputy and Agent, now by our leave maketh his returne towards your king dome, being for the good and faithfull Cruice bethere did. worthy to be of you esteemed, honoured, and before others promoted: who when he hath obtained of you all those his descrued honours and preferments, let him or some other principall Embassador without delay be appointed to our Imperial Court, to continue this office of legation. This we thought good to have you c certified of under our most honourable Scale, whereunto you may give undoubted credence. From our Imperial palace at Constantinople, the sifteenth of this blessed moneth * Ramazan 1589.

Yet for all these faire shewes, it may seeme vnto him that looketh more neere into the state of the Turkish affaires at those times, and that which hath ensued fince, that Amurath glad of the discord of these two so great Christian Princes, and not well affured of his new conquests in Persia, had no great mind to the inuasion of Spaine, as too far from the strength of his Empire, an enterprise not to be so easily managed by sea, as were the wars he shortly after undertooke against the Christian Emperor Rodolph by landswherwith for all that (God be thanked) he found his hands full all the remainder of his life, as did his fonne Mahomet that reigned

About this time also the Polonian borderers (whom they call Coffackes) a rough and war. The Polonian like kinde of people; after their wonted manner making an inrode vpon the Turks and Tartari- the Tartarians ans, vpon the sudden surprised Koslaw a port towne within a daies journey of Cassa, where and survey, they had the spoile of many rich warehouses of the Turks merchants, and the rifling of certain thips lying there in harbor; and having taken their pleasure, burnt the rest, and so with a great booty returned to their lurking places. With which injury the Tartars prouoked, and fet on by the Turks, to the number of forty thousand brake into Podolia and the provinces neere vnto Polonia, and resting in no place, but burning the country before them, slew the poore country people without mercy, and making hauocke of all that they light vpon, besides the spoile, E carried away with them many thousands of most miserable captives: the greatest part whereof for all that, the Polouians rescued, with the notable slaughter of the enemy, surprised in their returne. Whereupon such vnkindnesse rise between the Turkish Emperor and Sigismund the Polonian King, that it was thought it would have broken out into openwars, had not the Polonian by his Embassadors and the mediation of the Queene of England, wisely appealed the angry Turke, and fo againe renewed his league.

Amurath now at peace with the World, from which he by nature abhorred not, and fitting 15 90 idle and melancholy at home, was perfuaded by the Baffa's his Counfellors, to take fome new The reasons war in hand: for that great empires (as they faid) could not without the continually se of armes where which the long stand or continue; as appeared by the Roman state, which so long as it was at wars with prifer assault. Carthage, or their great Captaines and Commanders occupied in armes against their neigh. vato to make bour Princes, Rillremained triumphant, and commanded ouer a great part of the World; but war. giving it selfe to ease and pleasure, and the martial men not after their wonted manner implojed, it in short timeby civill discord fell, and of the Mistresse of the World, became it selfe a prey even vnto the basest nations. Which old Cate in his great wisedom foreseeing, cried out in the Senat, That the fouldiers and men of warre were to be kept still busied in armes far from G. home, for that in fo doing, all should go well with the State, and the glory thereof increase. Whereunto the Othoman Emperours, his noble progenitors, having respect, propounded nor peace as the end of their wars (as do other weake Princes having their owne forces in diffrust) but as innincible conquerors, still fowed wars vpon wars, making one victory the beginning of another: whereby they not onely brought that their Empirevnto that greatnesse it was now of, but by fuch continuall imploiment made their fouldiers more couragious and ready, and also kept them from rebellions and tumults; whereunto in time of peace, and living at case. the se martiall men are most commonly inclined, learning (as all others do) by doing nothing. to do that is euill and naught. Euery thing (as they faid) was by the same means to be main. tained, whereby it was at the first increased; and that therefore great Empires, as they wereby wars begun and augmented, fo were they by continuall wars also to be from time to time effa. blished; whereas otherwise the souldiers living in peace, and forgetting their martiall prowe effe, would for most part grow cowardly, as giving themselves over to the love of their owner dwellings, of their wines, and of their children, and other pleasures; or else converting their studies to Merchandise, or other profitable trades, would in time forget the vse of armer, and be thereunto againe hardly drawne : vnto the great weakening of his strength both by sea and land and the diminishing of the number of his great commanders and expert captains nor m be had without the continual vie of war. With these and such like reasons, the great Bassa's of the Court perfuaded Amurath, That he must of necessity take some new expedition in hand and not to fuffer his valiant fouldiers, but now lately returned out of Persia, to grow lazie or 1 infolent for lacke of imploiment. Which they did not fo much for the love of their Prince. or zeale vnto the State, as for their owne particular profit; especially the two old Bassa's Sinan and Ferst, the envious competitors the one of the others honour who although they both, much and almost all commanded both in peace and war, yet was their honours greater, and their profit far more, in commanding of the Turks great armies abroad, than in fitting in the Dinano at home: vnto which no lesse honourable than profitable preferment they both with like ambition aspired accompanied with the hot desires of their great and many fauorits both at home and ellewhere. These persuasions well pleased Amurath; who although hee were himselse no souldier, yet was he desirous of new conquests, and to increase his name: accounting it no lesse honour vnto himselfe, by his servants at his appointment to performe great K The coules why things, than it was vnto his Ancestors to do that they did themselves in person. But in this so Amerath would ferious a matter, and of fo great consequence, A murath at the first could not tell what best to folic open war, refolue vpon; not for that he was not defirous of warres, but because as yet he certainely knew not against whom he might with greatest profit and least difficulty & danger convert his forces: vpon which point his Counfellors agreed not, but for divers reasons were of divers opinions. Which for a fruch as they containe matters of greatest importance of, all things then in the World don, but especially concerning the profit of the Christian commonweale, I shall not thinke it vnworth my labour, to fet them downe in such order as I finde them credibly reported; having moreover in them many letters and most weighty matters not yet come to all mens knowledge: as also opening the deuises of the Turkish Tyrant against the Christian I Princes; a motive not only for them to joyne in counsell together how to with stand him, but for the common Christian Commonweales, sake to forget and forgiue all their privat displeafures, and with their vnited forces and power honourably and couragiously to make war spon him, and so at length by the mercy of God to ouerthrow him, together with his tyrannicall Empire, the greatest terror of our time.

Right fentrall opinions of the den in band.

Action of Empired & The great Baffa's concerning the intended war were of sight fundry opinions : whereof the first was, That the wars against the Persian should be renewed : the second, for the intasson of the King of Morocco and Festhe third, for war to be taken in hand against the king of Spain the fourth for the besieging againe of Malta; the fift was, to set vpon the Venerians, the fixt, for the inuading of some part of Italy : the seuenth, for the King of Polonia : the eighth and M last was, for warre to be made upon the Emperour and the kingdome of Hungary. With all the which afore faid Princes, except the Spaniard, although the Turke were then in league, and could not with all or any of them make warre, without the motable breach of his mith and honour; yet was that neuer made question or scruple of, but onely, Which might best fland with the profit of his flate for him to fet upon. His barbarous law allowing him that Hberty, for the more affuring of his state, and inlarging of his empire, to break all faith & wro. mile, especially with the Christians, not more in any thing to be pittied, than in repossing any credit or confidence in the faith of fuch a miscreant.

The realous the great Bassa's alledged for the renuing of the Persian war, were, for that the resist established Perfian King was of himfelfelike to break the league fo lately with him concluded, fo forme and reafors to have the Perfian as he should know the Turks intangled in any other warsmound thereunto as well for the recourty of his country, to his great dishonor lost, as also in revenge of so many and so steat injuries to him of late don by the Turkish Emperors. Beside that, the Christian princes would perfuade him and prick him forward therunto; especially the Spaniard, who for the neernes B of India mighewithout his great charge procure him fo to do, and also conteniently furnish him with great Ordnance and Cannoniers, which it was wel known he of late did. The countries also but lately conquered, were not yet, as they faid, in quietnes or fasety; and the fortresfes therin but of late built, together with the garrifons therin, to be in great danger, being for the length of the way, and difficultie of the passage, not to be still speedily relieved insomuch that if the Persians did them no other harm, but only to forrage and wast the countrey about them they should bring the inhabitants into such distres, as that those new conquered countries were again by the defendants to be forfaken, or else they must themselves with hunger perish. True glory, they said, consisted not so much in conquering, as in the vie of the conquest and the prosecution of the happy victory: And that therfore Amurath should take heed that he prouoked not the wrath and indignation of the great Prophet Mahamet against him s who having by his good fauour and guid obtained mo victories than any his predeceffors, against the enemies of his religion, ought as a religious and deuout prince seuerely to revenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Vnto which religious Warte vibeg Han the Tartar King as also the Prince of Gheilan, offered their ready help. As for the eyent of the victory, now as good as in his hand, he was to judge by the fucces of his former Wars. Neither that he need to fear the Persian horsemen, although they vied Arabian horses, beeing byhis men many times shamefully put to flight: of yet to doubt lest the Georgians in fauor of the Persians should take up arms, for that many of them were already under his obeisance and fubicat to the Baffa of Teffis and other his commanders, the rest were his vaffals, or els such D as following the fortune of their princes Simon & Alexander, fought after no greater matter. but contenting themselves with their own countrey, although but small, thought themselves wel if they might keep and defend the same, by nature and scituation so strong, as that there is scarce any way vnto it, by reason of the high and broken mountains, the thick woods, and freit paffages.

The second opinion which was deliucted, was for the transportation of his Wars is to Affrick against the King of Morocco, commonly called the Scriphe; and that for these eatises also, for war most: It would be a great shame and reproch (as they faid) vnto the Othersan Empire, that it will be King was not yet able to subdue those Moores and people of Africke, in number but few. Neither was it leffe shame or dishonour to the otheran Emperours to have so small a territory in Africa, being the third part of the world, which by reason of the necrenesse vnto Italy, had a long time held ware with the Romans. Besides that, Algiers and Tunes could never be safely kept by the Turks: neither that the subjects and pyrats which inhabited those Cities, would ener becontent of at quiet, vntil they had again got that kingdome into their hands. The promontory of Aguero, and port of Larace (two ports without the streits) were, as they said, to be taken, as places very commodious for the Turks friends, feeking in those feat after bonty; and for the facuring of their trade. And although the Scriphe were himselfe a Mahometen; and held his kingdom as a Tributary varo the Othoman Empire, yet had hee fecret intelligence with the Spanished and the Unights of Malta, whereby they not long fince had voon the flid. den almost skerifed Tribolis, he in the mean time as it were winking therat. And that al-F though the Spaniard possessed in Africke, Maraschebit, Oran, Pegnon, Tanger, Arzitia Maza 84. Ceuteon Septe, places whereby he might help and affile the Moors; yet might his forces and arremned by a Arong floer be cash by hindered , and Spaine it felfe infelted. Befides that, The Spaniants and verialisch freth temembrance the lolle of Tunes and Guletta Tofaces by thom the under inemptionable, and you by Siman Baffa to his immortall prafic concest as thereby would not for the Moors lake cally from to attempt any great thing spaint there: G Acrions Turks, in the rangementation name that become being to an afternoon w

The third opinion was concerning the war to be made against them of Make, which was nion, touching by a firong ficet to be performed, for that she gallier of Makta did daily great four as well to the Turks merchanes, as unto fuch as fordeuotions fake stauelled by fear po Mecha. And that therfore, the war was thither to be transferred, not only for religions fake, and to affecure the passage thither from the indursions of the Malteles, but in tevenge of the old Selate infuries by them don; and especially to blot out the infamy and differee which the great Sultan fales. man had incurred at such time as he had in vain belieged that I fland, and to require the loss. by him there sustained. Beside that, they also alledged the common complaints of the sibiects for that there were many which pittiously lamensed the mifgry and calamitie, foreoff H their friends. some their kinsfolk, whom they knew to live in most woful serviced with those Knights, and whom they most earnestly defired to have now set at liberty: Complaining his fubicas to hauchin fo far from fuffering any fuch things from those Knights in the timbof his ancestors, as that contrariwise they themselves ware by them driven out of the Island of Rhodes, the ftrongest bulwark of the Christian commonweal toward the East. Being more ouer worthy also to be chastised, for that they had holpen the tebellious Moors with all kind of munition, and had themselves attempted to have surprised Modag.

The fourth opi-Keasans wby.

In the fourth place were they which were of opinion, That it were best for him to make war war woon the king of Spain. These men alledged it to be impossible for the Turkish empire gaing the $1,2. to attaine to the monarchy of the whole world (whereinto all the Turks actions and desifes giard, and the were alwaies as at a certain mark directed) except the Spaniard his great free gettand ower were first weakned, wherin he seemed to surpasse all other the Christian kings and mindersand that there was no fear left he should be fiege. Algiers, which hee knew to be now much better fortified than it was in the time of the Emperor Gharlet the fift. And that although the Space niards without ceasing belought their king for the undertaking of that expedition, by reason of the new loffes and harmes which they daily received from the Pyrats of Africa everyout he not hearken vnto their request, for fear of the danger imminent both to himself & his subig as from the enemies fleet, which he should in so doing draw into the Spanish less neither would the Spanish gallies easily come into the Turks countries in the East for being too fair from their own country, which for most part stood in need of their help. And that the king of k Spain was with the multitude of his busines and other his vigent affairs still to hindsed that be could not fuddenly put in execution what his Councell for the Myars should desert if As, alfo how much it was to be gathered by that which happed not long fince at Prepara & Navarinum that the Spaniard (hunned the Othoman forces; and also how warily the king dealt in all his affairs, left at length against his will he should be inforced to enser into warres with the Turk was most manifest as was to be seen when as of large about the end of the Restian was he refused, to aid the Persian King, whom hee might have holpen, and was so before wont to doe. And in case that he would stand upon his gard, and by force leek to repel force; yet should he scarse have so much strength, as (beside those wars which he now maketh in diner places) to be able to undertake alfo a new war, and to find so many souldiers, and so much onin & other L things noce flary for fo great a war. It flood thim in hand (they faid) to defend the low appear cries, and to recover againe the provinces there loft, which of themselves wonderful firmed both by reason of the sea and the multitude of the Rivers, were also with wonderful countries and pertinacy defended by the inhabitants, for their liberty, and religious lake My Acutton the English (at deadly harred with the Spaniard) mightimeny wales give great help the there should inuade Portugal, or with their ships lie in wait for his Indian fleet jot and a property into other his kingdoms, as they did not long fince at the Grainated Cades places sandfate equipule Spain and to hinder his traffique into the britis pot of the manage of the british of the state of t was at that time to intengled with his wars in Brance, anther he could frates finds born to did spatch himselfe therof, without the losse of his honor and gredit of saked mit he continued M peace with the aforefaid Princes in fuch for the the flevild dot from shore them the receive any harme, yet warn or her meanes to ben fought and seless and and for his humber the flurbance as by troubling his rich Trade for Spices and other mentanded of the trade for peth great profit, as also if need were, by driving his friendout of the Requestions he he

A of those gallies which still lie at rode at Possidium, which we now cal Suez. And that the fortreffes and strong holds he there possesser to be set vpon, and if it might be taken from him as was once attempted against the Portugals at Diu and Ormuz. The like wherof Alphon-(us Albuquercius (the king of Portugals Viceroy in India) attempted, when as with his light horsmen running thorow that country, he thought vpon the sudden to have spoiled Mecha. and to have robbed the sepulchre of Mahomer, as had hapned vnder the empire of the Sultans. and as Trajan the Empetor had long fince in like maner attempted to rage and spoile. Those places which he possessed in Africk were (as they said) to be set upon, and the coast of Spain toward the Mediterranian to be infested : fo at length to gratifie the Moors his subjects who ftil instantly requested the same, that so they might more safely trasque and trauell; and that B fo the Moors might at length be delivered from the imperious commaund of the Spaniards. Of which exploit Sultan Selymus lately before dead, was in his life time well persuaded, but might now at this time be much more commodiously don, for that the Moorish Nation was now greatly increased, and much oppressed by the Spaniards, and having got great wealth by rrade of merchandise, even by nature or Religion had conceived a mortall hatred against the Spaniards: wherunto might not a little auaile the ports in Africke, whereinto the Turks fleet might at all times in fafety retyre. And in briefe, that which was of greatest importance for the better facees of this war, the French King and the Queen of England had of their own accord promifed the continuation of their wars, & that the French King should inuade Nauar, and by force of arms recover the right he pretended to that kingdom whilst in the mean time C the Queen of England should not only trouble him in the West Indies, and other places of the Ocean soward the North and West, but might also stir vp new broils in the kingdome of Portugal, where most of the people with great impatience did bear the proud commaund of the Spaniard, as persuaded (and that truly) all their prosperity and quietnes to have bin lost together with their last king their true and lawfull soueraign. For he at peace with the kings of France and England, exceedingly thereby inriched his libie as by trafique, whereas fince they fel into the hands of the Spaniard, they daily complain of their new losses and dangers. by reason of his perpetual wars. Moreover, That there was to bee sound great store of exiled Spaniards dispersed here and there; which being male content, and weary of the Spanish gopernment were fled not only out of Portugall, but even out of Aragon and other parts of his n kingdom: which now living in France, England, and Constantinople, both secretly & openly offered great helps the like wherof many of the Moors also promised. All which together feemed to promife a most easie expedition and certain victory, if any should upon the sudden inuade Spains for that there was almost no vie of arms, the inhabitants at home feldom times exercifing themselves therin : neither in places needful having any ordinary garifons, and but few horses fit for service. And that in fine it was to be considered, Spain to be greatly bared of men which knew how valiantly and couragiously to mannage Armes, by the often choice they make of them; which were almost daily transported into the Indies, Italy, and the Low-Countries, Wherby the strength of his Countrey must needs bee exceedingly impaired: so that if he should be inuaded with any strong and mighty Army, they might feem hardly able B to be holpen and defended by their owne people, but should need the helpe and aid of other neer Prouinces that were subject to his kingdom. Which if they should be either letted, or flay to come in good time, they should then leave so much the more caste victory vnto their Enemies.

In the fifth place were they which went about to perfuade Amurath to breake his league The third obtain with the Venetians; vling reasons rather probable than true, although they might feeme lefte nion for ina. doubtfull to the Turkes, for that men easily and willingly beleeve such things as they themselves destre. These men went about to proue no expedition to bee lesse difficult than this, as reasons why. judging of things prefent by the event of former wars passed , wherin the Turks had alwaics taken somthing from the Venetians; who to redeem their peace were divers waies inforced to farisfie the Turks. That the Venetian Commonweal was afraid of the Turks, and abhorred war, was manifest, they said, in that, that in all actions it had propounded unto it self peace, as the end thereof; and after the manner of their ancestors, neuer entred intowars, but en orced thereunto ; and would haply upon the first denouncing of Wars, willingly part with certain places, for feare of greater harme, or to bee vtterly ouercome, as it appeared they did in the yeelding vp of Cyprus. The power and force therof was not fo great, as that it could alone G stand against the great Sultaniand to confederat it self with others would require no smal delay, for the great and many difficulties which commonly vsed to arise in making of Leagues. not being now so conjoined with the Spaniard as in times past, of whose aid it being of late destitute, was constrained to make a hard peace with Selymusiand if so be the Spaniard would needs join himself vnto the Venetians against the Turks, yet that he could by no means afford unto them such aid and supplies as were of necessity to be required, unto so greata War, hee himself being in his Wars otherwise so intangled. As for all other confederation they could make without him, to be but weak and to no purpose. That which the Pope could do herein to be but little; for albeit he should (according to his duty) exhort other Christian princes to give aid, and to stir them vp vnto this war, yet that beside some little supply of mony hard. ly drawn out of his own coffers and the Ecclefiaftical reuenues, he could fearle performe any thing more: or when he had don his vttermost denoir, could but joine fine gallies of his owne unto the Venetian fleet, which with the gallies of the duke of Savoy, of the knights of Main and of the Florentines, could but make a fleet of fome 20 gallies, which was but a final mate. ter. Besides that, the Turkes were persuaded that betwixt the Venetian state and the other Christian Princes was no such friendship and good agreement, as the greatnes of the imminent danger of that War, and as the necessity of the cause would require: And that hitherto their treasures had bin so exhausted in paying the debt they were run into in the last war, and in building of fortreffes, that haply they were not now fo furnished with coin, as was requise for defraying fo great a war. And vnto this War against the Venetians consented smoothall I the Visier Bassa's, differing only in this, Where, or against what place of the Venetian Texttory this war were to be first begun: some naming one place, some another, for dingre reasons them therunto leading, which for breuity we passe ouer.

Other some of the Bassa's in the fixth place, rejecting all the former opinions concerning the war to be taken in hand, would have had all the forces of the Othoman Empire, as well by land as sea, to have been converted against Italy, for that otherwise the Turks should never come vnto the monarchy of the whole world, wherunto as at a mark they had directed al their actions, except they did first subdue Italy. For that this country, as the centre of the whole world, was wont to give both counfel and aid vnto the rest of the limbs, whereby the denices of others were croffed; and that the Romans had at length commanded ouer all the Worlde specially for that they held in possession this country. Herat did the Hunnes, the Alani, and Goths, the Vandals, the Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Sarafins direct all their thoughts and co gitations. In fine they concluded, That no expedition could be taken in hand more honours. ble and profitable than this: for that Italy was a Queene among it other prouinces, for commodious scituation, the wholsomnes of the aire, the pleaty of all things necessary for mans life, for great, fair, and rich cities, for the antient glory and majefty of the Roman Empire, and many other causes also. Neither that this expedition was to be deemed of much difficultie, for that Italy was under the rule of diuers princes, unto whose command most of the subjects vnwillingly obeyed. As also for that the inhabitants of that country had now for many years lived in continual peace, and were therfore the more effeminat and fearful, and fo whit for the L wars. And that if that expedition were in one or divers places taken in hand, before the com were full ripe, the Turks in that so fruitfull a Country could never want necessaries for them to live vpon 3 wheras the inhabitants in great number wanting the same, and shut vp within the wals and fortifications of their Cities and strong towns, should be brought into extream wants. Which was the more euidently to be seen, for that at this time wherein they were at peace, they had not corn sufficient in the Countrey for so great a multitude of people to line vpon, but were glad to have it brought vnto them from other places, especially from Peloponefus, Constantinople, and the Cities upon the coast of the great Ocean. Furthermore, that it was to be considered. That most part of the Italians lived by no other meanes burby their handy labour or the trade of merchandife; of which means if they should be deprived, they M should in short time be brought to that point, as to be glad to accept of such conditions as tle victor should propound vnto them, or as tributaries to submit themselves vnto the other man gouernment. Neither that the foldiers would vnwillingly be drawn vnto that Wanfor that they were not so passe through barren regions of the enemy, frozen with ice, or desolate, neither by rough woods or inaccessible mountains, but were all the way thither to travel thorow their own country; and as it were in the fight of their own houses and if the Turks could oftentimes enter fo far, when as they had their confines more remote, and their passages more difficult, that the same might now much more easily be effected, when as they had a far greater opportunitie, and their enemies so neer at hand.

The feuenth opinion was theirs, which thought it best to have the war transferred into Po- The 7. spinion, lonia, and from thence into Hungary and Germany : for which they alledged these reasons, for wars with first. For that they thought it a diffgrace vnto the majesty and reputation of the Othoman Em. pire. That the king of Polonia had fomtime refused to pay his tribute due (for so the Turkes account of all fuch presents as are vnto their Sultan vsually sent by their neighbor princes, of B curtesie) and that therfore he was by force of armes to be compelled therunto. Which they thoughtwould the more easily be obtained, for that there was much secret hatred and heartburning among ft the Polonian nobility. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous war to be taken in hand, for a fouch as Polonia was confined with Moldavia, the Tartars, and the Sanzack of Acherman, Bendera, and Volia; and moreover, for that the Turks could never have any affired or full possession of Moldania or Valachia, except the insolence of the Polonians were repressed a the Vayuods of which Countries, when they had inriched themselves with much wealth, vied ftil to fly into the kingdom of Polonia. Befides that, they should therby revenge themselves for the injuries don them by the Cossaks, and have more free & safe traffique into Muscouy, and bring a terror voon the Duke of Muscouy, by reason of the nigha nes of the country which great Duke was an impediment to the Otheman Emperour, that hee conquered not the whole kingdom of Persia. And when he had by this means by little & little drawn ynto Germany, haply it might fo come to passe, that the Christian emperor should therby receive fome notable loffe, his empire being fill more & more exposed and invironed with the Turks forces and garifons. Polonia they faid to be a plaine and open countrey, neither to have any strong places for to with stand them; and the inhabitants to have small skill in martial affairs, for that they had now long lived in peace. For as for the war that they had with Maximilian the Archduke of Austria, it continued not long; and king Stephen in the late wars he had with the Muscouit, vied for the most part the Hungarian foldiers, & ended those wars rather by belieging than fighting.

They which in the eighth and last place deliuered their opinions concerning the intended The eight opin war, perfuaded to have it converted upon the Christian Emperour, whom the Turks call the nin for war King of Vienna. The causes they alledged for the beginning of this War were, For that the programme to the beginning of this war. Vicocchi were grown fo infolent, as to make good prife of the Turks both by fea and land, in reasons theref. fuch fort, as that not onely for the harms they did, but even for the majefty and honor of the Otheman Empire, their infolencie was not longer to be fuffered. By whose injuries it chiefe. ly came to passe, that the merchants to their great hinderance in privat, and the Sultans great loffe in common having left the town of Narenta or Narona in the Turks dominion, had remoued their mart to Salona (now called Spalato) a town of the Venetians; and that yet for al that was nor to fufficiently prouided for the fecurity of the faid merchants, although there E were peace betwire the Emperor and the Venetians: for that these viruly men for most part living upon the spoile, troubled all both by sea and land with their robberies, driving away mens cattel, burning the villages, and taking away the young babes out of the mothers armes and laps. Whereby it was eafily to be feen what mind they were of, and that it was not to be doubted, but that if occasion should serve for them to surprise any of the Turks strong holds vpon the frontiers, they would with all their power attempt the fame; which what a difhonor and infamy (not to fpeak of the loffe) it would be vnto the whole othersan Empire, every man may easily ghesse. Neither that it was vnknown, how little the Christian Emperor had esteemed of the Turk, at such time as he was in war with the Persian paying his tribute too late at his pleasure; an euident signe rather of violating than of establishing the league. And that the good fucces of this war was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtful; for that the attempt might be given both by Croatia, Hungary, and Austria, Countries abounding with all things necessary for the maintenance of a great army; as also for that they were almost to trauell all the way in the Turks own territory. Beside that, the chiefe fortresses of Hungarie, namely Belgrade, Buda, & Alba-Regalis, with many other strong places, were already holden

by the Turks gartisons, whither their Armies in all cases of extremity might in safety retite, G or out of the same garrisons repair their losses, if any should be. The Roman empireras they of out of the terms of peace than of war, &c the princes of nothing more careful, than how to heap up and preferue their treasures and the people of Germany, for that of long time they had had no wars, to be lesse fit now to bear armes, and worse to be commanded by their Cap. tains; alwaies having indistrust the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for the thole nations are not beloued, but rather hated of the Germans, beeing not ac unity among & them. felues but divided, especially about matters of roligion. Neither thatit was to be leared, left forrein princes should aid the Emperor in this war: The Polonian and Transylvanian to line now in peace with the Turk, and therfore would by no meanes turn the heat of this Warinto their own bosoms; as also for that the Polonians were assaid, lest in so doing they should be to driven out of their country, and inforced to remove themselves toward the frozen seared the Transylvanian having received his fourraignty from the Turke, no leffe in feare(if he hould fo doe) to be of him again stript and spoiled of the same. As for the king of Spaine, although he were of fuch power as might afford vnto the house of Austria great aid, yet that het was in other places now too much busied and that the Bishop of Rome could not besteady in all places to ferue his turn : the princes of Italy would not fpend their fubicas and treasures to pleasure another man: and that the Venetian State would not rashly stir up the Tinker anus against themselues, but rather at ease expect the event of the war, than to intangle themselves with other mens dangers.

These were the chief opinions of the great Bassa's, concerning the war to be taken in bandi 1 not fo much proceeding from any ripe or found aduice (as commonly they doe) but miher from a certain barbarous infolencie and contempt of others wherwich they moved dook. times vainly perfuade them of the eafie performance of many expeditions, which in proofe they find to be not only most difficult, but vnto themselves also most pernicious,

Amurathre_

In this fo great diversity of opinions stood Amurath, of long in doubt what to telogram on:defirous he was in all places to shew his power, and if it were possible, to exceed the glory of his predecessors, as he thought himself to have already don in Persias having as he boasted. by his servants there performed more than they could themselves in person with their mighty armies: wherfore contenting himfelf with that he had already don in the East, he resolved now to turn his forces against the Christian Emperor toward the West. And that for divers & respects: first, it grieued him to see the honor of the house of Austria, and that it durst make head against him. Besides that, to make war with a country confining upon his own, would be a thing of far leffe difficulty than was the Persian war, where his armies were now still to be led thorow his own peaceable countries from whence they were to be at all times elentifully relieved with vi Quals and what focuer els they needed. In which opinion he was also confidence med by Sinan Baffa; who having invain perfused him to have made war againft the Venetians, furthered now this war, in hope therby to recouer his credit and reputation (before greatly impaired abroad by the little he did in Porlia ; as also at Constantinople, by the differed betwirt him & Ferat Baffa, commonly called the black Screent) as also to increase his wealth and riches. Which shortly after forted to his defire, being by the great Sultan American applications of the state of the pointed General for those Wars. But about all others, Hassan Bassa of Bosna furthered this matter, in hope therby to have gained great riches (as the Turks maner is) together with the greatest honours of the field, as he was most vainly perfuaded by his cold prophets, to whom he gaue no small credit. He therfore daily certified Amurath of the harms which the Vicoschi and other the Archdukes subjects and servants did upon the frontiers of his territories, telling him of their burnings, spoilings and robbings, inciting him to begin his war in Orbittia, and foto continue the same either against the Emperour or the Venetians, or els spon the fudden that way to break into Italy, as had somtime the like been done in the time of Mahomet, Bajazet, and Solyman, his noble progenitors: whereby to bring a great terrour vpon all the princes of Italy, and to inrich his foldiers with great spoiles. By which importunity be (as a M most mortal enemy not only so the house of Austria, but vnto all Christendom) got leave to begin those firs in the frontiers of the empire, which were first fatal vnto himself, and did afterwards notably exercise theatmes of the two Othoman Emperors, Amurath and Mahmet ; 18 also the Christian Emperous, with others his friends and confederats. Yervnto this leave granted to the Bassa, was this condition at the first anexed, That he should not seem to doe it by Amuraths commandement, but of himself, under colour to restraine the Viocchi; who as well by land as by fea (as he pretended) spoiled both the Christians and Turkes, by the great liberty of the princes of Austria, having small care to chasten them.

Now was it no great matter for Haffan Baffa to do what Amurath his great Lord & Maffer had commanded, for the disturbing of the peace betwirt him and the Christian Emperor; the Turks leagues with their neighbor princes being seldom so religiously kept, but that as well their fouldiers in garrison vpon their frontiers by land, as their aduenturers by sea, might to keep themselves doing, vpon a military insolencie (as the Turks term it) now & then at their pleasure make incursions for booty both by sea and land; which being answered with the like R from their neighbors fo molefted, there never wanted new grievances, and just causes of complaint, to the ftirring vp of greater troubles euen among the greatest princes. The Venetians 15 Q J thus wronged at sea, and their merchants robbed, by their Embassadors complained at Constantinople of the injuries don them by the Turks pirats, requiring to have them called home and justice don upon them. In like maner the Emperor also, seeing many things both this year and the next, attempted by Haffan Baffa in Croatia, and the other Turks in Hungary, contrary to the league to the great disturbance of his subjects in both those countries; by his Embassador then lying at Constantinople complained of these outrages, desiring to know whether ther they were don by the consent & knowledge of Amurath, or not, and if not, then to require that order might be taken for the restraining therof. Which was accordingly don, and those C incursions for a while staicd, and the former peace continued. Amurath still making shew, as if the league agreed upon for eight years, should not be in any wife on his part infringed. At The Perfet which time the Persian Kings son (the league not long before concluded) died in the Turks bostage dieth court, where he lay in hostage: whose dead body Amurath caused to be honourably sent home Court. to his father into Persia, with an apologie in defence of himself, against the suspicion conceiued by some. That he should have bin the cause of the vntimely death of the yong prince: still urging withall the confirmation of the league, which by the death of the prince had like enough to have bin broken. Wherof Amerach was the more defirous, for that perfuaded by his Bassa's (as is a foresaid) to make wars with the Emperor (although he notably diffembled the fame) he was in hope therby to adde vnto his empire the reliques of Hungary, with some n good part of the territory of the house of Austria also, and so to open himselfe a way into the heart of Germany. For which purpose he now caused very great preparation to be made, and a strong army to be raised, and at the same time put a great fleet of gallies into the Archinelago, for the fafety of his Islands in that sea. According to these designements, the Bassa of Bossaby the commandement of Amurath, 1502 with an army of fifty thousand entred into Croatia, and without refistance burnt and destroy ed the country before him sparing nothing that came in his way. And not so contented laid fiege to the city of Wihitz, being the metropolitical city of that country, frongly feituat as it were in an Island, compassed about with the river Vna. Which city, after he had fore bat- wibitain cratered, and twice affaulted, was by the distressed desendants (now dispairing of reliefe, and not attained to E able longer to hold it out) yeelded vnto the Basta, vpon composition. That the German souldiers there in garrison might in safety with bag and baggage depart; and that such of the Christian citisens as would, might there stil remaine without hurt from the Turkes either in body or goods. Which conditions the Baffa faithfully performed unto the garifon foldiers, whom in number but four hundred, he fent with safe conuoy into their own territory : but afterwards contrary to his faith and promife exercised all maner of Turkish tyrannic vpon the poor citifens. The Emperour troubled with this vnexpected invalion of the Turkes, fent the Lord Peizen (whom he had many times imployed in embassages to the Turk) to craye aid of the German princes against the common Enemy. Who according to the greatnesse of the danger, in large terms promised their helpe. The first that made head was Ernessus Archduke

h of Austria the Emperors brother, who with five thousand souldiers came from Vienna to Sa. varia, commonly called Greis, the metropolis of Stiria: to whom repaired daily more firength out of Carinthia.

In the mean time the Turks army daily increasing in Croatia, inclosed six thousand foor-

the Ciriffians men and fine hundred horfmen of the Christians (who had taken the mountaines, woods, and G men and frue hundred hardly before them, that of all that number few escaped with lifestmone whom many valiant fouldiers and expert Captaines were flaine, namely lames Prants, George Plesbach, and John Weluerdurff. The Basta after the barbarous maner of the Turks, to make his victory feem more famous, laded fix wagons with the heads of the flain Christians.

The Turks thus raging in Croatia, brought a general fear vpon all Hungary, Bavaria, Bobei mia, Stiria, Carinthia, Silesia, and the rest of the provinces therabout. Wherupon the empa ror calling together the States of Silelia and Moldavia, declared viso them the iminent dans ger:persuading them to joine their forces with the rest, for the repulsing of sodangerous an Enemy.

After long delay, Ernesten the Archduke the tenth of August came to the Emperour his to brother with the embassadors of Hungary; and the seuenth day after were called together the Embassadors of the kingdoms and provinces of the Empire, where it was throughly debared; how the Turks were to be refifted, and their attempts infringed; as also from whence forces. mony, and other warlike provision was to be raised. For now it was manifestly seen, thereben ger to delay the matter was dangerous; and the rather, for that the Beglerbeg or great Commander of Grecia, with three fore thousand select soldiers both horse and foot, of long time exercised in the Persian war, was ere long expected, who joining with the rest of the Turks are my, might do great matters both in Hungary and the places adjoining. For preventing of which fo great and manifest dangers, they sate daily in councel at Prague, yea ofttimes even from morning vntill night: for the Hungarians, and especially the Lord Nadafi, a most No. 1 ble and valiant gentleman among ft them, infrantly vrged to have fuccors fent into Hungarya for a fmuch as the Turkish Emperor, if he should get into his hands the rest of the towner and castles vet holden by the Christians in Hungary, it was to be feared less the should in a short time after indanger the whole state of Germany , the strength whereof the Turks seated not formuch, as he did those poor reliques of Hungary. Others were no lesse carefull of the dans gers of Croatia and Styria, as more proper to themselves, the enemy there now raging. In these so great dangers, the Hungarians with the rest of the distressed cried upon the Emperor for help; and he likewife called vpon the Princes of the Empire. Diners affemblies were made in Bohemia, Hungary, Moravia, Silesia, and other the Emperors provinces; and Embassadors fent from almost all the German princes, to the Emperor. All was full of confultation, but K as for help, that came in very flowly: yet fuch as was to be had was forthwith fent into Cross tia, to defend the fortresses thereagainst the further attempts and proceedings of the farious Enemy.

certain vain attempts of the Turks.

The 18 of September, the Turkes with all warlike provision upon the fudden by night affaulted the strong castle of Toccay in the vpper Hungary, in hope to have surprised it. But finding it a matter of more difficulty than they had before imagined, they departed thence, & attempted the leffer Comara, which standing in a mariff ground, was also casily defended. At which time also the Bassa of Buda with his power entred into the frontiers of the Chris stians; but having wel viewed the cities, towns, castles, and forts vponthose borders, & finding nothing for his purpose, he without any thing doing returned again to Buda.

The 26 day of September Hallan the Balla of Bolna incamped with his army betweenethe rivers of Kulp and Savus, and in the darknesse of the night passing over part of his army into Turopolis, with fire and fword most miserably spoiled all that pleasant and fertile Island, the Lord of Bonny, to whom the keeping therof was committed, labouring in vain to defend the

About the end of this moneth, the Baffa of Ziget, with the Sanzackes of Mohas, Koppen and Quinque Ecclesiæ, and other Turks of great name, came with a strong Army, and incamped between Ziget and Rodesto. And shortly after, newes was brought to the Emperours Court, That Canifia (a City of Stiria not far from the giver Zala) was hardly belieged by the Enemy; and that the Turkes in comming thither had taken many Christians Captines, st whom they had fent to be fould at Constantinople; and that there was in the Turks Army about an hundred and fixty thousand men. But forasmuch as the Christian Army daily increased also, and was now growne to the number of threescore thousand, men began to hope

A wel, that the enemies rage would be flaid from any further proceeding. About the fame time Ernestus the Archduke appointed General of the Army, with the Marquis, sonne to Frederick the Archduke, his lieutenant, came both vnto the army.

In these proparations, about the beginning of October heavy newes was brought unto the Emperors court, how that 7000 men, whom he but a little before had fent into Croatia, vodes the conduct of Thomas Artelius Bean, George Gleichspacher, and Dionysius Denke, to hinder the course of the Turks proceedings, being incamped betwixt Wihitz and Carolftat, and having the twelfth of September discouered from an high hil certain companies of the Turks (which were indeed of purpose come thither to view the Christian army) sent out fifty horsemen to discouer the Turks army where it lay, and what it attempted. Who finding no moe of the B Turks than those they had before seen from the mountain, returned again vnto the army with fuch simple intelligence. Wherto the Christians giving credit, became secure in their tents as men out of fear of the enemy, and so kept but negligent watch. But in this so great securitv the enemy on a fudden came vpon them, and with 100000 men brake into their trenches: where the Christian footmen for all that for the space of soure houres maintained a notable fight, wherin many were on both fides flaimbut the poor Christians being befet round, & oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, were slain almost all ; yet the Captaines sceing the danger, by speedy flight saued their liues : for which their cowardise and carelesse negligence they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almost all the common fouldiers were there flain; yea fuch as fell alive into the hands of the enemy, were most cruelly cut in C pieces. The spoil also of the tents of the Christians fell vnto the enemy; wherein besides aboundance of other things, they found fixty thousand Dollars, brought but two daies before from Lutz for the foldiers pay. The Turks after their barbarous maner, in oftentation of their victory, laded 14 wagons with the heads of the flaine Christians, which they fent into divers of their places therabouts. This was indeed a great victory, but gained by the Turkes with much bloud : for the Christians fighting as men desperat, slew of their enemies about twelve thouland; and died themselves as men rather with number oppressed, than with true valout vanqui(hed)

The night following, the Turkes woon the fudden in the dead time of the night furprised The calls of the castle of S. George, and without respect of age or sex, cruelly put to the sword al that were s. George flar-I therin, except 150 persons, whom they caried away captive and so setting the Castle on fire, piled by the departed. At the same time divers companies of the Turke's were seen about Sifeg, who led away with them about fix hundred Christians into most miserable captivitie. And that noahing might be wanting vnto the calamitles of this fo miserable a wasted Countrey, three hundred Waggons charged with all manner of provision, sent out of the provinces there by for the reliefe of the garrison soldiers in Croatia, were all intercepted by the Turkes, and so carried away.

The Emperor confidering these proceedings of the Turkes, and that their strength daily The Emperous increased, gaue notice by writing to all the Princes and States of the Empire, what incursions or with aid a the Turks had of late made into Croatia and the frontiers of Hungary, with other places neer forma princes E vnto them: and that the Beglerbeg of Greeia, with the Bassa's of Bosha, Buda, and Temeswat. without regard of the league yet in force, had taken divers Cities, Towns, Castles and strong places, & so extended the bounds of their dominion aboue forty German miles, having slain or caried away into captiluitie the poor inhabitants of those countries; & now to be grown to that hight of pride, that except their further proceedings were with like force reprefled, they would in short time set foot into Germany it self, and possessing themselves of Stiria and Carinthia, would from thence daily more and more incroch vpon the empire. Which to hinder, was not in his power only, but required their help in generall. Wherfore he requested them, now at length in so publike a danger to open their coffers, and to send out their forces against the common enemy. Which request of the Emperor, with the due consideration of fo great a danger, mooued not only the Princes and States of the Empire, but others also farther off, to yeeld liberal contribution to so necessary and general a Cause.

The Turks now hearing of the great preparation of the Christian Princes, beside the army which was already in the field, and that they had made a strong bridge over the river of Dranus, which they had also fortified; therby in safety at their pleasure to transport their Army ;

Tarepolis' thoiled by the Turks. without further delay furnished such places as they had gotten, with strong garrisons, and so G withdrew themselues into their own territory which they did the rather, for that the Plague then raged fore in Constantinople, infomuch that there died a thousand a day, Which contagion had also taken hold of the Turkish Army, so that the Christians for fear of insection flew what Turk socuer fel into their hands. And thus ended the troubles of this year, beeing as it were an introduction for greater to infue the year following.

1593. Duers incurthe Chriftians.

The Turks together with the beginning of the new yeare began also their wonted incurse ons into the frontiers of the Christians. They of the garrison of Petrinia (a strong fort bie lately and contrary to the League built by the Turkes vpon the River Colapis or Kulo, for the further inuation of Croatia) made daily incursions out of that new fort, and entring into the Island Turopolis, spoiled and burnt the town and castle of Beck-Vocobinam, and hanne u made a great flaughter, carried away with them 400 prisoners. And in Hungary the Turbis garifons to supply their wants, made divers inrodes upon the Christians, and did exceeding much harm; of which adnenturers, 600 passing ouer the frozen lake, were all drowned in the midft therof. In another place three thousand of them neer to Nuhuse dividing themselves into two companies, the one shewed it self in the fight of the townesmen, the other still lying close in ambush. They of the town your the fight of these Turks fallied out, and causing them to retyre followed them fo far that they were past the place where the zest of the Turkeslav. who prefently starting up, ran with all speed toward the town in hope to have surprised item wanted not much of that they defired; for there was scarce a hundred of the Germans there in garison left in the towne, who had scarce so much time as to draw up the bridget. Which 1 don they with the great ordnance from the wals inforced the Turks to tetyre and forfake the town. About the same time also, the Turks in garifon at Betrinia fellying out voon the sud. den took the town Martenize, which they spoiled; and hatting flain and taken about 700 perfons for fire on the town and for returned, having loft in this exploit not past a hundred & fifty of their own men. Not long after the same garrilos foldiers of Petrinia took another esfile three miles diftage from the river of Kulp, wherinto the Christians dwelling gound about had for fear of the enemy conveyed all their wealth, with great flore of victuals: all which the Turks took and having flain 600 men in the castle resurred with an exceeding with body to Petrinia: which they bought with the lives of 500 of their fellowes flain in taking the cashe. With like infolencied all the other garifons of the Turks rage in al the other parts of these K gary. About Saffovia in the ypper Hungary they caried away about three hundred Christia an captines. And in the nether part of Hungary they took the figong caftle of S. Helwig vpen the lake of Balaton, which they spoiled and burnt and so likewise the Castle of Ishan burnt, tempting the leffer Comata, they were by the garrison foldiers valiantly repulsed they also fortified the Caftle of Stock, which they had but a little before taken, that fo it might feme as a safe refuge for their aduenturers. Which their manifold outrages contrary to the league euidently declared the desire they had to begin that bloudy war which presently differ insted: and was indeed the more suspected, for that at the same time the Emperors Emballidor Frederick Corcowitts was by Amuraths commandement thut up close in his house at Constantinople, and not fuffered to speak with any man, neither to write or to fend any messenger who the Emperor. Which caused him the more to suspect some great matter to be by the Turke intended, and therfore began to raise new forces. The Hungarians and Bohemians also seeing their Townes and Castles thus taken, their Provinces spoiled, infinite numbers of people 14d away into captiuitie, and the enemy daily increasing in strength; at length agreed vpon their own charges to maintaine a certaine number both of horse and foor far the repressing of these the Turkish incursions.

Now although the Emperor knew right wel, al these outrages of the Turks contrary to the league, could not be don without the knowledge and good liking also of Annuals (as before informed therof by his Embassadour from Constantinople) yes to shew himselfs willing to have the league on his behalf kept, as alfoxo make a further proof of Amuraths resolution for M

Sinan Bassa, chiefe Visier to Amurath the third: . Vnto Redelph the second . Emperous of the Ros. mans, Greeting.

Sinan Baffa's letters to the Emperor.

BY shefe we give your Majefty to ander frand. That two of your Majefties Listers were brought hither before we were obsten and confirmed chief Vifier in this most royall Convin wherin your Maislie excule your felfe, and from causes why the sending of the wonted Presents hat b bin fo long deferred by laying the fault upon the infolencie of our garrifon feldiers in Bafna, and the breach of the publick peece. to your letters being by us read before our most mighty Emperor, his Highnes in choler burst out to these words; And thy son the Beglerbeg of Buda hath still hithertowis; and ginen verous. derstand. That the visuali Presents would certainly come, and that the King of Vienna would not in any case consent to the breach of the league, or of the amity betwixt vs and him. And yet for all that, the prefents are not hitherto come swherfore thy fone writings and relations are nottrue. But now the Baffa of Bofna bath fent word to the Court, Thangour Maisfymillines find them, and all your doings to be but meer deceit and fraud. For which cause our most mighty Emperour bash removed my son from his place in Buda, and rewarded the Bassa of Bosna with bonorable garments. wher as my fon is for your sake displaced. Now on our behalf nothing is don against the peace, but our seldiers as with a bridle kept in : whereas on your M aiesties behalfe, excursions and harms into the territor ries of our Emperor neuer cease, especially in Bosna; wherinto your soldiers hade of late in while maner broken, although they were by our garifons over come, their great ordinance taken and brought hither to the Court. Wherfore feeling the case to standeth, your Maiesty is to refolue us upon two points , whereof the first is , Whether you be minded to keep friendship with vis as beseemeth , and to send his hershe two last years profess or not? And the second, Whether you will set at liberty our captine Sanzacks or no. Nowif your Maiefty shall be content to keep the legue, and within these two months next to send the two years presents, as also to dismisse our Sanzacks , the league shall on our part be likewise undoubtedly kept, your tervitories [bal be in no casemolested, such Christian Captines as your Maiesty shall require, be inlarged, and a most firm and sure friendship by vs continued. Wher as if you soall upon any cause or excuse longer delay to fend those honorable presents, and unto these our demands send us not hing but vain and windy answers; let God on high be therfore for ever praised : for now our most mighty and victorious Emperor, who wan. teth neither ability nor power, hath commanded, That we our felf should in person go in thu war, and putting our confidence in the Highest with the army of the right beleening Turkes to come into these parts. And therfore assure your Maiesty we will not fail there to incounter you; at which time shall appear outo the world what is by Godour Creator (whole holy mame be for ever praised) in his deep wildem presidened and fet down for us. Wherfore seeing that all which concernes he League sogether with the safety and quiet of our people on both fides, is unto your Maiefly then declared, you are to confider the end, andie follow our good adnice: Wheras if otherwise you shall be the cause of the breach of this so whatsom a peace and unity (which we his berto have fo fincerely and firmly kept) the excuse theref both in this morld and in the world to come, shall lie upon your self. Now we request of you no more but forthwith to find ve me for of these our lotters. As for the rest, well may be speed that saketh the right way.

From Conftantinople the last of the moneth. # Giama Zulmel, in the years of our holy. Prophet Mahomet 1001

Yet for all these fair offers of peace thus by Sinan Baffamade in his letters, was his perpose nothing leffe than to have performed the fame : feeking anely to have drawne the two years prefents from the Emperor, amounting to a great summe of mony, and so nevertheles to bath profecuted the intended war. The Emperor being the only man of whom American are mafter had among it all the Christian princes made choice to exercise his forces post which things the Emperor was not ignorant, being theroff is we faid) fully before by his can be for the faid of th bassador aduertised from Constantinople.

These troubles of the Spring thus past, costed the Schmier much mera we belome, for Hassan Bassa of Bossa, chiefe author and deuiser of these broiles, ceased not for the increase of his credit, to worke what the bless he doubt against the Christians that included the This

This great Bassa mortally hated the Gouernour, or as some call him the Abbot of Sifeg, a frong castle scituate vpon the borders of that part of Croatia, yet holden by the Christians. where the river Kulp falleth into the famous river of Savus or Saw (and was indeed the very bulwarke of that countrey) the cause of which his hatred is reported to have beene this. The veare before, the Bassa had sent a messenger to this Abbot, to require him to deliver the casse or monastery unto him : which messenger for certaine daies the Abbot entertained with many honourable speeches, learning in the meane time of him so much as he possibly could of the Bassacs intention, with what power, in what place, and with what engines he had determined to besiege the castle. In the meane time it was discouered, that his steward had long besore. plotted with the Turke to have betraied the castle, and had for certaine yeres past received of B him a yerely pension. Vpon which occasion, the Abbot caused both the messenger & his own Reward to be apprehended, and so fast bound hand and foot, to be cast out at a window of the castle into the river of Saw. The Bassa seeing his messenger not to returne, sent another to the Abbotigrieuously threatning him, if he did not fend him back again his messenger: wherunto the Abbot answered, that he had dismissed him certaine daies before, and therefore maruelled if he were not as yet returned: neuertheleffe concerning his demand, that he was refolued to veeld the monastery vitto the Bassa, against whose forces he saw himselfe vitable to hold it: requesting only, that it would please him to send some men of account to receive it at his hand. for that it would be no small dishonour vnto him to deliuer it vp vnto common soldiers. The Baffa glad of this meffage, fent forthwith certain principall men of great account, hoping now C without any losse to have that strong place yeelded vnto him, which had so long time stood in his way. Three daies after certaine tronps of horsemen sent from the Bassa, came to the monaftery as was appointed, and finding the gates open, entred, first the noblemen, and after them fine hundred others or thereabouts; who were no fooner within the gates, but that the portculleis was let fall, & certain murthering pieces (feeretly placed in the court for that purpose) discharged; with the violence whereos the Turks that were already entred, were most miserably rent in pieces, their heads, armes, and legs, flying in the aire; when presently the garrison fouldiers starting out of their lurking places, made a quick dispatch of all them that had escaped the fury of the great artillery. The rest of the Turks shut out, hearing the noise and cry of them within turning their horses, betooke themselves to speedy flight. The great Bassa hea-D ring of this flaughter of his men, and how he had beene deceined, Iwore in great rage by his Mahomet, to rafe this monattery downe to the ground, and to plucke the Abbots skin ouer his eares: and fo by threatning letters gave him to understand as followeth:

Haffan Baffa of Bofna, vnto the Abbot of Sifeg.

I is not to thee unknowne, how often wee have fent unto thee our messengers with letters, declaring The threatning I unto the our lone and good will; requesting thea in friendly fort, and without further resistance to base of Bose jeeld up unto wethy fortreffe of Sifes, not longer to be by thee holden. Turks Baffatte

Neither was the Bassa vnnrindfull of his promise, or of the losse he had received, but now in Hassan Bassa the beginning of Iune with an army of thirty thousand horse and foot, came and besieged the aria, fortreffe fortresse of Trenschijn, which with continuall battery and often assaults he at length tooke, G facked the towne, flew most part of the inhabitants, except 800 or thereabouts of the younger fort, which he carried away with him into captinity. And being proud of this victory, temo. Sife believed using thence by a bridge which he had made, passed ouer the river, and so the swelfth of lune came and incamped before the monastery of Sifeg; and after vain summons given to the same. the next day caused his great ordnance to be planted, and with great fury thundering against the wals, in short time ouerthrew the new tower, in the fall whereof two of the Christian cano. niers perished. This surious battery he maintained by the space of ten daies without intermission, giving no time of rest to the besieged; so that it seemed not possible for the monaste. ry to be any long time defended, if it were not with speed relieued. The Bishop of Zagrabia, and Rupertus Eggenberg Generall of the Emperours forces that then were at Zagrabia, gain knowledge thereof to Andrew lord Auersberg Gouernor of Carolftat, crauing his aid and coun. fell: who calling together his owne forces, raifed a good number of good horse and foot, and called also vnto him the bordering horsemen of Karnia and Carainia: who the seventeenth day of lune met all together not far from Inflawitz, and there tarried that night. The next day passing ouer the river Savus neere vnto Zagrabia, they joyned themselves with the Emperors forces, and marched the nineteenth day in good order to Sceline; where they expected the comming of County Serinus. The twentieth day Peter Herdelius with his Huffars, and the lord Stephen Graswein came into the campe, with many of those light horsemen whom the Hunga. rians called Vicocchi. The one and twentieth day they lodged at Gradium, fillexpecting the comming of the County Serinm, who otherwise busied, could not come. The next day after, a fouldier fent out from the belieged, came into the camp, who gave the captains to vaderfland, that except they made hafte that day to relieue the diffressed monastery, it would vedoubtedly be loft, for that the enemy had made it faultable, and would that night give the affault, and the defendants doubting how they should be able to maintaine the place, began before his departure thence to think of composition with the enemy. Vpon which news the captains forthwith began to confult among themselves, what course to take in so doubtful & dangerous a case: where Auersberg was of opinion, that it were best to march on, and to give the enemy battell; with whom also agreed the lord Rederen: the rest of the captains being of a contrary mind, for that the strength of the Christians compared to the Turks, was too weake; and therefore they thought it better in time to retire whiles they yet might, than to hazard wator most manifest perils the lives of so many valiant men, at so great ods. At which counsel duerfberg was at the first much moued, bur afterwards (as he was a man of great cloquence) plainely fet before them the necessity of the cause, & with lively reasons cheered up the fearfull Croatians; notably persuading them all in generall; to put their whole trust & confidence in God, to whom it was as case to give victory by few, as by many; and to fight like valiant men, for their religion, their country, their lives, their wives, their children and friends, and whatfoener elfe they held deare; against that cowardly enemy, whose valour neuer brought him into the field, but only the vaine trust he had in his multitude; and would therfore no doubt easily beput to flight, if he should contrary to his expectation find himself but a little hardly laid vnto. With these and other like reasons he prevailed so much, that they all yeelded to his opinion, & with I one consent resolued to go against the enemy, and to do what they might to relieve their befieged friends. So vpon a figne given, the whole army (in number nor aboue 4000) forthwith remoued, and with great speed hasted towards the enemy; and being come within mile of the camp, put themselves in order of battell. The Turks by their espials understanding of the approch of the Christians, brought all their horsmen over the river of Kulp, by a bridge which they had made, and having put themselves in order, came to joyne battell with the Chillians: who had in their vaunt gard placed the Croatians and Hussars, in the left wing themof Carolftat, and the Harquebufiers of Karnia; in the right wing the borderers, of Carainia, all A great battell horsemen, in the maine battell the rest of the soldiers, with the horsemen of Silesia, under the conduct of Sigifmund Paradife, the rereward was inclosed with three companies of the Empe M rors fouldiers. The Croatians and Huffars in the vantgard gave the first charge vpon the enemy: but having for a good spacemade a great fight, they were about to have retired, and difcouraged with the multitude of the enemies, were even upon the point to have fled when Aversberg (Generall of the Christian army) came on with his squadron, and not only restored

A. the battal but fo resolutely charged the main battell of the Turks, that the Bassa was constrainned at the first to retire, and afterwards to flyslatter whom all the rest of the army followed. The Christians still keeping their array, pursued them with great speed; and comming to the new made bridge before them, tooke from them that passage, to the great discomfiture of the Turks, who ficing the milerable laughter of themselves, and no way to escape, ran headlong some into the river Odera, some into Kulp, and were there for most part drowned, the rest were sign relieved all flaine by the Christians, before determined not to take any prisoners. In the meane time. the Turks that remained at the fiege, understanding of the overthrow of their fellows, set fire on their politier and other provision, and so in great scare besook themselves to slight. Whose cents the Christians immediatly after tooke, and in them nine great pieces of attillery, and good flore of great flior of 44 and 45 pound weight a piece, with the fumptuous paulifon of the Baffa, and much other rich spoile, which was all carried to the monastery of Sifeg. The number of the Turks flatne in this battell, and drowned in the rivers, is of divers diversly re- Eighteen these. ported, but most agreevpon eighteette thousand. And amongst them was Haffan Baffa him-fand Turker felfe, found in the river neere vnto the bridge known by his most rich and sumptuous apparell; and neere vnto him Mahomet-Beg, and Achmat-Beg. In other places were also found the dead bodics of Saffer-Beg, the Baffaes brother, of Meniben, Haramatan Beg, Chrit. Beg, Operd Beg, and Gafchus, the Baffa's chive counfellor, and mafter of his houshold. But of all others, the vntime-Indeath of Shown Beg, Amurath his pephew, his fifters only fonne, fent thither to have learned the feats of armes under affan the great Baffa, was of the Turks most lamented. Of twenty C thou fand Toules that came over the river Kulp, scarcely two thousand escaped. This so great a withors obtained all the army of the Christians went thrice about the Monastery, and every sime falling all-downe voon their knees, gaue vnto God most hearty thanks for the same, as by him miraculously given, and not by them selves won, and afterwards made all the shew of joy and gladnelle they could pollibly deuile.

Sifegethus delivered, and the Turks army overthrowne, the Christians with all foeed laied finge to Pettinia the firong new fort of the Turks, which they for the Ipace of five daies most furloufly battered; bufflearing that the great Gouernor of Gracia (whom the Turks call the Beglerbeg of Romania was with a great power comming to the reliefe of the fort, they raifed their fiege, brake vp their army, and returned every man to his wonted charge.

.....Whileft thele things were in doing at Petrinia a Poli cathe from Constantiacole to Buda, News of the who brought thither the first newes of the ouerthrow of Sifeg, for the report thereof was not outribrow of the Turkes at as yer come to Buda, wher fore the Baffa called into him the messenger, author of sobad news, sifes, brauths and diligently examined him of the truth thereof: who told him, that at his departure from 10 Bride. Confrantinople, nothing was there knowne of that loffe, but that upon the way as he came, he met with divers horsemen but lately escaped from the slaughter, who told him of a certainty, that the Baffa was flain, and his army destroicd. Wherunto the Baffa of Buda replied, That he was happy in his death, for that if he had by chance escaped, he should for his indifference undoubtedly have suffered some other more shamefull death at the court.

When newes of the aforesaid victory was brought to the Emperor at Prague, he comman-H ded publike prayers, with thank signing to almighty God to be made in all churches sand sent ameskinger with letters to Amurath, to know of him how he understood these insolent proceedings of his fouldiers, and especially this late expedition of the Bassa of Bosna and his complices, contrary to the league vet in force betwirt them. After which messenger he sent also the lord Popelins, with the yerely Present (or rather tribute), he vsed to send vnto the Turkish Emperorat Constantinople; yet with this charge that when he was come as far a Comara in the borders of Hungary, he should there stay untill the returne of the aforesaid messenger : who if he brought tidings of peace from Amurath, then to proceed on his journey to the Turkes Court; otherwise to returne againe with his Present: as he afterwards did. For Amurath entaged with the notable loffe received at Sifeg, and prickt forward with the teares and F prayers of his fifter (defirous of nothing more than to be reuenged for the death of her sonne) the seventh of August caused open war to be proclaimed against the Christian Emperor, both at Constantinople and Buda. The mannaging whereof he committed to Sinan Baffa the old enemy of the Christians, his Lieutenant Generall, and persuader of this war: who departing from Constantinople with an army of forty thousand, wherein were 5500 Ianizaries, was by

> Sinan with his army thus fetting forward, kept still on his way towards Buda, but the Beg. I lerbeg of Gracia with a farre greater power marched towards Croatia, as well to relieve the forts diffressed by the Christians, as againe to beliege the strong castle or monastery of Sileg: which he with his huge army at his first arrivall compassed about without resistance, & with continuall battery ouerthrew the wals thereof, giving no time of rest unto the defeadants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, & with reftleffe labour notably repaired the very fearfull women bringing tables, stooles, and what focuer els came to hand, that might any wife helpe to keepe the enemy out, of whom a great number was in the breaches fainhut what was that handfull against such a multitude? At length the 2 day of September the Turks by maine force entred the Monastery, and put to sword all the soldiers therein : among whom were 200 Germans, of whom the Turks cut some in pieces, and the rest they threw into the M river Kulp. One religious man there found among the rest, they did flea quicke in detestation of his profession, and afterward cutting him in small pieces, burnt them to ashes. So taking the spoyle of all that was there to be had; and leaving a frong garrison for the keeping of the place, they passed ouer Savus, burning the country before him, and carried away with them about a thousand poore Christians into perpetuall captivity. These invasions of the Turks caused the Emperor to craue aid both of the States of the Empire, and other forcine Princes further off: which was by some easily granted, but not so speedily performed.

About this time Peter syrnamed le Hussar (for that he commanded ouer those horsemen which the Hungarians call Huffars) captain of Pappa, by the appointment of Ferdinand county Hardeck Gouernour of Rab, lay in wait for the Turks Treasurer in Hungary, who had the command of 5000 Turks: him this Hungarian tooke at advantage, as he was mustering and paying certain companies of his foldiers, mistrusting no such danger, and desperally charging him flew him with diugrs of his men, and put the rest to flight, and so with the spoile and some few prisoners he returned againe to his castle, carrying with him the Treasurer.

Now Sinan the Generall being come with his army to Buda, refolued with himselfe to be. Sinan Buffe gin his wars in that part of Hungary, with the siege of Vesprinium. This Episcopall city was of the single of Vesprinium. by Selyman the great Turke taken from the Chaiftians in the yeare 1552, and againe by them recourred about foureteene yeares after, about the yeare 1 9 66; fince which time vntill now it had remained in the hands of the Christians, Sinan without delay marching with his army to Veforinium, compassed the city round, and encamping as he saw good, planted his battery. wherewith he continually thundered against the city. The Christians there in garrison casily perceiving that the city was not long to be holden against fo great a power, placed divers barrels of gunpouder in certain mines they had made vnder the wals and bulwarkes of the towne. with traines that should at a certaine time take fire. Which done they departed secretly our C of the city in the dead time of the night hoping foun the darke to have of caped the hand of the enemy, which they did not fo fecretly, but that they were by the Turks descried, and most of them flaine. Ferdinand Samaria. Gouernor of the city, after he had for a space valiantly defended himfelfe, fell at last into the enemies hand, and fo was taken alige, together with one Hofkirke a German captain. The Turks entered the city the figth of October, firiuing who should get first in for greedingsse of the prey, when suddenly the pouder in the mines tooke fire, and blowing up the very foundations of the wals and bulwarkes, flew a number of the Turks that were within the danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the city.

From Vesprinium the Bassa removed with his army to Palotta, and gave summons to the Palotta yeelded castle: but receiving such answer as pleased him not, he laied siege vnto it with all his power. D Which at the first Peter Ornand captaine of the castle cheerfully received: but being afterward without any great rause discouraged (the castle as yet being, but little shaken, & but one man flaine and the rest of the soldiers ready to spend their lives in defence thereof) he sent vnto the Baffa offering to yeeld the castle vnto him, so that he with his souldiers might with bag and baggage in fafety depart. Of which his offer the Baffa accepted, and granted his request. But be was no fooner come out of the castle with his souldiers, and ready to depart, but the faithleffe Turke contrary to his oath and promife caused them all to be cruelly flaine, except only the captaine and two other. After that, the Baffa without any great labor tooke in all the country thereabouts neere vnto the lake of Balaton.

Now at last, though long first, about the middle of October the Christians began to muster H their army, in number about 18000, all good and expert fouldiers; with which power they shortly after passing ouer Danubius, at the first encounter with the Turkes, put them to the worle, flew a great number of them, and referred number of poore Christian captines.

In the later end of this month, county Hardeck Governor of Rab, and Generall of the Chri- Alba Regalia stian army in that part of Hungary, departing from Comara with all his power, came and laid before dry the fiege to the firong city of Alba Regalis, which by the force of his artillery he in short time made faultable; but in affaulting the breaches, was by the Turks there in garrifon notably repulsed. So having made sufficient proof both of the strength & courage of the defendants, and perceiving no good could be done without a long fiege, for which he was not as then provided; after confultation had with the rest of his captaines, he resolued to raise his siege: which he did the fecond of November removing that day but halfe a mile from the city, because he would be fure of all his army. But as he was about the next day to remoue, news was brought him by his espials, that the enemies power was at hand, and even now almost in fight: which proved to be so indeed. For the Bassa of Buda by the commandement of Sinan Bassa the Generall, was come forth with thirteene Sanzacks, and twenty thousand souldiers, thirty field pieces, and fine hundred waggons laded with victual! and other warlike provision, to raise the fiege, and to relieue the city; and was now even at hand, comming directly upon the Christia ans: whereupon the county, affilted by the county Serinus, the lord Palfi, the lord Nadafi, Peter le Huffar, and other valiant captains of great experience, with wonderfull celerity put his stmv in order of battell, and so couragiously set forward to encounter the enemy. The Baffa feeing the Christians marching towards him, tooke the advantage of the higher ground, and from thence discharged his field pieces upon them, which mounted too high, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Christians for all that defirous of battell, & nothing regarding the disaduantage of the ground, but calling vpon the name of the Almighty, mounted the hall and iovning battell with the Turks; by plaine force conftrained them to fly. In this army of the Turks, being for most part horsemen, were about fine thousand foot, and many of them land, w zaries, who in flying oftentimes made stands, and wounded many, and yet neuertholesse were almost all there slaine, with many others : among st whom were three great men, the Santache of Strigonium, Setchine, and Nouigrade; feuen Chiaus, & many other men of mark the mode valiant captains of the Turks borderers. The lord Nadalle with some others taking view of the Turks that were flaine and loft in this battellideemed them to have bin at the leaft in minber eight thousand : few prisoners were laued, all being put to the sword which caused singering liveare by his Mahomet neuer more to spare any Christian, All the Turks artillery, wagons, and prouision became a prey vnto the Christians many ensignes were there found, and weapons of areat value. It is hardly to be believed how much this victory encouraged the Christians. and daunted the Turks, VV herupon the county, with great joy brought backe his army to Ali 1) ba Regalis, and engamped necrethe bulwarke called Stopach, where the Turks mor learned to be affaulted Palfi, Nadafi, and forder others earned by perfuaded with the county, no to depart from the city before he had would but he confidering the hard time of the yere, the freshell of the city (which was now full of fouldiers, by reason of them that were fled in thither from the late ouerthrow) with the want of things necessary in the army to maintaine a longer sieges and fearing also after long lying to be enforced with dishonour to forsake it, would not hear ken to their perfusions, but calling a connell refolued to raife his fieze, and to content him. felfe with the victory he had already notten, which was afterward implited unto him formore than an overfight. So feeting fire whom the faburbs of the city, he rife with his army and dea parted thence the fifth of Nouember, and returned to Rab.

Teuffenbach.

Not long after, Christopher Lord g'enffenbach, the Emperous lieutenant in the upper part of Hungary, who lay encamped at Callouist with his army of foureteene thousand souldiers removed thence, and marching along the country two daies, came and laid fiege to Sabatzka, one of the Turks strongest castles in those quarters our of which they vsually did much harm among the Christians. This castle Teuffenbach battered in three places, and having at length made it faultable, tooke it by force the nineteenth of November, and par to the fword all the Turkes there in garrison, in number about two hundred and fifty, and in stead of them left a strong garrison of his owne: whereby all the Country thereabouts was restored to great quietnesse.

Tilek befieged by the Christi.

Sabatzka thus taken, the Christian Generall removed with all speed to Filek a strong city of the higher Hungary, which Solyman the Turkish Emperor tooke from the Christians in the yere 15 60, and placed therein a Sanzacke, vnder the command of the Baffa of Budar. The Generall incamping before this city, the next day after planted his battery, and in most terrible manner without intermission thundered against the wals and gates of the city. The Samacke Gouernour thereof, confidering the power of the Christians, got out secretly by night, with & few fouldiers, to acquaint the other Turkish Sanzackes his neighbours with the comming of the Christians, and the number of their army; and further to consult with them, how the city might be relieued. The Bassa of Temeswate, with the Sanzacks of Giula, Hadwan, Scanttzag, and Scirme, vndertooke the matter: and thereupon the Bassa sent for eight hundred lanizaries, of late left by Sinan Baffa in garrifon at Buda and Alba-Regalis; who all fathy refu- M fed to goe to this service; saying, That they would not be led as beasts to the slaughter, as were their fellows but a little before at Alba-Regalis; Neuerthelesse they enforced the Armenians, whom Sinan and his fon had brought thither, to go; but of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Scamboth, were fent only fifteene hundred common fouldiers. For all that, the Baffa with the Sanzackes his followers, firme in their former resolution for the reliefe of the diffressed city, having made great preparation, and raised an army of 18000 strong, with many field pieces, by night drew neere vnto Filek, and staied within two miles of the city. Bur the Generall of the Christians, with Stephen Bather and the other captaines, understanding of their comming, with 7000 good fouldiers chosen out of the whole army, went out prefently against them, and the one and twentieth of November fuddenly affailing them in their rents, overthrew them and put them all to flight, whom the Christians flercely pursued with a most rerrible execution. In this fight and flight there were flaine 6000 Turks, and but few or none taken. The Baffa himfelf, with the Sanzacke of Filek, and many others of great name, were found among fithe bodies of the flaine Turks. This victory gained with little or no loffe yeelded yn-B to the Christians a rich prey, many gorgeous tents and faire enfignes, much cattel, and 20 field pieces, with 200 waggons laded with victuall and other prouision; all which they carried into the campe at Filek, and fo more treitly befreged the city than before. The fame day the Lord Palfi and Martin Lalla came to the eampe with fix thouland fouldiers; and forthwith three Trumpeters were fent to them of the city, That if without further refishence they would forthwith yeeld the city, they should have leave in fascry to depart with life and goods, although the Tuks had of late in like cafe broken their faith with the Christians at Palotta: but if they refused his grace, and would needs hold it out to the ettermost; then to denounce ento them ass extremities. For all this the Turks wetting difinated, refused to yeeld : whereupon the battery began afresh, and in more terrible manner than before, so that though the City was most C. frongly fortified both with well and rampiers, yet had the Christians in three dates foace with continual battery made a faire breath into it, whereby they in despight of the entray ent. File taken by tred without any notable loffe the foure and eventieth of November, ranfacked the effer, and the christians. burnt a great part thereof. The fame day they also tooke the vttermost castle wherein the Sanzacks palace food. This caftle ftanderh upon a very high hill, ftrengthened both by art and nature, and had in it a frong garrifon of valiant foldiers, who spared not lustily to bestow their thot among it their enemies of whom they flew a great number. Neuertheleffe the Christians after they had for the force of two daies and two nights with a most furious battery shaken the walls, by plaine for eventred the walle the 29 of November, and put to fword all the gatrifon fouldiers, except furtists had in good time forfaken this cafele, and rerifed themfelues inp to another more inward. Who being in number eight hundred with their wives and children, without hope of reliefe, and feeing the cannon now bent upon them, fet out a white enfigne in token of parly; which granted, it was agreed that they frould depart with life, and fo much of their goods as every one of them could earry! Vpon which agreement the caffle was yeelded the eight and twentieth day of November, and the Turks with a fafe convoy brought vinto the place they defired. In this castle was found a great booty, many pieces of artillery, and much other warlike proution, but of victuals small store. The Generall with the rest of the Captaines entring the caftle, fell downe upon their knees, and with their hearts and hands cast up to heaven, thanked God for their victory, and for the recovery of that strong city; but especially for the delinery of so many Christians out of the Turkish thraldome for it is re-E ported, that there were about eight hundred country villages subject to the jurisdiction of Filek, the poore inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkish seruitude, by the taking of this only city. The Christians forthwith repaired the wals, bulwarkes and trenches, and frongly fortified enery place against the enemy and so leaving a sufficient garrison in the city and caffles, departed with their army, now in number about twenty thousand, towards Sodoch, fix miles from Filek. But as they were voon the way, newes was brought vnto the Generall, how that the Turks had for feare abandoned the castles of Dijwin and Somoske: whereupon he fent out certaine companies of foldiers to take in both those places who comming thither found them indeed for faken by the enemy, but yet many pieces of artillery and other warlike provision there still lest.

In the later end of November the Generall marched with his army towards Setichine, a nefteine, and frong towne in the Dioceffe of Agria; but the Turks in that place had two or three daies be. Sallet abandofore prepared themselves to fly, and sent their wives, their children, and the best of their substance, some to Hatwan, some to Buda; and now hearing of the approach of the Christian Army, fet fire on the towne and fled. The Christians immediatly entring did what they could to quench the fire, and faued a great part of the Towner fo leaving there a convenient garring fon he hafted with speed to Blauestein, which the Turks did also set on fire, and betooke them. felues to flight. The Christians comming this her the next day after, namely, the fourth of December, found a great part of, the towne yet ynburnt, wherein they left a firong garrifon, and from thence marched to Sallek, which towns they allorooke, being forfaken by theens. my, and put thereinto a good garrison. The Generall was of nothing more delicout, then to haue profecuted this fo happy a course of victory : but such was the foulenesse of the Wines weather, that he could not trauell with his great artillery, without which no great matter was to be done against the enemy, still keeping himselse in his strong bold. And his Army in the wasted and for faken country began now to feelethe want of victuals; so that many had with. drawne themselves out of the army, vnto their dwelling places.

At the same time also the Lord Palfi going to Dregel and Palanka, and finding them for fine ken by the enemy, furnished both places with garrisons of his owne men. Certaine other firong places were also this moneth recovered from the Turks as Ainacke, Sollocke, Wellte and others, and fo much territory, gained by the Christians, as was in circuit thought consti with the lower Austria. The joyfull newes of the aforesaid victories, with the recovery of fer much of the country, and fo many firong towns and oaftles, made great rejoycing both at Vitenna and Prague : for which capfo publike praiers with thankelgining, to Almighty God were made in both places, with many other tokens of joy & triumph both there and indiversemen places of the Empire. In Austria also a new atmy wastailed, and two and twenty great pieces of artillery sent down the river of Danubius to Comara, and L new preparation made in every place for the next yeares wars. Amurath the Turkish Emperor going out of the city of Constantinople the 11 of lanuary to muster the army he had prepared against the Christians for this yere, was suddenly outsited ken with fuch a tempeft of wind and raino, that it ouesthrew his tente, his chariots, yea, his horfes and men had much ado to with fland it. It fortuned that about this time a foldier of the Turks taken not far from Dregalise brought into the campe; among other things whereof he was examined, confessed that in Nouigrade (a firing towns and of great importance, but one mile diffant from Vacia, and thase from Buda) was left but a weake garrifon of about eight hundred foldiers, who there liked in great feare to be belieged and that the Turks doubting fuch a matter, had brought thither much promision for the better fortifying of the towne. Voon which intelligence the Christians began to remoue with their army, and being come betwirt Dregel and Nouigrade, understood P by the country people, that it was true that the Turke had reported : wherefore they refolued that night to lay fiege vnto the towne. So forthwith some were sent to Dregel, to fetch thence certaine pieces of Artillery, whom certaine troups of German horsemen went to meet: who vsed such diligence, that the eight of March a little before the rising of the Sun, the whole army with the great ordnance was come before Nouigrade. The keeping of this towne was by the Archduke committed to the Lord Rebeia nobleman of Hun gary and kinfman to Palfi, with a firong garrifon and certaine troups of Huffars. The Sanzacke of Nouigrade, after he had loft the towner comming to Buda was prefently

A apprehended by the Baffa, and laid in prifon : who although he excused himselfe, by alledging that the towne was not possibly to be holden with so small a garison against so great a power, and that if any fault were, it was to be imputed to them of Buda, for not fending reliefe in The sangely time, and therefore appealed to the further hearing of Amurath himselfe: yet all scrued him baneed as BB. not, but was by the Bassacs commandement in the night hanged upon a tree neere unto the de. gate of the city, and afterwards cut in pieces.

Whilst these things were in doing the Emperor sent his Embassadors to the great Duke of Muscouia, the King of Polonia, and the Prince of Transyluania, to proue how they stood affected towards those his wars against the Turke, and what aid he might procure from them. Into Muscouie was sent one Warkutch a gentleman of Silesia; who cumming to Musco, found in that Court the Embassadors of the Tartar, the Turke, the Persian, the Polonian, and the Dane. Of all these, the Embassadors of the Tartar and the Turke could have no audience, but were with contumelious words rejected as miscreants. The Emperours Embassador was honorably entertained, and after the manner of that countrey, a large proportion of wine, mede. aquavitæ, flesh, fish, and sowle of fundry forts allowed him dayly all the time of his abode. At length having audience, he declared vnto the great Duke the cause of his comming, and in the name of his Master requested his aid against the Turke. Whereunto the Duke answered, That he would give the Emperor towards the maintenance of his wars against the common enemy. 500000 duckats, and allow him yearely 400000 during the time of that war; requesting him not to make any peace with the Turke, and promifed to fend him aid also of men in this war. C. if he should so need. The Persian Embassador also honorably feasted the Emperors Embassador, and had with him great conferance concereing the wars of the Christians with the Turks. and in his mafters name promifed the continuation of his wars against the Turke, so that the Emperor would likewife promife not to have any league with him, fo to give him leifure to turne all his forces againe into Persia, This Embassador after he had almost foure months tarried in Muscouia returned to the Emperor. At which time D' Wacker the Emperors Embas. fador into Polonia, returned also with joyfull newes, how that the Polonians with an army of eight and twenty thousand had stopped the passage of an hundred thousand Tartars whom the Turke had fent for against the Emperour, and that if he needed, he should be aided with the Polonian Cossacks: but vnto the rest of his requests he could have no answer of the States D of that Kingdome, for that the King was then absent in Sweden; and was therefore referred to be further answered at his returne.

At the same time, County Serina with three hundred Harquebusiers and certain troups of certain castles horsemen, and the footmen of Stiria and the countries thereabouts, assembling to the number of the Turkes of ten thousand, departed from Canissa, to besiege Bresenza a castle of the Turkes. But they ders of Stiria understanding before of his comming, conucied away the best of their substance, and setting sating by the the castle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The Earle comming thither, tooke the forfaken caffle, and put therein a garrifon of his owne fouldiers. In like manner he tooke also Sigesta for saken of the Turks, where he also placed a garrison of the Christians. And so going on to Babostcha, besieged it, which castle although it was strongly scituated in B a marith, and could not easily have beene woon, was for all that, for seare abandoned by the Turks, and so taken by the County: by recourry of which places, there was a safe and casie way laid open euen to Ziget, the Bassa whereof stood in no small doubt to have bin euen then

Amurath intending by all meanes he could to vex the Emperor, had determined to fend his fleet into the Adriatique to be siege Zegna a city of the Emperors scituate upon the sea coast, in the bay Quernero, called in antient time Flanaticus Sinus. Which the better to effe & he fent one of his Chiaus Embassador to the Venetians, to request them, That his fleet might by their leave passe alongst the Adriaticke, and have the vse of their ports and harbours, as need should require. Which his request the Venetians hearing, refused in any case to yeeld there-P unto : fearing (and not without cause) the vnfaithfulnesse and treachery of the Turkes, whose oathes and promifes are no longer strong or by them regarded, than standeth with their owne good and profit: neuerthelesse they most honourably vsed the Embassador, and so fear him away without obtaining of that he was especially sent for.

In the vpper part of Hungary Christopher Lord Teuffenbach the Archdukes Lieutenantha. G Halwan bester using gathered an army of twenty thousand foldiers, the sixteenth of Aprill laied siegeto Har. wan a strong towne six miles from Buda, fortified with a triple ditch and bulwarker of exceeding ftrength. Against which although the Christians could not do much either by minesor mounts, (by reason it was so inuironed with water) yet they so shurvy all the passages there. unto, that nothing could be brought or carried in or out of the town. They of the town feeing. themselves thus blockt vp,by secret messengers certified the Bassa of Buda in what case they thood, praying of him aid : who with 10000 chofen foldiers; which he had then in readinesse. and the Sanzacks of Sirnah, Giula, Lippa, Lerwoge, and Tichangrade, with 5000 moe, forthwith fet forward toward Hatwan to raife the fiege: and the last of Aprill being come within fight of the Christian army, about one of the clocke in the afternoone encamped on the fide of the river Sagijwa: but when he could not or els durst not, for the deepenesse of the way, the abundance of water and neerenesse of the enemy, aduenture to passe the river, he retyied back againe to passe ouer at Iasperin (otherwise called Iasprin) where the river was joyned with a bridge, and not far off a good foord alfo to paffe ouer at; thinking fo to have come you the backs of the Christians, and with more safety have relieved the besieged towne. But Traffer. bach perceiving his purpose, forthwith after his departure passed the river with much difficulty, and ouertaking him with his army the next day, being the first of May, about one of the clocke in the afternoone, betweene Zarcha, and Fuscasalua, with his great ordnance disordered the rereward of the enemies battell; and comming on couragiously with his whole anne began a most cruell fight : which the Turks a great while endured with wonderfull resolution but now destitute of their wonted multitude (their greatest confidence) and hardly laid unto by the Christians, they in the end turned their backes and fled; whom fix thousand Hungarie ans and Germans fiercely pursued, and had the killing of them almost to Buda. In this bat. tell the Christians tooke all the enemies great Ordnance, with seventeene ensignes, and also the caltle of Iasperin, which the Turks had for scare abandoned wherein was found good flore of victuals, certaine great pieces, with much other warlike provision. Of this so notable a victory Teuffenbach by Letters presently advertised the Archduke, after he was againe returned to the fiege of Hatwan. Which Letters because they containe many particularities and circumstances of this battell, I have thought it not amisse here to insert.

Although (Said he) I have by a speedy messenger upon the very Kalends of May certified your Excelleters of the L. lency of the notable victory which God of his great goodnesse gane unto us the same day oner our bireds. Matthias the tary enemy: get afterward upon diligent inquisition we under stood many particularities, as well of the cape Archdute, Ge. times themselves, as of the inhabitants about Zolnocke Pesth, and Buda; whereof I thought good to aduct. needing to comment tife you. The Captines them Clues confesse, That the Bassa of Buda, with the Sanzackes of Zolnbike, Zara wack, Ginla, and Tschangrad, Cippaio, Genne, and others, had with ereat celerity raised an army of 13000 Coldiers, among t whom were many Tartars, with purpose to have relieved the besieged Towns of Hawan, and upon the sudden to have oppressed us in our tents. Filled with which hope, they in great haste came with all their power the last of Aprill towards Hatman but for a smuch as they could not passe over the riner Zagowa by reason of the height of the water they were the next day being the first of May conducted 1 by the Captaine of Iasperinto a more commodious passage, so to come the neerer vinto ws, and the next day in the morning to have surprised vs in our tents. But our most merelfull God hath ancreed this jogiest's mischiefe from us, and turned it upon their own heads. For as it is most constantly reported from Zolmeckes Pefth and Buda, and confirmed by the Inhabitants of the fame places, there are 2500 of the Tarks flainen and as many wounded, of whom many perished, and are found dead woon the high wayes leading to Pel and Zolnocke : of thefe we have fent a thousand heads to Cassonia, and caused main of the Turks to be but ried for feare of infection in this fo great heate. Verily it was abloudy battell; for hat the old Smildlers (4), they have not remembred or feens the Tarks (we moe in number) to have flood fo long in battely and to have so fought it out without flying. Many men of great name and place there perflied and fell, among it whom are redeemed the Sanzackes of Pefth, Nanigrade, and Temeske; Genne Claving, M Bogfte, Aluftafa, Marielaus, and certaine Chiam lately fent from the Court; with the Baffathis guard wherein were eight hundred right valiant fouldiers, of whom for efcaped with life. Many fell this would have yeelded great ransome; but it was agreed upon betweenashe Germanes and the Hungarian, not

A to page any of the enemies, but to put them all to the sword; and that who seemer did otherwise, it should be imputed unto bim for dishonor. So that more than fixteen common soldiers, none were taken prisoners of whom we might bearn how things went among St the Turks, with other circumstances of the battell. Wee tookt histeen field pieces, whereof four were greater than the reft, which they called Organs, and 24 of the enemies Enlines. The Balla of Buda beside other three wounds by him received, was grienoully wounded in the lider Of our men were lost about a handred, and many of them most expert souldiers; and about fix hundred others eviewonly wounded of whom there is small hope many of them beeing already dead. Neishere the lolle finall we have received in our borfes and armor; for there are few among st the Germane hor finen, which have not loft one, two or three of their horfes or feruants, whereby our horfemen are wanderfully weakned. Tet was the victory great, to God be the praise, to him be the glory and thankes there-B fore. Let us in the mean time prosecute the siege begun. The last night I commaunded the water to be drawn another way, fo that now our trenches may be advanced many paces, and bulwarks raised within two hundred paces of the wall. We have already planted five oreat pieces of artillery in one bulwark, and hope the next night to place fine moe upon a mount fast by and will do what shall be needfull for a street siege : and when time shall serve, undertake the town with all our power . God grant us thering oud successe and victory.

Whilst this valiant captain the Lord Tenffenbach thus lay at the siege of Hatwan, Mathias Strigonium bethe Archduke General of the Christian Army in Hungary, incouraged with the good succes sized by the he had at Novigrad, came with his Army, being 44000 ftrong, before Strigonium (fometime the metropolitical city of Hungary, but now of long a fure receptacle of the Turks) and the fixt of May incamped his Army about a quarter of a mile from the Castle, in a most pleasant medow, from whence both the city and the castle were plainely to be seene. Vpon whom the Turks out of the caftle, and three gallies that lay vpon the river, discharged certain great pieces without any great harm doing. But after the Christian fleet was a little before night come down the river, and with their great ordnance began to answer them again, the enemy ceased shooting, and lay fill that night. In the mean time it fortuned, that a Turkish youth taken in 1) a garden there by, and brought into the camp and examined, confessed that there was no garrifon in the city more than four hundred Ianizaries, and that a new supply was daily expected from Buda. The Christians laboring that night, were by the breake of day come with their trenches to a hil ouer against the castle, where they placed their battery, and forthwith began to batter the city. The fame day (being the feuenth of May) two and twenty Turkes heads were presented to the Archduke, and four men taken aliue, newly sent out of the city to have viewed the Christian camp. About night certain balls of wilde-fire were shot into the City, wherof one fel vpon the tower called S. Adelbert, and fet it on fire; wherwith first the church. and afterward a great part of the town fel on fire. The Sanzacks house, with all his horses and armor, and a great quantity of pouder was then burnt, and inestimable hurt done in the City. E The next day the Christians had with continual battery made a breach in the castle wall:but adjoining vnto the wall was a high and broad fandy tampier, which could hardly be battered: for all that the Germans gaue a fierce affault to the breach, hoping to have entred by the ruines of the wall: but not being able to get over the fandy rampier, were inforced with loffe to retyre. The day following they began again the battery with eighteen great pieces: When about eight of clock in the morning the Rascians that were in the old city gaue the General to vnderstand, That if he would at a place by them appointed, assault the greater city, to draw the Turks thither, they would in the mean time deliver vnto the Christians certain little poflerns, and receive them into the old city; voon condition that no violence should bee done vnto them or theirs. Which being so agreed upon, the Christians accordingly gaue the af- The Christians fault the eleventh of May in the evening, and by the help of the Rascians took the city : who recour the old according to promife were al taken to mercy, and the Turks flain, except fuch as by good hap sily.

Thus was the old city of Strigonium gained by the Christians, the suburbs where sthey grefently burnt; neuertheleffe the new town with the castle was still holden by the Turks, Wilson fore the Christians having cast vp certain trenches and mounts, and placed their assistance as they thought most convenient, began again to batter the cast legated after they had by the large of the cannon made it faultable, with great courage affailed the breach, which the Turksea. liantly defended, fo that the Christians were glad to retire, leaving behind them about up of their fellows, flain in the breach. The Turks a little before the Christians comming had fortified an hil, wherunto the castle was somewhat subject, called of the Christian S. Riester his hil. This hil fo fortified, the Christians with continual battery, and assault gained the 17 of May, and put all the Turks left alive therin to the fword and turning the ordnance, from thence also battered the castle. The 22 of May a little before Sun fee, certain enfignes of foot 18 were drawn out of the Campe, to have the next day affaulted the lower town, who taking the benefit of the night, attempting to have entred the towne in the dead time of the night, was notably incountred by the Turks fallying out of the town vpon them. The Christians for all that having inforced them to retyre, profecuted their former resolution, and with much nice got ouer the vtmost wall:but finding there contrary to their expectation such a deep & broad countermure as was not possible to be passed, they stood as men dismaid, neither could they in the darknes of the night wel fee to get back again ouer the town ditch, bur diforder retiring, fluck fast many of them in the deep mud, and there perished. In this affault there were about 1000 of the Christians wounded and slain: and albeit that they twice or thrice retuel the affault, yet preuailed they nothing, but were fall repulfed with loffe. Many alford the I Turks garrison were slain, and the Sanzacke himselse hurt with a great shor, and many other wounded men sent down the river to Buda, brought thither true news of the afosefaid affailte and of the state of the besieged.

the Turks.

In the mean time news was brought to the Campe, That Sinan, Baffa the oldenemy of the The Rasciant Christians, and the Turks great Licutenant, comming towards Hungary with a great Army, and having by boats conveyed over part therof, was fet youn by the Rascians (these are poore oppressed Christians dwelling on both sides of Danubius, who weary of the Turkish thraldom, and defirous of their antient liberty, have often taken up arms against the Turks, as they now did, incouraged by the good fuccesse of the Christians on the other side of Hungary and that after divers skirmifhes they had taken thirteen of the Turkes veffels, wherein belides I victuals and certain great pieces of Artillery, they found about 2400 weight of pouder, 447 hundred of lead, 46454 bundles of match, 1200 great shot, whereof 1005 were of 66 pound weight; and of small shot for harquebusiers 48500, with much other warlike provision; a great part wherof was brought into the Camp at Strigonium, and the rest reserved to summe vies. This losse so troubled the great Bassa, that he altered his purpose before intended for Caffovia.

The fourth of Iune, about fine hundred Turks sent up the river of Buda, conducted by two Sanzacks under two red and white enfignes, landed neer to Gokara on the farther fide of Danubius ouer against Strigopium; where after they had a while refreshed themselves and left fome few for the more affurance of the place, all the rest were conveyed over the river into ! Strigonium; where they had bin long looked for, the old garrifon being now foreweakened by the former assaults. Four daies after, the Turkes incouraged with this supply, fallied out vpon the sudden, and had entred one of the forts of the Christians, but were forthwith againe repulled, having loft fix and twenty of their men, and two of their enfignes. Not far off lay & troup of horsemen, if they had in time come in not one of the Turkes had escaped. Long it were to tell, how often and in what manner the Christians assaulted this city, but were by the Turks foreceived, that in five affaults they lost five thousand of their men; amongst whome were divers Captains, Lieutenants, Antients, and others of good account: twenty three Capnoniers were also slain, and ten great pieces of Artillery so spoiled, as that they were no more feruiceable. The garrison of this city confisted for most part of the Ianizaries (the Turks best M foldiers) whose notable valor in holding out of this siege, was both of their owne people and their enemies much commended. What soeuer was beaten down by day, that they against epaired by night, and still relieued with victual and things necessary from Buda, did what was

A possible to be don for defence of the City. About the same time certain Turks chancing voor a troup of German horsmen, in fight slew about fifty of them, and put the rest to flight; wherupon an alarm being raifed in the Campe, many ran out to the refcue of their fellowes, taking with them certain small field pieces. Which the Turks perceiuing, began to fly; whome the Christians eagerly pursuing, were suddenly assailed by other Turks fallying out of a fort fast by, and inforced shamefully to retyre, and to leave their field pieces behinde them. Which the Turks feifing vpon, cloyed them, brake their Carriages, and made them altogether unferuiceable.

All this while the Lord Teuffenback lying at the siege of Flatwan, about this time requefted aid of the Archduke, for that his power was with often conflicts, hunger, and other diffi-R culties alwaies attending long sieges, so much weakened, as that hee had scarsly 6000 found The Archdule men in his camp. Amurath disdaining to see the frontiers of his empire in so, many places impugned by the Christians and daily to receive from them so great harmes, sought by all meanes to be revenged. Wherfore beside the great power of his own which he was now about to send with Sinan Balla into Hungary, he had also procured from the great Tartar a wonderful number of those rough & fauage people to be fent into Hungary, there to join with his army. These wild neople to the number of 70000, according to direction given, breaking into Podolia, Valachia, and Moldauia, gathered together an incredible number of oxen and Kinesto this end & our-C purpose, that driving them before them, they might both be assured of victuals, and the lafer gravel thotow a part of Polonia. But when they were come vnto the borders of that country. and there found the power of Samoschie the great Chancellor and the Polonian Coffackes in arms, they easily perceived that they could not that way passe without great losse. Wherfore they placed the aforefaid herds of cattel, some before some behinde, and some on each side of the army, and so inclosed round about with those Cattell as with a trench, marched on. But when they were come neer vnto the Polonians, this rude device ferued them to no other ourpose than the ouerthrow of themselves for the Polonians discharging their great Ordnance, fo terrified the Cattel that they turned upon the Tartars, 80 overthrowing whom focuer came in their way, did exceeding much harm. These things thus don, the castle and the lower town were in fine divers places, out of the new built fort; the old town, and the I fland, fo battered with continual shot, that a man would haue faid that one stone should not haue bin left woon another, but that all should have been beaten down and layd euen with the ground. The fort newly built, vpon the banke of Danubius much troubled the belieged Turkeria Strigonium, because nothing gould without danger of it be sent up the river soft beirreliefe. But whilft the thundring thou was thus flotion to & fio toward the river, they of the townfallying out, affaulted the fort on the other fide toward the land, and that with fach desperas resolution, that some of them were not you the sop of the rampiers; and there for the fpage of two hours maintained a most true leicht, whethemmy de them were flain and wounded, and the rest inforced with shame to retyre,

This vnexpected departure of the Christians much gladded the befieged Turks, who for want of victuals had not bin long able to hold out. Yet lay the Lord Teuffenbach still before Hatwan, labouring by all means to take from the befieged Turks their water, and with earth and fagots to fill up their ditches: which work he had now haply brought to some good perfection. Wherof they of the town by letters advertised the Bassa of Buda, and that vales they were within three daies relieued, they should be inforced to yeeld the towne. Which their distresse the Basia coefidering, with speed assembled as his forces, and so set forward to relieue them, hoping to have come upon the Christians before they were aware of his comming. Now was there no leffe expectation and hope of the winning and yeelding up of Hatwan, Halman in than was before of Strigonium. But according to the chance of war it fell out otherwife: for by the Griffi-Tenffenbach having with continual batterie layd the breaches faire open, and made choice of ans.

After which so happy succes they sentente the Archduke Matthias for aid, but especially Cannoniers, professing themselves now recer finemics to the Turks. The Rascians also about Temesware sent word vnto the other in the camp, That they would come and join with them. And they which inhabit the countrey between Danubius and Tibiscus, by messengers sent of purpose vnto the Lord Teuffenback sthe Arch. And to the such Duke himselfe also they sent trusty messengers, requesting him to send them a Generall to lead them, promising vnto him all obedience. Which messengers departing from them the fourteenth of Iune, shortly after returned with such answer as was thought most commentent for their present estate. Dotis and S. Martins thus taken, Sinan Baffa constant in his former determination, set forward again towards Rab, and being come within a mile of the city, there incamped the Chriflian army then lying not far off on the other fide of the river. The city of Rab is a strong and populous city, honored with a bishops see, and was worthily accounted the strongest bulwark of Vienna, from whence it is distant about 12 German miles, standing voon the South side of Danubius, whence the river dividing it felf, maketh a most fettile Island called Schut; in the East point wherof stands the strong City of Comara. The defence of this City of Rab was committed to County Hardeck, a man of greater courage than fidelity, with a garifon of 1200 choice foldiers: yntowhom a little before the comming of the Baffa, were certaine Companies of Italians joined, who together with the citifens made up the number of 5000 able men: C a strength in all mens judgment sufficient for the long defence of that place. The last of lulv Matthia the Archduke about Sun-fet departing out of the city of Rab, ouer the river into the Island over against it came Sinan Ralla with his hugy army and beset it round, casting up trenches and mounts, wherein he skilfully placed his gabions and great artillery, and what foeuer els was necessary for so great a siege , and that with such celerity, as was unto the beholders shought most strange. The second of August howith great fury battered the city, & brought his trenches within musken shor of the wall. At which time 4000 Tartarian horsemen swam ouer the Danubius between Rab and Comara fafter whom followed 6000 Turks, who being with much ado got oper to the farther fide, fuddenly furprised a fort of the Christians next vnro the river, and forthwich turning flue great pieces of ordnance which they found therein. discharged them upon the camp of the Christians; who terrified with the sudden accident. rifeyp all in arms, and hardly charging those desperate adventurers, slew many of them, especially fuch as feeking after booty, had dispersed themselves from their fellowes, and forced the rest again to rake the water, wher in most of them perished. The rest casting away their weapons, and for faking their horses, ranne headlong into the river, trusting more to their swimming than to their fighting whom the Christians hardly pursuing, in the very River flew about two thousand of them; and by this victoric obtained many of the Tar-E tasians swift horses, with their scimiters, their bows and arrows, and such ensignes as they had. All this while Sinan Balli without intermission laysthundering with fixty great pieces of battery s but to liante or imali purpose, for anyet he had made no breach wherby to enter, but the harm that was done was upon the Towers or highbuilt houses, or in the Campe, by such randome Shoras flying over the Towner, fell by chante among fi the Tents of the Christians. And the lanizaries intensine to all opportunities in a great raine furiously and with a most borsible cry (as their manner is) affaulted an vicet bulwarke of the Christians which they for fear forfooke, and retyred themselves into the City. The 15 of August certaine Turkes before the rising of the Sun getting ouer Danubius in boats, affailed a fort of the Christians, which the soldiers that had the keeping of it presently for fook, and left it to the enemy. Which Iohn de Medices, lately come into the camp with two thousand Italians, perceiving, forthwith came to the rescue of the fort, draue out the Turket. and having flaine divers of them, forced the rest into the river, where they were all drowned. At which time 5000 Tartars in another place passing ouer the river into the Island, werethcountred by the Lord Palfi & the Hussars his followers, & without any great resistance putto flight, wherin many of them were flain. The rest taking the river, were in good hope to have got ouer, and so to have faued themselves: but other Turks meeting them in the river, would the with their weapons have beaten them back and staid their flight; against whom the Tattare opposing themselves, made with them in the very river a most cruel fight, but with such foffe vnto the Tartars, that of the 5000 which aduentured ouer, few returned vnto their fellowers carry news how they had sped. Now began great scarsity of victuals in the Turks Campe, so that the foldiers were fain to feed vpon vnripe fruit, and fuch other vnwholfom things, wheref infued the bloudy flix and many other dangerous difeafes; which raging amongfithem did wonderfully confume the Bassa's army. The Tartars not yet warned by their often loffes, but paffing again ouer the river into the Island the 10 of this month, were there 3000 of them flain. In which burly burly other of the Tartars approver the fluer net fare from Comara hoping now at length to perform some great matter which they had before to their cost vainly attempted. Yet the Christians not discouraged with this losse, but gathering themselves together under the very wals of the city, gaue a fecond affault vnto the enemy. In the foreward were the footmen, who were by the enemies horfemen eafily repulfed thut by the comming in of the Lord Rhinsberg (who was at the first onset slaine) the Turks were enforced into their trenches, except some few, which divided from the rest, hid themselves in the Vinevards but being found out by the Christians, were there all slaine. In this skirmish the Lord Palsi was B griewoully wounded in his thigh: of the Christians were slain 400, and of the Turkes about 2000. Their conflicts indured from 7 a clock in the morning, vntill i2 , at which time the accounts to Christians returning into the city, and so into the camp, among other spoils caried away with flam, and in them 17 of the enemies enfignes.

No day now passing without some skirmish, at length the 9 of September, 10000 Turkes, some in boats, some by other meanes, having got over the river Danabius into the Island of Schut, fuddenly set voon the Christians, all sleeping in security, and little searing any such danger of whom they flew about 2000, and after fome final fight, put the rest to most shamefull flightin such fort, that Matthias the Archduke himself, with other Noblemen and Cap. tains had much adoby flight to escape. Thus whilest every man surprised with seare, made C what shift he could for himself, the enemy in the mean time entered the trenches, tooke their tents, their great ordnance, the shot and pouder, and all the money which but a little before was brought for the foldiers pay; befides about 1000 wagons and 200 boats well loded with Agreet Boyl provision for the camp, and ten gallies, wherin were 120 pieces of great ordnance. The losse taken by the received this day was valued at 500000 ducats. And albeit that this victorie cost the Turks 1500 of their lives, yet therby they gained the maftery both you the river and the land. So that now roaming far and neer without refiftance, they fooiled the country all about, & burnt certaine countrey Villages not far from Vienna: fo that for many miles space the Countrey Townes were for feare of the enemy for faken by the inhabitants; of whom fome were taken and flaine, some carried into captivity, and some others, reserved for a better fortune, with D such things as they had got themselves farther off into places of more security. And the more to increase these calamities, the Tartars shortly after passing ouer Danubius neere to Altenbourg, first sacked Weisenbourg, and after burnt it, with certaine other townes therabouts. But adventuring to have gone farther into the Countrey, they were with loffe inforced to

In the mean time not far from Messan, even in the fight of the garrison of the town, they took a certain ship comming out of the East countries, and three others comming from Apulia. Afterwards chancing vpon certaine gallies of the East, they changed some few shot with them, but to no great purpose, and so turning their course, & sailing along it the coast of Calabria, they oftentimes landed certain companies, which skirmithing with the Calabrians, had fomtime the better, and fomtime the worke; and fo with fuch fortune as befel them, were again received into their gallies. But they of the town fo valiantly defended themselves interest late the Funds were glad to giue ouer the affault, and with loffe to retyre. Neuertheleffe the next divition fault was againe renued, and most desperately maintained by the space of two daies, whereh 1 2000 of the Turks loft their lived, the other with fhame retiting themselves into their ren-fall wherof the town ditch was in that place formwhat filled; wherby the Turks williall mere power attempted thride the next day to have entered, but were by the value of the definitions fill notably with loffe repulsed. Yet notwithstanding all this cheerfulnes and couragionnes of them in the towne, the puiffant enemy ceafed not with furious battery and continual af faults to attempt the city, till that at length he had gained two of the bulwarks, from whence t he might to his great advantage, by the rubbith and earth fallen our of the battered billwarks and rampiers, have accesse vito the towne, to the great terror of the desendants. Whereupon County Hardeck the Gouernor (who corrupted by the Turke, had of purpose many times before faid that the town could not possibly long be defended) now took occasion to enter into counsel with the other captains of the town, (divers of whom hee had already framed to his purpose) what coursewere best to take for the yeelding of it up. And after a little consultation on, holden more for fashion sake, than for that he doubted what to doire solved to fend a melsenger to the Bassa for a truce to be granted for a while, to see if haply in the meantime some reasonable composition might be agreed upon. Yet the governor considering intowhat scom and danger he might expose himselfe, by yeelding vp so strong a town to colour the matter, & and to excuse his doings to the rest of the nobility, and garisons of Hungary, caused a publike instrument to be made in his and all the rest of the Captaines names conceived inwritings. wherin they folemnly protested to the world, That foral much as it was impossible; by reason of the weaknes of the garrison, for them longer to defend the town against so mighty an Enemy, without new supplies in stead of them that were slain (which they had oftentimes invain requested) they were therfore of necessity inforced to come to composition with the enemy. Which protestation so made, the gouernor and chiefe Captains confirmed with their hands and feals. So after a truce granted, and pledges given on both fides, at length it was agreed up on, That all the garrison souldiers, together with the County and other captains, should in arms with enfignes displaied, with bag and baggage depart in safety, and with a safe comby L be brought to Altenburg. Which agreement though by oth confirmed, was not on the Turke partaltogether performed: for when the County had the 29 day of September about ten of the clock in the forenoon delivered up the City to the Basia, and the Christian garrison was all come out, the County himself with a few of his friends was with a convoy of Turks safety brought to the appointed place: but the Italians and other gari fon foldiers that came behind and ought to have bin by the governor protected, were contrary to the Turks promise spoils of al that they had, and hardly escaping with life, came that night to Hochstrate, and the next day to Altenburg. Matthiat the Aschduke in the mean time, not ignorant how much it concerned the emperor his brother to haue this city defended. baum natheribin late ouenthrow gathered together a good army of Germans, Bohemians, and Hungaries sublided to go and raise the siege : and so marching forward with his army, came and epremned the 28 daniel October at Nitria, about five miles from Komara. Now were the Larrars a latticibafore departed from the camp, with purpose to returne home : yea, the Turks themselves meany of the siege, and wanting victual both for themselves and their horses, began also as mendificouraged to thrinke away. Immediatly after the Turks were thus departed, the Archduke arrived at Komara, where he with great diligence canded the breaches to be repaired, the mines to be filled up, and new bulwarks and sampiers to be made in divers places for the more frength of the city-leaning the charge thereof fill unto the lord Braun the old Gouernor, who in the defence thereof had received a grieuous wound in his right knee: of whom also this notable fact is reported. The Bassa in time of the late fiege at Comara under the color of a parley, had fent fine Turks into the city, to the

In the meane time he gave notice to the Nobility and Governours of the Country, his friends, of the imminent and common danger, who forthwith repaired vnto him in armes. But the traitours proceeding in their purpose, ceased not to persuade Bornemissa, who had the leading of the Princes army, that to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no small danger and that therefore if he wished well to his country, he should not have to do with them, but only shew himselfe neere vnto them. and that he was not unprouided for them : which was accordingly done, and the Transvluanianarmy brought fo nigh vnto the Tartars, as that they might heare the noise of their drums and trumpets. The tanigeries. Not long after, about the two and twentieth of December a tumult rife among the language. ries of the court at Constantinople, which grew to such an height, that in the heat thereof one of the Bassass by them slain, with some others of good account, and one of Amerals for fore wounded, and with much ado faued. Vpon conceit whereof, amarah for anger & griefe fell into a fit of the falling fickeneffe (whereunto he was much fubject) and was therewith for the space of three daies and three nights so grieuously vexed, as if he should have presently giuen vp the ghost : so that the city was filled with heavinesse and feare, and the great men of the Court were even ready to thinke vpon a new Lord. This tumult of the infolent Isnizaries H many supposed to haue beene the cause of Amurath his death, which shortly after ensued the gricfe and malady encreasing daily by the euill news still brought vato him both by mef. fongers and letters, especially out of Transylvania, where the Prince waiting vponeuery occafion, was fill at hand with the Turks, cutting them fort in enery place; and in fundry today which he made voon them in this month, tooke many of their castles and forts from them. He had at that time in the field in divers places three armies: one under the conduct of Geffy Fee rens. in the country of Lugaz, neere vnto Temeswar: another under the leading of Michael Bor. wat, on the fide of Danubius, to intercept the Turks comming to Bude and the third commanded by Cafpar Cornoyse in the country neere to Giula ; vnto whom came shortly after fif. teene hundred borfemen out of the vpper Hungary.

The Transylvanian Prince Sigismand Bator thus lately revolted from the Turke for the ftrengthning of his state thought it best betime to enter into confederation with his neighbors of Valachia and Muldauia (who moved by his example, thorrly after in like maner allocalt off the feruile yoke of the Turke) but especially with the Christian Emperor Redelph: For which purpose he sent Embassadors honourably accompanied; who comming to Cassonian Hun. gary the foureteenth of December, arrived at Prague the swelfth of Innuary, with twenty wag. gons, and an hundred and fifty horse, where they were by the Emperous appointment most honourably received and royally entertained and after a few daics having delimentioned the Emperor the funme of their embaffage, which was for a confederation to be madelles weeke the Emperor and the Prince: after much grave confultation and ferious discourse it was fally in concluded and agreed upon: the chiefe points whereof I shought it noramiffore in briefe to fet downe, for the facisfying of such as defire to know in what termes that worthy Prince next neighbourvnto the Turke then flood with the Christian Emperdur, international engineering

First it was agreed upon, That she Emperous for himselfe and for the States of Hungary should promise to proceed in his wars begun against the common enemy, and notes conclude teger beimist any peace with him, without the knowledge and good liking of the Prince. And that is all ite Translate conclusions of peace, to be made betwitt him and the Turke, the countries of Transland, Valachia, and Moldania, should be alwaies comprised; in regard whereof, the Prince likewife promifed for himselfe and the braces of Transylmania, to proceeding the combined warre, and nonto enter into any league with the Tarkei without the knowledge and confeat L of the Emperor and the Mobility of Hungary; and this to be confirmed by foleme outh on themes arry count, ake from them, to have it to there age, are ever

Secondly, That the Prouince of Transylvania with all the parts and iconfines therof hithelto possessed by the Prince of Hungary, should remaind much the faid Pilnce signamed and to his beirgs male, with all the profits arising thereof, in such forcestebag had done in the since of lohn, Stephen, and Christopher, his predocoffours, to hard shepoid a moft free and to foliate inthority over for as that they should acknowledge his Imperial Majesty and his lawfull lacet fors for their lawfull fourreignes; vnto whom they should alwaics for the delical four flow, with without any homage doing and that to be performed by shis due collows at the time of the change but by the Prince himfelfe, prefently after the confirming of this length; But that for M lacke of heires male, the country of Transylvania withall she corriers thereumounnexed thould difcend vnto his facred Majefly and his force fours the Kangoof Hongary as were inseparable member thereof: whereunto the Prince and all the States of Transplanta should bind themselues by solemne oath, But yet that at such time at the heist male strend faile in the line of the present Prince, and that the country of Transylvania should according to these prefent conditions be devolved to the crowne of Hungary, as well his present Imperial and Rovall Majesty, as his successors, should keep inuiolate the antient lawes, priviledges, and customs of that country, and alwaies appoint one of the nobility of Transylvania to be Generican or Vayuod of the same, and no other stranger.

Thirdly, That his Majesty should acknowledge the Prince of Transyluania for an absolute

Prince, and by speciall charter confirme vnto him the title of Most excellent.

Fourthly. That his Imperial Majesty should procure one of the daughters of the late Archduke Charles his vncle, for a wife for the Prince, that as they were now to be joyned in league. so they might be joyned in affinity also.

Fifthly, That the Emperor should procure him to be made one of the order of the Golden Fleece.

Sixthly. That the Prince might with more cheerfulnesse and security make war against the common enemy, his imperiall and royall Majesty should not at any time, how socuer things fel our, for fake the faid Prince or any of the countries subject vnto him: and even now presently to aid him according as the present occasion required, and afterward (if greater need should be) with greater help, whether it was by his Generall of Cassouia, or others: and this giuing of aid to be on both fides mutuall and reciprocall, according as the necessity of the one or other part should require : and that where most need was, thither should most helpe be converted.

Seventhly, That the facred Roman Empire should take voon it the protection and defence C of the Prince and his territories. And that his Imperial Majesty should create the said Prince and the Princes his fucceffors, Princes of the Empire: yet fo, as that they should have neither voice nor place among the faid Princes.

Eightly, That what focuer castles, townes, cities, or other places of strength, should by their common forces be taken or recoursed from the common enemy, at such time as his Imperiall Majesty should fend into the field a ful army, should be all his Majestics but such places as the Prince should by his own forces or policy gaine from the enemy, should remaine vnto the Prince himselfe, Yet that what places soener the Prince should recouer, which at any time before belonged to the kingdome of Hungary before it was taken by the Turke, thosehe should forthwith deliuer to his Majesty, as soone as reasonable recompence were by him therefore D made vnto the Prince.

Ninthly, His facred Majesty should promise of his own bounty to give vnto his Excellency sufficient aid for the fortifying and defence of such places as should be thought necessary for the behoof of the Christians; as again the faid Prince should likewise promise not to spare his own cofers or forces, that the same places should be throughly fortified and defended for the behoofe of his Majesty and the common good of the Christian commonweale.

Lastly, That for a fmuch as the euents of war are vncertain, and many things suddenly happen contrary to mens expectation, if such necessity should chance vnto his excellency or his suc. ceffors (which missap God forbid) that having spent themselves, they should not be able lon. ger to defend their state & country, but that the mighty enemy preuailing, they should at last be enforced to for sake the same in this thoir extremity, his imperial & royall Majosty should promise both for himselfe and his successors, within the space of one moneth to assigne some certain place in some other of his dominions, where the said prince & his successors might honorably line; and the like regard to be had also of other such principall men, as should together with the Prince aduenture their lives and livings in defence of the Christian commonweale.

Which articles of confederation agreed upon, & folemnly confirmed, the same Embassadors were with all kindnes, bounty, and magnificence dismissed & sent back again vnto the Prince: who was not himselfe in the mean time idle, but labouring by all the means he could to draw unto him Michaell the Vayuod of Valachia (a man of no leffe worth than himselfe) and Aaren the Palatine of Moldauia, both of them then the Turks tributaries, & by them to alienat from F the Turke both those countries, that so with their combined forces they might the better defend their liberty, and with fland their common enemy: wherein he did fo much, and preuais led fo farwith them both that casting off the Turks obelfance, they shortly after to the great benefit of the Christian commonweale, and no lesse hinderance of the Tarks proceedings in Hungery joyned hands both together with him for the recovery of their lost liberty. Which Vuuu 3

reuolt of these bordering Princes, for that it so much concerned the common good, as that G the fafegard of Austria, and of the remnants of Hungary, with some good part of Germany al. fo, is even by them that in those matters saw much, not without cause supposed to have rested thering & that this noble Vayuod (of whom much is to be faid hereafter) was the fecond after herein, it shall not be from our purpose to see the manner of his reuolt also from the Turke, as we have already the Transylvanians. For the more evidence whereof, as for the honor of the man(whilest he liued, a most worthy member of the Christian commonweale) we will a little ftep backe to see how he obtained of the great Turke this so honourable a preferment, as was the Vayuodship of Valachia, not without his revolt long now to be holden.

Alexander the late Vayuod of Valachia, a Moldanian borne, and by Amurath himselfe promoted to that dignity; proud aboue measure of this his fo great a preferment, as also of his w owne nobility, and the deceitfull fauor of Fortune still fawning upon him not only oppressed his people himselse with intollerable impositions, but tobe in farther fauor with the Turks. brought into that country (too much before exhausted) such a company of them, as that they feemed now almost wholly to have possessed the same, oppressing the poore Christians (the naturall inhabitants) with new exactions, and more than tirannicall injuries, even such not elswhere by the Turks themselues vsed, not only breaking at their pleasure into their hour. fes, and dispoiling them of their goods, but taking tythes also of their children, as if it had bir of their cattell, a thing neuer before there feen and for the fatisfying of their beaftly luft rani shing their wives and daughters, even in the fight of their husbands and parents, with divers other fuch outragious villanies, not with modesty to be rehearsed. So that by this meanes he had violently taken from his Christian subjects all hope of recourry of their antient liberty. had it not as somtime it falleth out in these worldly things both vnto men and commonweals. which brought vnto the last cast, & euen as it were to the bottome of despaire, by the goodnes of God, contrary to all hope, find sometime such vnexpected helpe and reliefe, as that thereby they beyond their hope, even to the aftonishment of the World, mount vp again vnto a greater luftre of their state, than was that from which they before fell : it had even foby the fingular mercy of God now hapned vnto the Valachians, not knowing which way to turn themselves. There was at Crailowa (a city in the confines of Valachia towards the confines of the Hungarians and Turks, where the Gouernor of those borders is for the defence thereof with a firong *Ion fignifieib garison alwaies resiant) a noble gentleman called * Ion Michael, son to Peter the Palatine of that # country, the aforesaid Alexander his predecessor: who as he was unto the people for the honor of his father, the prerogative of his birth, the comlinesse of his person, and talnesseof his stawhich some mitture, well knowne; so was he for his zeale towards the Christian religion, his souetowards his country, his kindneffe towards his equals, his courtefie towards his inferiors, his veright deaby the name of ling, his constancy and bounty vnto them, no lesse gratious; and for other the noble vertues of his heroicall minde and naturall disposition for the performance of great matters, his deepe wisedome and quicke foresight, his sweet and pleasing speech, void of all affectation, vnto all good men most deare: whose same both for the honor of his house, and of his own vertues, still more and more encreasing, and rife in the cares of Alexander the Vaynod, was the cause that he commanded him as the ready or rather naturall competitor of his stare and honor, to be secretly apprehended, and so taken out of the way; wheref he by good fortune having intelligence, and carefull of his owne health, for safegard of himselfe fled first into Hungary, and there not flaying long (God to directing him) went to Constantinople in the yeare 1591, to sue for the Vayuod his place, all the nobility of his country and the provinces thereunto adjoyning, fecretly rejoycing thereat. About which time the chiefe and most grave of the Valachian nobility and counsellors prostrating themselves at the feet of Amurath, most grievously complish ned vnto him of the manifold and intollerable injuries they had already fultained, and were still like to endure, without hope of redresse, from Alexander their Vayuod, and the followers of his court; the Turks garrifons and merchants with plentifull teares orderly declaring many his most foule and detestable facts, and afterward highly commending Im Michael for his M rare vertues, as the true heire of their province; most humbly requested Amurath either to have him appointed the lawfull Gouernor of their country, or els fome other place by himselfigned for them to dwell in, withing any where to line, rather than under the heavy command of to mercileffe a man as was Alexander. For the furthering of which their fute, Michael his vacleby

the mothers fide, a Greeke borne, and a man for his exceeding wealth in great favour in the Turks Court, spared for no cost. So Michael by the goodnesse of God was by Amarath with Michael by A. great folemnity created Vayuod of Valachia, and the oppressed and almost for lorne state of murath creating the state of ted Vayuod of that sometime most flourishing countrey by little and little well relieued (although not alto. Valachie, gether without most sharpe and violent remedies, such as extremity oft require) began now againe to lift up the head, and to aspire unto the antient liberty and honour thereof. At the beginning of whose happy sourceignty, Alexander his predecessor in his owne conscience guilty of his cuill and shamefull government of that so notable and great a province, and now in feare to be called to account, fecretly fled. But certaine yeares after remouing to Conftantinoole with his wife, and there attempting divers guill meanes for the obtaining of the Palatinat of Moldania, and for those his volawfull practises accused by the Palatine his Agentihe was by the commandement of Amurath taken in his owne house, and there in his princely apparell most miserably strangled upon Palme Sunday, in the yeare 1597, about fix yeares after Alexander his departure out of Valachia.

fixth Emperor of the Turks.

Michael thus made Vayuod of Valachia, long it was not but that it fortuned the reuerend Father Cornelius de Nona, sent from Pope Clemens the eighth vnto the great Duke of Muscouy, in his returne conferring with Sigismund the Transylvanian Prince, and Aaron Palatine of Moldauia, enformed them of the great confent of divers zealous Christian Princes, for the maintenance of the war against the dangerous and common Enemy; with many graue and cffectuall reasons persuading them (but especially for that they were themselues Christians) in C that Christian quarrell to joyn unto them their forces also, raised in those their countries neer unto the great rivers of Danubius and Nester : but unto Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, he could not for divers his other important businesses then come : whom for all that, the aforefaid Transyluanian Prince Sigismund his neighbour desirously sought to draw into the sellowthip of this warre even for the same reasons almost wherewith he had beene himselfe moued. First, by divers great reasons removing such doubts as might justly seeme to hinder him from giuing thereunto his consent; and then by declaring the Turkish insolency daily increasing, with the infinite grievances by them devised against the miserable Valachians; when as the incursions of the Turks or Tartars, or their passages that way (no lesse troublesome than their inrodes) was almost every moneth to be feared, their armies as friends to be in Winter and D Summer received, their fouldiers to their great charges relieved, and their commanders and captaines rewarded. Valachia thus impouerished, was not able (as he said) to pay the great fums it did already owe, neither was to expect any releasement of the euils it was wrapped in, much lesse was it able to suffice vnto the gricuous exactions to be thereunto by them afterwards imposed. None of his predecessors (as he said, and as truth was) had for many yeares now past, for any long time, or with any security held their state or government: but that either by the calumniation of the Bnuious, or bribes of their ambieious competitors, brought into suspition with the Sultan, they were violently thrust out, or most cruelly put to death. In briefe, be said it was a wife mans part, not without most manifest and weighty reasons, to promise vnto himselse better fortune, or more assurance of his state, than had his vnsortunate predecessors before him; but warned by their harmes, betimes to provide for his owne safety. By which persuasion he so preuaited, that the Vayuod (whose name, whose fame, whose wealth and life, together with his subjects was all thereby indangered) although he would not (for the weightinesse of the matter) at the first yeeld thereunto; yet assuredly promised, with his friends and the rest of the Nobility of his country to consider thereupon. Having it by the Prince plainly laid downe before him, how a sufficient number of soldiers might at all times be raised, their pay prouided, and aid still sent him as need should be, from the German Emperor, or himselse out of Transylvania; as also that Aaron the Palatine of Moldavia would at all times be ready to combine himfelfe unto them; that fo with their united forces they might vpon the banks of Danubius and Nester easily repulse the incursions both of the Turks and F Tartars their enemies: the Christian Emperor in the meane time with lesse trouble proceeding in his wars against the Turke on the other side of Hungary.

Now whilest this plot was thus in laying, and matters to and fro debating, not altogether without the Turks suspicion; Sinan Bassa comming with a great army into Hungary, had taken the strong Towne of Rab, as is before declared: with which mischance so much concer-

How Amurath the late Sultan in the beginning of these troubles, had at Constantinople thut vp in prison Fredericke Krecowitz the Emperous's Embassador, is before declared. This Embassadour Sinan Bassabrought with him the last yeare when hee came into Hungary, who The Emperous after many indignities by him suffered both on the way and at Belgrade, there died; five of Embaffieder di-ett ta prifon at whose servants the false Bassa caused to bee kept in freit prison, as guilty of their Masters death, to to auert the infamy thereof from himfelfe. But now lying himfelfe at Belgrade for the better mannaging of this yeares warres, vpon the comming of a new. Treasurer from the Court, hee caused the five poore prisoners to be brought before him, and most impudently a charged them with the death of their Master : faying, That they should answere for the same vitto God and their Emperor; and that his purpose in bringing of him from Constantinople. was to no other end, but to have vied his helpe in concluding a peace betweene the Great Sultan and the Emperor, and so to have fet him with all his at liberty: But now that he was dead, he would fend them his treacherous feruants vnto the Emperour to be by him examined; and withall to tell him, That hee was fent from the Great Sultan, (whose power was not by any but God onely to be with stood) to be siege Vienna, which he could (as he said) the last years haue taken with lesse labour than he stad done Rab; and that therefore it were best for him betime to feeke for peace, before so great a power had taken the field: and that for further instructions, he would referre them to his sonne the Bassa of Buda, to whom he sent them from Belgrade, together with the new come Treasurer. Being come to Buda, they were forthwith brought before the Bassa, and amongst them the late Embassadours Secretary, vato whom after he had faid somewhat of the hard dealing with the Embassador and his sollowers, hedeclared that hee had alwaies difliked of that manner of proceeding, and oftentimesentreated his father for their liberty; and now at last to have obtained, That the Embassadourbeeing dead, his servants might be set free : and so put them in good hope, that they should in shore time be restored to their wonted liberty. In the meane time, That one of them should go to the Emperours Court, and there speake with one of his secretaries, whom he had before aduised to bethinke himselse of peace: vnto whom also he afterwards writ, vpon what conditions he thought peace might be at the Sultans hand obtained. Which were, If all the castles and K strong holds taken by the Emperors forces in these wars, as Filek, Setchine, and Nouigrade, with their territories, should be restored, Sifeg in Croatia surrendered, if the Emperor should from thenceforth refuse to aid or protect the Transyluanians, Moldanians, & Valachians, and leaue them to the Great Sultan to be chastised as rebels; if finally the Emperourwould at once send unto the Turkes Court his wonted tribute for the yeares past, and so yearely afterwards: so he could be content by the mediation of his father, to attempt to appeale the fierce and inucterate displeasure of the Sultan, and to further the treaty of peace. This he commanded the Secretary to write, and to fend it by the young Lord Perling, and to require thereofanfwere: yet that he should go with this condition. That if the said Perling within the space of fine and twenty daies returned not with answere, all the rest should for his default lose their L heads. A subtill device and full of deceit, wherein the crafty Bassaes, both the father and the fon, fought for nothing else but to see what confidence the Christians had in themselves, and to breake the confederation made betweene the Emperour, the Transyluanians, Moldanians, and Valachians: and that other Princes whom God had stirred up in defence of so just a cause, hearing of a rumour of peace, might grow cold, and deferre to fend their promifed aid. For now the Turks had found by experience, how hurtfull and dangerous the revolt of the three countries of Transylvania, Moldavia, and Valachia was vnto them, as they which broughten hundred thousand duckats yearely into the great Sultans Treasury : besides that, those people now become their enemies, were of all others fittest to intercept all manner of prouision to be brought by land either to or from Constantinople, were it victuall or other warrelike M provision. Notwithstanding this motion of peace made by the two Bassaes, Sinan the old Basfa in the meane time, with great diligence at Belgrade prepared all things necessary for ware, and caused three bridges to be made, whereby he might in divers places as he thought best, transport his army ouer Danubius; and at the same time sent for the garrisons round about

But that it was manifest vnto the whole World, that all complaints of infinit gricuances, being by the Embassador, yes, and by the Emperor himfelfe, by his letters laid open vnto the Sultan and his chiefe Baffaes, had not only nothing prevailed, but alique have beene with great concempt rejected, and the treaty of peace once begun to have by the informer of the Baffa of Bofna been interrupted : That the Emperour because the matter should not breake our into open war, had sent his double tribute into the confines of Hungary, which was a great while laid up at Comara untill the Sultans minde were known But when all his defignes tended to war, and the Christian Prouinces were by his robbers on ducty fide spoiled, the inhabitants led away into most miscrable captivity, the townes and villages burnt, yea, whole countries lay defolate, and all manner of outrages were young meere pride and contempt as it were of the whole World exercised : then the Emperour to haue taken his refuge vano the defence of his just cause, and to haue vsed such remedies as are both before God and the World to be allowed, and so by lawfull war to have repulsed warre. And that although all had not the last years prospered in his hand, but that he had received some losses wer that Sinan Baffe himselfe, and the Baffa of Buda his son with other of the wifer fore of the Turks must needs confesse that to have chanced, not by their wisedome, policy or power, but by the sufferance of God, by a rare misfortune, through the inexcusable negligence and treason of such as he had put in trust with the confines of his empire, worthy most seuere chastifement. And that no man could deny, but that great powers of the Turks, had not once. but oftentimes bin ouerthrowne and discomfitted, by small handfuls of the Christians; therefore their power not to be so inuincible, as they vainly vanted of. But wheras it is written, that the great Visier Sinan and the Bassa his sonne are of opinion, that the Emperor is brought to so low an ebbe, that he must be glad to accept of most hard and dishonorable conditions of peace propounded by them: therein they erre much, and deceive themselves far; for by the power of God they should shortly by experience know, that his Imperial Majesty wanteth neither power nor wealth, to repaire the loffe received through the treason of them he trusted, yea. and to recouer what soeuer he had lost else and that it should in short time be witnessed vnto the whole VVorld, by the help of God and the defence of a most just cause, that the Emperour was not to poore and weake as they supposed him to be. Yet as he of his owne naturall goodnesseand clemency, with his owne incomparable losse and harme, had alwaies sought for the quiet and profit of his subjects and to the ettermost of his power staid the effusion of innocent blouds fo now also forgetting all injuries, he could happily be content to thinke of an honorable peace; whereunto lie was more enclined than to protract the warre with the vnfoeakable harmes of the subjects on both sides. Yet aboue all things it behooved Sinan to know, that he was to reflore all fuch caftles and townes as had in this warre beene taken by the Turks, beginning at Wihitz in Croatis, even to the last innocent subject by them caried away into captiuity. And that the Transylvanians, Moldauians, and Walachians (people many ages joyned and vnited as inseparable members to the kingdome of Hungary, as vnto the true body, and now of late by the practife and treachery of certaine rebellious persons separated from the fame) were from henceforth to be left under the protection and government of his Imperial Majefty and never more to be impugned by the Turks. If thefe things were done, and order taken that the injury and difgrace done vnto the Emperours late Embassadour (a fact that all the Princes of the World cried shame of) might not remaine vnpunished; and that his servants

The Emperor not ignorant with what au enemy he had codo, and of nothing more resulting than of the kingdome (or more truly to fay, of the reliques of the kingdome) of Hungay, lying now as it were in the Lyons mouth, ceased not to pray aid, not of the Princes cleans on ly, but of others also farther off; year ouen as far as Italy and Spaine, but especially of the Kine of Polonia as his neere alliance and neighbor. Vnto whom both he and the States of Hange rv sent their Embassadours, absuch time as he, moved with the daily incursions of the Turks and Tartars into the countries adjoyning vpon his, had for the fafety of his owne Kingdome. called a parliament of all his States in February laftiat Cracouia. Wheref Mahanet the Great Turke hearing, fent also two of his chiefe Chiaus, his vsual Embassadors, ynto the king and his States fo affembled to craue his aid in his wars in Hungary: which if the King thould not refule, then to promife him to want no coine to pay his fouldiers, and that Mibemed mindfull of fo great a courtefie, would at all times be teady to require him with like, when his occasions

These Embassadors, having obtained safe conduct from Michael the Vayand balfadours feat of Valachia for their passage through his country; comming thither, were by the Vayuod himwise Kingfain felfe honourably entertained and welcommed, and so brought into a faire lodging, where they in Valathia. discoursed with him of many matters. But the Vaynods followers, grieued to see sogrett lo- K nor done to these his sworne and mortall enemies, with weapons in their hands brake into the roome where the Embassadors were, and without more adoe slew them both; and in the same fury fetting upon the rest of the Turks their followers, cut them all in pieces, so that of them none came into Polooia to do their great Masters message, either yet returned to Constanti nople to carry newes of the rest, but there altogether perished. Of which outrage Mahemet yet understanding was therewith wonderfully enraged, threatening all cuils both to the Moldauians and Valachians and forthwith fent out other Embaffadors to the fame purpole; who with better fortune afterwards arrived in Polonia.

The Tartars in many places (as is before declared) ouerthrown, and many firong castles and forts taken from the Turks by the Transylvanians, Valachians, and Moldavians, the Turkish L affaires going to wracke in those quarters, and fore shaken on that side of Hungary wahenes the Turkish Emperour called home to the Court Sinan Baffahis Generall in Hungary,to conferre with him (as it was thought) of some great matters. In whose place he sent Ferat Baff4, he who sometime had the leading of Amurath, great armies against the Persians: who now departing from Constantinople, came to Belgrade in Aprill, and there sooke the charge vpos him. Where at his first comming, in the night time all the ropes and cords of the tents were fuddenly cut in funder, and fo the tent let fall about his eares; which fome supposed to have beene done to his diffrace, by the procurement of Cicala Baffa, before by him wronged; or 48 others thought, by the infolent Ianizaries, who difliking of him, did it in despight, withing re-The Plague of ther to have beene led by Mahomet himselfe. Now at his comming, the Famine which the M Famine among last yere began among it the Turks, was growne exceeding great, not at Buda and Belgrade on ly, but even generally in most places of Hungary possession by the Turka: insomuch that the Tattar women that followed the campe, were faine to roaft their owne children and ear them. This Famine was also accompanied with a most terrible Plague, whereof great numbers

A the Turks and Tartars died dayly: so that of sourcescore fine thousand Tartars which came the last yeare into Hungary, now remained scarce eight thousand, the rest being all denoured with the Sword, famine, and the Pestilence.

Grear were the harmes the Turkes fill dayly received from the late revolted countries of Transvluania, Valachia, and Moldania, the Christians of those places seeking by all means to annoy them. Michael Vayuod of Valachia, not contented with that they had already done, but Michael Vayentring into the Turks frontiers, surprised Scihmele, together with the castle; wherin he found doth the Turks foureteene field pieces, among it which were two which had vpon them the armes of the Em- great harme. peror Ferdinand, and other two having upon them the armes of Huniades; which pieces he afterward fent as a present to the Transylvanian Prince. After that, he tooke Orolige, a famous B port towne, the dwelling place of the Turks great purueyor for butter, cheefe, and hony, and fuch other provision for the court; wherein he found such store of the aforesaid provision, as might well have sufficed eight thousand men for a whole yeare; and still profecuting his good fortune, took from the Turks Gilec and Kalempe, with the firong castle of S. George, commonly called Grigio, and at length befieged Laganoc. With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias the Archdukeand Generall of the Christianarmy, from the assembly of the Nobility of Hungary at Presburg, to Vienna, and so from thence to the Emperor his brother at Prague; who appointed him Generall of the lower Hungary; and Maximilian his brother Generall of the upper Hungary: giving them for their Lieutenants, vnto Maximilian the Lord Teuffenbach, and to Matthias the County Charles Mini-C. felt, by him fent for out of Flanders, and after created one of the Princes of the Empire. John de Medices who was yet in Hungary, he made Master of the great ordnance, with charge to fortific Komara; which he fo well performed, as that it was thought nothing in strength inserious to Rab. All this while the Emperor ceased not by his Embassadors and letters to solicite the Christian Princes, for the repressing of the common enemy, to put too their helping hands: and so much prevailed with them, that out of his owne hereditary provinces, and from other Princes his friends, he had this Spring raifed a right puissant and strong army for the defence of Hungary : which how it was raised, and from whom, it shall not be much from our purpose The notable arbriefly to remember, as the chiefe strength under God, whereby the Christian commonweale my of the Chris was this yeare most notably defended. Out of the higher Saxony came a thousand two hunn dred horsemen, and out of the lower Saxony six hundred from Franconia a thousand horse valed. men: from Sueuia foure thousand footmeniout of the County of Tirol as many: from Bauaria three thousand:out of Bohemia two thousand men at armes, six hundred light horsemen, and fix thou (and footmen: from Sile fia a thou land five hundred hor lemen: from Lufatia five hundred horse and a thousand foot: from Morauia a thousand horse, and two thousand foot; out of Austria two thousand horse, and six thousand foot: from Hungary flue hundred horsemen and a thousand foot: from the nobility of Sucuia and Francouia source thousand soot; from the King of Spaine out of the Low countries under the conduct of Charles County Mansfelt. two thousand horsemen and six thousand foot: vnto these the Bishop of Rome added two thousand horsemen, and eight thousand foot the great Duke of Florence sent five hundred horse & three thousand footithe Duke of Ferrara a thousand fine hundred footmen: the Duke of Mantua a thousand foot : and the Duke Venturee five hundred horse. All which being purtogether, fill vo the number of fifteene thousand nine hundred horsemen, and fiftie thou-fand five hundred foor. Which notable army, raised from the power of divers Christian Princes, and conducted by worthy Chiefetains, had by the goodnesse of God much better successe this Summer against the antient enemies of Christendome, than had the like army the yeare before: as in the processe of this History shall appeare. Among the worthy Commanders that were in this puissant army, Charles County Mans.

felt the some of Peter Bruestus the old County, from his youth brought up in armes, was by the King of Spaine at the request of the Emperor fent with the aforesaid forces of two thousfand horse and fix thousand foot out of the Low-countries, as a man for his approved valor and direction fit to mannage these dangerous warres against the Turks under Matthias the Archduke, as his Lieutenant Generalliwho having raifed the appointed forces, for most part Wallons, departed from Bruxelles about the midst of February, and by the way taking his leave of his aged father at Luxenburg, and trauelling through Germany, came in March to Prague, where he was by the Emperour and the Archduke his brother most honourably entertained, G and thortly after with great folemnity created one of the Princes of the Empire. His forces following after him, were by the way saied, partly by the inundation of waters (the riverseley were to passe ouer at that time rising to an vinwonted height) partly by the jealousie of some of the German Princes, who denied them passage through their territories, vntil such time as that the Emperour by his letters had opened vuto him the way: which Princes for all that flood voon their guard, and fo gaue him passage.

Now ran great rumors of wonderfull preparations of the Turks, as also of the Christians. Fame after her wonted manner, encreasing the report of all things about measure: which can. fed the Turks with exceeding care to looke to the fortification of their frontier townes, effective to the fortification of their frontier townes, effective to the fortification of their frontier towness, effective to the fortification of cially of Rab and Strigonium, as did the Christians to the fortification of Comara and Altenburg. In the meane time many hot skirmishes passed betweene the Christians and the Turks, especially in the late revolted countries of Transylvania and Valachia, wherein the Turks were still put to the worse, to the great discontentment of their Emperour. Necre vato Temesware the Bassa of Buda was ouerthrowne, by the valiant Captaine Gestius Ferentz, and the Transylvanians. And in Valachia the Turks Generall entering with a great army, was there also by the Lord Nadasti and the Valachians, aided with the Transyluanians, in a great battelldiscomfited and ouerthrowne. Eight thousand of the Turks heads in tokenof this vi-Cory the Lord Nadasti sent to Alba-Iulia to the Transyluanian Prince, and certaine ensignes. among it which was one most richly garnished with pretious stones and pearles, thought to be worth thirty thousand dollars; which the Prince afterward restored agains to Madalli, offe. I ring him great possessions in Transylvania, if he could have been content there to have seated himselfe.

All this Spring the Turks countenanced their warrs with greater boafts and threats, than true force; gluing it out, That they would in thort time worke wonders both by sea and land. For the more credit wherof, Murat Rays, a notable pyrat, was sent out with twelve gallies, who landing here and there upon the coasts of Italy, did much harme, causing it to be reported in enery place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater war, and that a wonderfull fleet was to follow him : which raifed a great feare, as well in other places, as in Italy. Howbeit, no such fleet afterwards appeared : for why, the Turkish Emperour, much troubled with the reuolt of Tranfyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and the great mortality then raging K both among his fouldiers and their horses, was not at leifure to looke into the sea, having his hands full enough with the troubles of Hungary, where his men of war enjoyed littlerest in the frontiers of his territories.

Sigifmund the Transylvanian Prince, had upon some just canses, of late suspected Auren the Vayuod of Moldaula, to haue intelligence not only with the Polonians, but also with the Cardinall, Bater, and other his mortall enemies, and fecretly to have been about to make his peace with Mahomet, and so againe to fall off from him vnto the Turke: which vehement suspition growing dayly more and more, was about this time manifefuly confirmed by certain letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preuenting whereof, the Prince caused Amm to be apprehended, and with his wife and sonne to be sent as prisoners to Prague: in whose roome L he by the consent of the nobility of the country, placed one Stephen Rozman, a wife and discreet man among it them, and fuch an one as had been vnto him alwaies faithfull. So as much se in him was, prouiding, that that country should not be rent from him and the vnion of the other. But against the secret practises of the Polonians, he protested openly by letters vnto the Emperour, by the power of God, and aid of his faithfull subjects, to redresse those so great injuries himselfe by the sword.

In the middest of these troubles came three Chiaus, Embassadors from the Turkish Sultan Mabomet fenvnto the Prince, to persuade him againe to put himselfe into his protection, and to give him prince of Tran- passage through his country, as in former time, into Hungary; promising him, that all the injuries by him or his people don, should be for euer forgotten and forgiuen; and that he should M haue those three countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldania, as his owne free inheritance, without paying any tribute, and fo to be accounted as the Turks most louing friend and vassall. What the Prince answered thereunto, was not knowne, but by hisdoings afterwards it was eafily to be gathered, that he hearkened not vnto the deceitfull charmes of the faithless

A tyrant trufting more vnto the league he had with the Christian Emperour. These Embassadours were scarce gone, but that a secret messenger came with letters from the chiefe of the Christians in Bulgaria to the Prince, declaring vnto him, That if he did with any good succeffe profecute his wars, they would be ready to follow his fortune, and to joyne hands with him against the cruell tyrant, and to shut up all the passages that way into Valachia, Moldauisand Hungary.

Whilest these troublesome times thus passed in Transylvania and Hungary, one of the old Ianizaries called Wasuode Giezi, an old fouldier, but a confident bold spoken fellow, moued as should seeme with the discontentments of the time, came vnto Mahomes the great Sultan at Constantinople, and there openly set upon him with this rough and abrupt speech:

How long at last, most mighty Emperour, wilt thou endure thy selfe to be seduced and blinded by the The presump great Baffaes of thy Court, and Commanders of thine Armies ? How long will thou fuffer thy felfe to be would perch deceived to the great danger of thy selfe, and hurt of thy subjects? Seeft thou not how ours hwartly, frau- on old lange. dulently, and cunningly they moved only with their owne couctous and ambitious humour, have hitherto 19, to Mahomes dealt with thee and thy father? especially in that, that persuaded by them, thou hast dishonourably broken the great suithe league, and taken up armes against the Christian Emperour. At length open thine eies and fee their deceit, and bow much they abuse thy power. Sinan Bassa, who must have himselfe honoured and exalted about all others, hath not by frong hand bonourably woon Rab, as hath been the manner of thine Ancestors, but hath craftily bought it with thy mony, and thereby cast thee into a most dangerous war and infi-C nite troubles. O Rab, Rab, now the cause of great triumph and rejoycing, as if thereby all Christendome Should in Short time be subdued to thy Scepter. But thou art therein much deceived thy barnes thy floreboules, as are Transquanta, Valachia, Moldania, Bulgaria, and other provinces adjoyning, from whence this thy Imperial City of Constantinople, with the country about it, thy Court, yea, thy selfe art to be reliened, are by this war fout up; fo that downe the river of Danubius out of the West, or by the Euxine out of the East, thou art not able to looke for any provision. From whence then ô most mighty Emperour, will thou maintaine thy selfe, thy Court, this populous City, and the Country bereabout? Not to speake in the meanetime of thy mighty Army now in Hungary, flesh fish, corne, all manner of victual are now at such a price, that the common fouldiers cannot buy them. In this extreame dearth all things, not men only, but euen the very beasts and cattell starue for hunger. Thy horses go fat perhaps into Hungary, but neither D thou nor thy select souldiers can line by grasse and weeds, all that is left in that country. This misery and calamity of thy people thou feest dayly, and yet thou wilt not with sound judgement lift up thine cies, to see from whence these barmes come, and how that they by thee put in greatest trust, study not for thy profit or the profit of the commonweale, but only how by all meanes to enrich themselves.

Mahomet much mooned with the confident speech of the old Ianizary, commanded him to be forthwith committed to ward, and by faire meanes to be examined, by whose setting on, and for what cause he had so boldly vitered this rude speech vnto his Souereigne, and what further things he had intended but the rest of the Ianizaries hearing thereof, rife presently in E a tumult, and by strong hand tooke him out of prison, and by solemne oath combined them. felues to defend him, even to the spending of their owne bloud, whereat Mahomet was glad to

The greatest part of the aid promised by the Christian Princes for the maintenance of this yeres wars against the Turks being now come to Vienna in Austria, County Mansfelt Lieutenant General under the Archduke, forthwith called a Councell of the Colonels, captains, and other great commanders of the army, to confult with them what course to take for the beginning of this great war: as whether they should presently lay siege to some towne of the Encmies, or else to expect him in the plaine field, and to give him battell. All things well considered, and that refolued vpon which was thought most expedient, he removed from Vienna to F Altenburg, where he mustered his whole army; and departing thence, with some few of his The Aimy of followers came to Walkenburg, a village vpon the fide of Danubius, where he made choice the christians of a place to encampe his army in : which after he had marked out, he returned againe with A tenburg. speed to Altenburg, and by open proclamation thorow the Campe gaue streit commandement, That against a certaine houre every man should be in readinesse to remove and set forward toward the enemy:but divers of the fouldiers, and especially the Germans, began forth. G with after their wonted manner to cry out for their pay before they would flir any further 16 that the County was glad by a fecond proclamation to command them to arife, promine then their pay within eight days. But they stil standing upon their former resolution for their pay, refused any further to follow their captains, and fent fix of the best fort among those min tinous foldiers to the County, in the name of all the rest to demand their pay, whom he forth with commanded to be all hanged but three of them having reasonably excused themselves. he let them go, and caufing the other three to cast lots for their lives, hanged vp two of them Which seuere execution so terrified the rest, that vpon the signe given they all rise, and with the rest of the army followed the County. The whole army being come to Walkenburgvino the place where they were to encamp, the County himselfe with others of the nobility began with spades & should stodig and cast up the trenches, and so wrought untill they sweat again with whose example all the rest of the army, of what degree socuer, being moued to labor, had in short time cast vp a very great trench from Danubius vnto the Marishes, large enough for 80000 men to incamp in, the great worke with wreftlesse labor going forward both night and day untill it was fully finished. The County lying thus intrenched with his army, was fill carefull by his espials to understand where the enemy lay, and what he did. He was ready fill to heare all, but to beleeue that which feemed most like to be true; what he purposed, he kept most secret, so that the enemy could neuer discouer any of his designes (whereinthe Generals of late yeares before him had much erred:) and commonly his most certaine resolutions were shadowed under the open shew of some other matter nothing meant: security hemuch abhor- I red, as neuer free from danger: and although it was by divers meffengers brought vnto him. That the enemy was but of small strength, vnable to meet him, disorderly incamped, and in great distresse for want of victuals, yet would be give little credit thereunto, as knowing such reports to haue oftentimes bin giuen out by the Turks, of purpose to lull the Christians in se. curity, the more easily to oppresse them. The Christian army thus strongly entrenched, and the trenches planted with great ordnance, the County himselse with certain troups of horsemen would oftentimes shew himselse before Rab, and sometime before Dotis, viewing sometime the one place, and sometime the other, as if he had verily purposed to have besieged one of them : and to give the greater shew that he had so determined, he caused the ground to be marked out for his army most conveniently to incamp in, and for the casting up of his mounts, K Which caused the Turks of Strigonium, Vesprinium, Palotta, and other places farther off, to fend part as well of their warlike provision, as of their garrison souldiers, some to Rab, some to Dottis, for the defence of those places, neerest as they thought wnto danger. The County in the meane time having now put all things in readine see, came with his army and sate downe beforc Dotis, demanding to have it yeelded vnto him. And the more to confirme the Turks that he would affuredly befiege that place, he began to cast up his trenches, and to raise his mounts as seemed most convenient; streitly commanding every man of what condition sever, to put his hand in some measure to the furtherance of those works; and the more by his own example to encourage others, would oftentimes himfelf carry a faggot or fome other thing before him vpon his horse for the raising of the mount. For all that, certain Hungarian gentlemen disdaining such base labor (as they deemed it) resused to do any thing therein: which the County perceiving streitly charged one of them by his example, to carry a fagot to the mount: which the Hungarian gentleman refusing the County therewith much moved laid the fagot he was carrying himself, before the Hungarian vpon his horse, charging him to see that he caried itto the appointed place the Hungarian disdainfully taking it, carried it untill he thought hewas out of the Counties fight, and then in form threw it down which the County (having fill an eie after him) perceiuing, commanded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid to be prefetitly hanged upon the next tree for his obstinacy. Which wholsome severity, both then and after wards caused others more diligently to doe what they were commanded by their superioris.

It happened about this time, that three Turks being taken prisoners, were brought into the camp whom the County streitly examined of many matters. But the first of the three could neither by faire or foule means be induced to answer to any thing that he was asked; and was therefore by the commandement of the County in the fight of the other two cut into final pieces. Who terrified with his difmembring, confessed many things whereof they were asked and senong others, That the Turkish Sultan had determined to turne his greatest forces into Transviuania, Moldania, and the opper part of Hungary, and therefore would this Summer fend finall forces or els none at all into those quarters.

Now was Dotis fo belaied by the County, as that no man doubted but that he had thereon nurroufed to have gaged his whole forces, when fiddenly the last of Iune, commandment was ninenthrough the campe, That every man vpon figne given, should be in readinesse to follow his leaders, for that the County had determined forthwith to remoue : yet whether the arrive was to be removed, few or none knew, more than certaine of the chiefe commanders. As for augoto Strigonium, few there were that so much as dreamed thereof, all was kept so focret : yet was it the Counties purpole even from the beginning to attempt the winning of that city, B which the Archduke had in vaine the last yere besieged. The next night being both darke and Conty Many foule, the County rife with all his army, and the next day being the first of July, came to Stri- Fild remouth gonium, they of the city not hearing of his comming before they faw him under their walls, from Doil to Wherefore the Turks in the Suburbs called the Rascian city, and they in the fort vader S. The. Strigenium. mas hill, despairing of the keeping of those places, setting are on the houses, and desacing the fort fo much as in that fudden feare they possibly could, fled into the lower towne. The next day the County without resistance tooke the aforesaid places for sken by the Turks, which he manned with certaine companies of Wallons, and made a bridge of boats ouer Danubius, cast vo certaine mounts, and did many other things for the furtherance of the fiege. In three daies he had againe repaired the fort under S. Thomas hill abandoned by the Turks, and therein placed foure great pieces of artillery, wherewith he began to batter the lower towns and in other places to fireit the befieged more than they had bin the yere before. The Baffa of Buda not ignorant of the want both of men & munition in the befreged city, (and the rather, for that they had but a little before sent part of their garison with shot & pouder to Rab and Dotis lattempted thrice (as he did many times after during the time of the fiege) to have by the river put new supplies both of men and munition into the city:but was still by the diligence of the Chriftians excluded, and enforced with loffe to returne. In short time the lower towne, which they call Wasserstat, or the Water-towne, was with continual battery fore beaten, so that scarcely any house or building was left whole; and a counterscarse made the last yeare beaten downe. Whereunto certaine Wallons were fent, onely to have viewed the bredth and manner of the D ditches after whom certaine companies of the Hungaritn Heidons presently followed, without any command of their captaines; who with great courage got to the top of another high counterscarfe, & there set up some of their ensignes. Which the Turks beholding, & comming The christians on close together, by plain force enforced them with losse to retire. Among these Hungarians reposed. were diversalfo of the Wallons flaine, with fome others of good name and place; to the great griefe of the County, being not a little offended with that disordered seruice: yet day & night the battery ceased not, & the Christians out of their trenches with their musket shot slew many of the Turks voon the wals, receiving little harme again, the Turks stil shooting sparingly. for feare of wanting shot and ponder at their greater need; yet that they spent they bestowed fo well, that amongst others they had slain source of the Christian canoniers, and one Wallon captaine. About the midft of July the County with continual battery had made the Watertowne(as he thought) faultable: and therefore sent certain companies to begin the affault: who having passed the counterscarse, found the ditch full of deep mud, and bur newly cut broader certain paces by the Turks, fo that it was thought scarce possible to be passed without a bridge. behind which ditch was an high wal, with strong bulwarks, and within al this was another new cast ditch, and upon the very brinke therof a thicke and high parapetrall which for all that, certain companies of Wallons with great labor and danger adventured to passe; but such was the valour of the defendants, and the small number of them that came on to the assault, with the disaduantage of the place wherein they stood, that at length they were glad to retire with the loffe of many of their fellows. The Christians in the beginning of this fiege had taken a little Island in the river before the city, which was kept with some few companies of the Lord Palfi his Heidons , whereof the Turks having intelligence at Buda, with three gallies and certaine other vessels, landed in the Island 3000 foldiers, which slew the Heidons, vato whom no succor could be fuddenly fent, and forecouered agains the Island: wherein they left a sufficient garrison for the keeping thereof, furnished with all things necessary, and so departed.

About three daics after the former affault the Christians in hope of better successe about cond time affaulted the Water-towns in which affault the shidfo deaders were the Lord and Anthony Zinne a famous captaine, had he not flained bit honour with County Haddel Rab : but being pardoned by the Emperous, that now effether with the reft appointed and fernice most couragiously assault the breach; but were againe by the Turks nousbyis apple and enforced at last to give over the assault, and so to retire with the losse of 150 mens and whom Binne himselfe was slaine, with one Captaine Bleger, and some of the Counties Guard : the Lord Greis was wounded in the head, and the younger Lord Schwend with dimen other Captaines grieuously hurt. The next day after street she mountaine people came ine the campe vitto the County, with supplications to request him, Not 40 giue ours the firstern. till he had woon the City; promiting him in the name of those Toward valents from whence they were fent, Of their own charges to repaire for him what harme fo such he flame do in the City for the taking thereof, year though he thould lay iceuen with the ground after why I the harmes they dayly received from the gariffon of that Citywere wonderfull brody

At the same time also he was advertised, by his esplats (of whom he maintained minutes ful of strige- the discouery of the enemies doings) that Maboner the Turkish Sultan had write not the fast of Buda carefully to prouide that his beloned city of Strigonnim tooks no harmented men foare either for men or mony in time to relieue it: and thereinito do nothing without the ad. uice and good liking of his old and faithfull feruanvialis: Beg, who of long sineched governed and also defended that city : and to the intent that nothing should be wanting for the perfer mance hereofithat he had fent Alexander, Aga of the Ianizaries from the Court (whole fernies 1 he might ill haue spared) whose approved counsell and helpe he might also vie all things. for that he had rather lose some other whole kingdome, than that one city a And that therefore he should bewate that it were not by the enemy woon, or by any composition welded wherein if he failed, he threatened vnto him his heaty displeasure, not to be appealed without the price of his head. Which to feuere a commandement of abourest Sultanethe Balla fent to them of Surigonium, with most gricuous threats from himselfe, if they, certified with any battery, vndermining, or affault, should yeeld the city, & not hold it out as became valiant fuldiers vnto the last man swearing to impale them al vpon stakes that should consent to the velding vp thereof. The old governor Alia Beg having received this fo Regra command from him that was both able and like youngh to performe what he had threatened svettilly so detectib x fouldiers from once thinking of yeelding, caufed diligent enquiry to be made throughout the garison, if any of them had at any time made any motion of yeelding up the city, or otherwise murmured against their captains or commanders appointing them to any service and such as he found to have so done, he to the terror of others caused to be presently executed; and after that went downe himselfe into the lower towne, to see that nothing were there wanting or amisse, where most danger was. But when he would have again returned into the vpper sown, he was staied by the Ianizaries, who told him, That seeing he was of so valiant and course ous a mind, and their Gouernor, he (hould there fray with them, and take such part as they dish were it better or worfe : and fo would he, or would he not, there needs ftay he muft.

Now the Bassacs of Buda and Temesware, with divers Sanzackes as well of those parts of L Hungary which the Turks possessed, as other places, were assembling their forces for there liefe of the besieged in Strigonium: whereof the Transyluanian Prince hearing, made show as if he would fortwith have befreged Temelware, fo that the Baffa thereof leaving the interded expedition for Strigonium, was glad to returne for the defence of his owne charge. They alfo of Stiria, Carinthia, and Croatia, with the troups of County Serima had for thopped at the passages, that twelve thousand Turks which were comming from Zigeth and the places there about, could by no meanes come to joyne themselves with their fellowes for the reliefcofthe

The bigher eig. The County leaving nothing vnattempted or vndon that might belp for the gaining of Smi gonium, bad made a notable fort vpon S. Thomas hill, and therein placed five great culturing! M wherewith he furiously battered the higher city, and did therein great harme : and therebysh fo brought to passe that no man could goe up or downe the hill betwiet the upper towne and the lower, but he was in danger to be fet off with those pieces, or the musketiers; who defer gled by those great pieces, lay vpon the fide of the hil in cames and but hes, awaiting for factor

A should go up or downe betwirt the two townes. Thus the Christians at one time battered the vpper towne, the lower towne, and the strong towne and fort of Gokara, standing on the further fide of Danubius ouer against Strigonium, besieged by the lord Palsi. But of all these places. Gokara was with the fury of the great ordnance most shaken; which the County perceiving, caused the battery to be encreased, and so continued, untill he had beaten downe the counterscarse, and made certaine faire breaches in the wall. Whereunto the Morauians (vnto whose lor it fell) the one and twentieth of July gaue an affault in fine divers places, whom the Lord Palfi seconded with his Hungarians, of whom certains were of purpose appointed, beside their armes, to bring things with them for the firing of the towne, which they in the time of the affault found meanes fowell to bestow, that in a while the towne was all on a light fire. The Getara taken by the christis. R Turks at first made notable resistance, but finding themselves overpressed, and seeing the town now on a fire about their eares, which with the wind so encreased, that it caught hold of the lower towne on the other side of the river; they retired to the river side, where some of them by boats got ouer to Strigonium, other some perished in the river, the rest falling into the hands of the Christians, were by them all put to the sword. Gokara thus taken, and the fire quenched, the Christians repairing the breaches, and storing it with all warlike provision, left in it a strong garrison. Within a night or two after, were two hundred of the Turks horsmen descried in a field fast by, which caused an alarme to be raised in the campe, as if the whole army of the Turks had bin at hand; howbeit those horsemen retiring, and no other appearing, it was afterwards knowne, that they were only scouts sent out by the Turkes to take view of C the army of the Christians, in what fort they lav encamed.

The latter end of this moneth it fortuned, that a young country fellow fecretly fent out of the city by the Gouernor, and falling into the hands of Palfi, was by him fent to the County. by whom he was in friendly manner demanded, from whence he came, whether he was going, and whereabouts ? Whereunto the youth frankly answered, That he was sent from the Gouernor with letters to the Bassa of Buda; which he presently drew out of his bosome, and deliuered them vnto the County: who after he had read them, caused them to be closed up againe, and so delinered to the yong man, with some few crownes, commanding him to carry them to the Bassa, as he was about, and in his returne to bring him the Bassacs answer, promising for his fo doing to reward him bountifully : which the youg man undertooke to do, and fo departed.

D) Now the purport of the Gouernours letters was, That if the Bassa did not within fix or seuch daies fend him aid and relieue him, he should for want of victuals & other things necessary for the holding out of the fiege, be inforced either to abandon the city, or to yeeld it vo into the enemies hands. Wherunto the Baffa returned answer by the aforefaid meffenger, that he would within the appointed time be with him, willing him in the meane time to be mindfull of his wonted valor, and not to be with any thing discouraged; appointing him the day, the hours, the way, the meane, with all the other circumstances how he would relieue him. Which letters the yong man according to his promise deliucted vnto the County, who thereupon prouided accordingly for the welcomming of the Baffa. Within a day after also, one of the Turks canoniers considering the danger the city lay in, and fearing that it would be lost, fled out of it into E the camp: who besides that he aptly declared the state of the city, and the wants the besieged were in, did also afterwards good service during the time of the siege. The Turks had in this while many times fallied out to their great loffe: yet now vpon hope of better successe, they aducntured the 29 of this moneth to fally out againe, but with like fortune as before, leaving fourscore of their men behind them, having slaine but fine of the Christians.

Now had the Turks in great wants by the space of a moneth right worthily defended Strigonium, expecting still for reliefe. At length news was brought into the camp, That the Bassa of Buda with 20000 men was comming to raise the sieges who the second of August came accordingly, and with his army encamped within foure miles of the Christians: lying so nigh, that certaine of the Turks horsemen seeking after booty, came very neere vnto the camp of the Christians, and out of the pastures, euen under their noses, carried away some sew horses: against these desperar aduenturers, certaine troups of the Hungarian and German horsemen iffuing out, had with them an hot skirmish; but the Turks of purpose retiring as men ouer- A thimish charged, and the Christians still following on, had at length drawne them vnto the place between the where diuers other troups of the Turkes lay in ambush for them, who now starting forth, on Christians,

The Hungarian light horsemen well acquainted with such a skirmiflees, feeing the danger, presently fled and left the Germans to themselves: who for while valiantly encountered their enemies, but oppressed with multitude, were glad stlass to fly alfo. In this skirmith of the Christians were lost and grieuously wounded about 100. The Turks encouraged with this fo prosperous a beginning, came on the next day with all their at my, being before resolued, by plaine force to open themselues a way into the city, and so relieue the besieged. Of all these things was not the County ignorant, as thereof forewarded by the Bassacs letters before deliuered vnto him; and had therefore with his army strongly belaied all the waies vnto the city. Neuerthelesse the enemy came still on between the hills S. Thomas and S. George, and neere vnto the suburbs called the Rasciancity, put themselves in order of battell, as did also the Christians, giving the enemy leave to come even to their tren. ches. In the mean time the Lord Palfi with his Hungarian horfmen fetching a compaffe about the hill on the one fide, and the Lord Swartzenburg with his horfemen on the other, had folia closed the Turks behind, as that they could not without great danger retire. Both armies of derly ranged, and the fignall of battell given, the Turks having before without any great harm done discharged 17 field pieces, came on after their wonted manner with a most hideous city. and at the first onset, with their Turkish arrowes, as with a thick shoure darkned the sky; when on the other fide the German and Wallon horfmen with their petronels fent their deadly that as thicke as haile among it them againe; and the men at armes after them taught the Turks to their cost, how visit their light and halfe naked horsemen were in a set battell tomeet with them so well appointed : in a trice, but not without great slaughter, the battell was brought to the sword and to be tried by true valor: There was to be heard a cry heavens high, the thundering of artillery both great and smal, the clattering of armor, the glistering weapons, the neighing of the horfes, the crying of the wounded, the heavy groanings of the dying, with the noise of the trumpets, drums, and other warlike instruments, made dease the ears of the hearers, prefenting vnto them nothing but horor and even present death. It was a most miserable sight to fee so many men in so short time slain: for the battell had scarce endured halfe an house, when many thousands of the Turks lay dead upon the ground, and the rest seeing the vistory incline to the Christians, betooke themselves to flight, leaving behind them their great ordnance and what socuer els they brought for the reliefe of the besieged: whom so flying, the lords, Palfi and Swartzenburg (who had before taken the ftreits wherby they were to paffe between the mount & tains) for received with their fresh horsmen, that of them that came that way few escaped. The Bassa himselfe, who stood upon the hill, seeing the discomfiture of his men, fled also himselfe: the Bassa of Natolia with about 100 of the Turks moe by good fortune got into Strlgonium. The number of the Turks flain in this battel was great, & is of divers diverfly reported, some faying that there were flain 14000, and some fewer. Besides them that were slaine, many were alfo taken, and some of them men of great name and place. There were also taken 27 ensignes, with a multitude of camels, affes, and mules, laded with mony, thot, pouder, and other necessary provision: all which, brought thither for the reliefe of the besieged, became a prey virothe Christians. In the heat of this battel they of the city sallying out, had entred a fort of the Chris stians upon the river side, but were againe presently driven out, and with losse enforced to retire. After this victory the County sent certaine companies of the Hungarian and German horsemen with 500 waggons to the enemies campe not far off in the mountaines: who comming thither found it vtterly forfaken by the enemy, but well stored with all maner of necesfary provision, which they carried all away, together with 600 tents, many whereof were lined with damaske, fatin, and other filke, richly embroidered or layed with gold lace or gold twist. The Bassass rich Tent taken by the Colonell of the horsemen, was afterwards by him given vnto the County, as was also the plate and money there found, all which hee divided among the fouldiers according to their deserts. In the Turks campe were also found certaine heads of the Christians, with the dead body of the Lord Brandensteine, flaine in the conflict but the day before, which the Christians carried away with them into the camp, and there ho- M nourably buried them. Those that remained of the Turks army hid themselves in the mountains and woods, and so holpen by the darkenesse of the night, made best shift for themselves that they could. The Baffa himselfe accompanied but with twenty horsecame to Buda about midnight, and by his comming filled the City with great heavinesse, every man lamenting

A bialoft friends. The Hungarian Heidons bolt acquainted with the countrey, pricking up and down the mountains and by waies, for certain days after the battel, brought in daily into the cases such prisoners as they tooke, or else the heads of such Turks as they slew. Of this so no. tablea victory, the County by a speedy messenger certified the Archduke at Vienna, who remarded him for his good newes with a chaine worth flue hundred duckars: and prefently caufed the fong of thankfgilling to be fung in the church of the Augustine Friers, and afterward in all the Churches of the City. The County also to gratifie the Emperour, sent him by the Lord Ghalon his nephew, vnto Prague, two of the chiefe prisoners taken in the late battell, with foure horsemens Guidons cunningly made of horse haires, such as are commonly carried before the greatest Commanders of the Turks armies, and sourceen other ensigns of the Turks.

with fourteen most goodly horses of the Turks for a Present.

The next day after this battell, the County fent the Lord Palft with an interpretor vnto the City to demand it to be yeelded: who having audience, declared vnto the Turks in what nanger they were, that they help they looked for was now quite ouerthrowne, new reliefe could not but in long time be fent vnto them; and that therfore it should be good for them, whilst yetthey might, to be well aduited, and betimes to bethink themselues of yeelding up the city. left hanly when they would, it then would not be accepted a promiting to intreat with the Genesall that they might in fafety depart, and with fure control be brought vnto fuch place of fasety as were convenient. Whereunto the befreged Turks answered, That the Christians had now five weeks lien at the fiege, and must yet lie three weeks longer; and that whereas of late C some few of their friends came to have relieved them, and had failed therein, there was yet an hundred shouland mos to come after them, who if they should not be able to performe that they came for, yet that they would not for that deliver or for fake the City, before they were ready to be drawne out of it by the heeles, and that yet they would then take three daies to refolue thereupon.

Now had the Christians with long and continuall batterie fore beaten both the upper and the lower towne, which battery they now maintained with greater fury than at any time from the beginning of the siege, & within the city their wants increased daily, having nothing left to live vpon but a little wheat and barley, with some horse flesh to whom thus distressed, the Lord Ralfi by the commandement of the County (to try what confidence they yet had in D themselves) the ninth of August sent two Gentlemen to the city, to do a message from him to the Goulernor. What things in particular these Embassadors were sent for was not commonly known, but among others it is faid, That the Muscovit requested the Emperor to send an Embassador to the Persian king, to draw him also into the league with them against the Turkiwhich Embasfador should first go into Muscovie, and that way passe into Persia. The presents which the great Duke sent the Emperor, were 1 50000 florins of gold, great store of most rich furres and pretious perfumes deamed to be of exceeding value, two white Falcons, and three Leopards aline. Immewitte the Embassador himself presented vnto the Emperor of himselse, certaine rich Turky, Persian, and Babylonian hangings & carpets, certain timbers of sables, with other sich furres as pretious as sables, so many as eight porters could hardly carry. These Embasfadors tarried at Prague until the 27 of December, and then taking their leave, returned with C the Emperors answer to the Duke.

But to geturn again to Strigonium: The Christians now possessed of the lower town, bent all their battery vpon the higher town, where it fortuned the 14 of August, That the old Go. The contrasts pernor Alia Beg, whilst he was carefully walking from place to place, to see where most danger fair. was, had his arm fruck off with a great shot, of which hurr he presently died. He was a man of great grauity, about 80 years old, and had of long time notably both gouerned and defended that famous city, the loffe wherof was like enough to have bin vnto him greater grief than was the losse of his life there. Much about the same time also died the Aga of the Ianizaries, beeing before mortally wounded. Both the chief commanders thus flain the Ianizaries with the other foldiers and citisens made choice of the Bassa of Natolia (who as is afore said, escaped D out of the late battel into the city) for their gouernor, who with heavy cheer tooke vpon him that forlorn charge. The Christians not ignorant of the death of these two worthy men, in whose great and approved valor they supposed the chiefe desence of the City to have rested, were in good hope that now the rest would more readily hearken to some good composition: and therfore fent a messenger to demand, if they would yet whilst there were some mercy left yeeld the city. Who though they had loft their chief Commanders, with the greatest part of their garrison, and were in great wants both of victuals and all things els necessary for their descrice; yet their answer was in sew words. That they would hold it out even to the last man. The greatest cause of which their obstinate resolution was the streight charge the Bassa of Buda had given them for the defence thereof : besides that, they accounted the City holy, as R won by their magnificent Emperor Solyman, whom the Turkes generally had in a denout remembrance, and therfore thought it great impiety to deliuer it vp vnto the Christians. The next day after came Matthias the Archduke into the campe, who after he had wel viewed the whole army, and the maner of the fiege, he called together into his tent the chiefe Commanders, namely the Marquis of Burgaw his coufin, John de Medices the Florentine, and the Lord Paifi the Hungarian, to confult with them, what were further to be don for the winning of the city. Shortly after, he commanded the city to bee at once in two places affaulted: which was by the Germans and Wallons couragiously performed; but such was the valor of the defendants, that when the Christians haddon what they could, they were glad at last to give ouer the affault, & with loffe to retyre. About this time came the Duke of Mantua, with the three Counties his brethren to the fiege; and now the Turks began again to draw together neer to Buda, there to make head for the relief of Strigonium, & to be reuenged of the loffe they had before Sun rifing, made a great staughter among them, and tooke certain prisoners, of whom

All the while the Christians were thus busied at the siege of Strigonium, the Transylvenian prince was not idle, but in divers places did the Turks exceeding much harme; fo that now his name began to be dreadful vnto them. It fortuned the fame day that Count Mansfeli departed at Comara, that the Prince at Alba-Iulia with great folemnity maried Maria Chrislina the daughter of the late Archduke Charles, son to the Emperor Ferdinand; her other fister Anna being before maried to Sigismund King of Polonia. For so it was agreed for the more affurance of the league betwixt the Emperour and him, That hee should take his wifeout of the house of Austria, which he now did. Of this solemnity the Turks his euil neighbours has uing intelligence, affembling to the number of 30000 or more, thought as vnwelcomeguents to have come vnbidden or vnlooked for thereunto; but the vigilant prince vnderstanding of I their comming, provided for their entertainment accordingly, and ferting his pleasures for a while apart, and comming upon them when they least looked for him, in a great battellouerthrew them and flew most part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant Victor the whole spoil of his enemies.

About the same time the Transylvanians also besieged Fagiat, a town holden by the Turks not far from Temesware; where after they had lien twelve daies, they of the town dispairing to be able long to hold out, came to parley, and covenanting to depart with bag and baggage began to go out of the town. But in their departure, vnderstanding that the Bassa of Temes ware, with the Sanzacks of Lippa and Ienne were comming to their reliefe, they that were yet in the town began to find delaies, and they that were already gon out began to return. When with the Transylvanians much mooued, by plaine force entred the town, and put them all to the fword; and afterward turning upon the Bassa, who with ten thousand Turkes and certaine field pieces was comming to have relieved the Town, had with them a cruell battell; where in most part of the Turks fell, with small losse vnto the Transylvanians : who so eagerly pur

fued the victory, that the Baffa himselfe had much adoc with 500 others to escape. The two Sa nzackswith divers others of good place were taken and fent prisoners to the Prince. Not long after about the later end of August the Transylvanians besieged Lippa, a famous city of Hungary standing vpon the river Maracz, not far from Temeswar: which the Turks being nor able longer to hold, fled into the castle, where finding themselues in no great sa ety, after three daies fiege they came to parley, and so yeelded, yoon condition that they might in safety depart with fo much of their goods as they could themselves carry. Of which the great Sultans displeasure Fe. rat was not ignorant, as forewarned therof by her that best knew, even the Sultans mother, and aduised not to come in sight until his peace were made. Among all the dangerous enemies of the Christian commonweale was none at this time more cruel than was Sinan, an Epirot born, a fishers sonne, of a rough and vnciuill disposition. now about 83 years old, euen from his youth brought up in the Warres, and yet (as his motto was) breathing nothing but Bloud and war. He had many times fortunatly led the huge armies of the Turkish Emperors, Solyman, Selymun, and Amurath, and is now sent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fittest man to reduce the late revolted countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, to their former thraldom, which he before promifed vnro Mahomet, vpon perill of D his head to dog. Hee having raised a right puissant army, by a bridge made of boats (after a months labor spent therin) passed ouer the great river of Danubius into Valachia. Vntill that at length the Turkmonercomebyinde valortheir battels being quite dif- sinant greek ordered and imolen, were now glad to feeke to faue them felues by flight. In this battel (be- army defeated ing foughe the eleuenth of September) besides many thousands of the common souldiers, by the Translation were flata affordiders of great account amongst the Turks : amongst the rest, Haider Baffa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead even in the same place where the battell was fought, Singuitimelie in meking too much hafte to get ouce the bridge, fell into the deepe mud, and in ther general confusion of his samy was like enough there to have perished ; but as the common prouerb goeth, Solden lies be he Dinel dead in a dike, the old Viliard was with much ado drawn out by them of his gard, and influento further mischief. The old Bassa thus ouerthrown, ful of grief, and euen made for despight, posted him lift in all hait to the court; thinking it better himselfe to make the best of that which was indeed naught, than to have it made worfe than naught by the enuious report of others and withal to fil the great Sultans mind with defire of reuenge, which no man fo much longed after as him. felf. Wherin he so discreetly vied the matter, as that the late losse was easily past our and ceiued by the common chance of War, or any other occasion else what soener, rather than by any default of his; and new Commission given him for the raising of another Army for the funduing of the late revolted countries. In the mean time, to thew his hatred onto the Chris. H ftians, and to please the eies of them of the court with the nouelty of the fight he caused an hundred & twelve Christian captives whom he had in prison at Belgrade, to the brought like beaft in chains to Constantinople, and so being led thorow the principal streets of the City. to the vain contentment of the citifens, to brought to the court gate for the Sultan to look vp. on, and the Courtiers to deride. From whence they were after many vnspeakcable indignities conveyed to most miserable and loathsome prisons, there to be fed with the bread of ribulation.

The Turkes OHERLBrown

About this time the Turks under the command of the Bassa of Bosna, to the number of ale most 20000 made a road into Croatia; where they were by the Christians under the leading of the Lord Eckenberg and Leucowitz overthrown and almost all slain the Christians follow. I ing the chace even into the Turks frontiers, burnt 15 of their villages, and took the Caffle of Varuiuar. Immediatly after, their forces increasing by the comming in of the Lord Herbenflein governor of Valeria and Windifmarch, and certain other troups of horfemen out of Carinthia and the countries therabouts, they returned the 13 of September to beffege Petrinia otherwise called Petrowina, which because they were in hope to take by assault, they even at their first comming couragiously affailed. But after two hours hard fight, finding both great ter relistance and more difficultie than they had before supposed, and that without great ordnance (which could not in (hort time be got over the mountaines) there was no good to bee don, they were glad to give ouer the affault, and with fuch doffe as they had received to return to Sileg, there to consult further of the matter. But the same night a fugitive horsman fled K from the enemy came to the camp and told the Christians, That Rullan Beg governor of Petrinia was in the late affault wounded in the breft with a final florand dead & rhat the Turks in the town discouraged with his death, and the lateouerthrow of their friends in Crossia, would upon the first sight of them abandon the town, if they would but again return to be sign it. Vpon which good hope the Christians presently rise, and set forward again toward Petrinia, which the Turks, hearing of their comming, had before, as the foldier reported, for fear a-Petrinia taken bandoned, So the Christians without reasslance entring the town found therin some pillage, but better flore of shot and pouder; and prefently fending for correin troups of the femilia to pursue the flying Turks, took divers of them, and among it the rest the late governors sinte nant, whom they brought back into the town. Thus was Perrindangain recoursed from the Turks, to the great quiet and fafety of all that fide of the country in the main?

Sigifmund the Transylvanian prince not ignorant with what amenemy he had to do either of the malice of old Sinan, (who he knew would not be long before he returned) of yet of the Polonians secret practise for the drawing of the country of Moldavia from him; seeght now by all means (as it stood him spon) to make himselfens strong at he could against to many flormes arising. It fortuned that even at the same sime the Laculians (better knowne by the name of Siculi) in former time a free people, but as the hitributary water the Turks, bordering vpon the Northeast part of Transylvania,now weary of the Turkish thrasdom and feeingth good fucces of the Prince; and the lath repolted commiss their neighbourt, effered with Prince their feruice ; promiting of their own change to maintain forty chouland men in the M field during his Wars with the Turke, and yearly copay thin of elery houses Dollar, with a certaine Measure of Whear, Oats, and Barley, after the manufacture of their own Connery and the ther, That if God should blesse him with a son costucted him in his government, every like

A sholder should give vnto him a good fat oxe. For all which service they craved no more, but that as his subjects they might live under his protection; yet so, as to bee governed by their own antient lawes and customes. Of which their offer the prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their camp, and all the people fworn to the performance of the aforefaid agreement. And having at that present but 25000 in the field, they without delay fent out their officers to presse vp 15000 moe, for the filling vp of the promised number of 40000, wherwith they came to the Prince; who taking a view of his army, found himfelfe to be now 80000 strong, to welcome the Bassa withall when he should come again into his country.

Now had Sinanwith great speed raised an army of 70000 choice soldiers, amongst whom were many whole bands of the Ianizaries, the strength of the Turkish Empire. With which B power, joined vnto the reliques of his other broken forces, he thought himself strong enough for the subduing of the Prince. Vnto whom also afterward came Hassan Bassa, son to the great Baffa Muhamet, one of the Turks most renowned men of War, and Bog danus the late expulsed Vavuod of Valachia, with many others of great name. With this Army the old Baffa by a bridge which he with exceeding charge had made of boats, passed ouer the great river Danu-Sinan passet bius at a town called Zorza or Giorgo (with vs S. George) in Valachia, a great way beneath our Danubius that place where fomtime the Emperor Trajan built his famous bridge of ftone worthily ac in Valachia counted amongst the rare and wonderfull buildings of the world. From Zorza hee marched made of boats. to Tergovista, (somtime the Vayuods chiefe City, but then in the Turks power) where is a notable Monasterie, which hee converted into a Castle, fortifying it with deepe trenches and

C strong bulwarkes, and good store of great ordnance; purposing to make that the seat of his war, vntill he had again restored those late revolted countries vnto the Turkish empire, which he vpon pain of his head had undertaken to perform. The Prince both by messengers and Letters understanding of the Bassa's arrival there, and having his army in good readines, fet forward to meet him and give him battel. But being come into Valachia, and there incamped, it is reported, That a great Eagle descending from an high rocke thereby, called the Kings Rock, and houering ouer the Christian army, flew about the princes tent, and there lighting, was taken and presented to the Prince, who commanded her to be kept as the presage of his good fortune, holding on still his way; and the fifteenth of October being come within halfe adaies march of Tergovista, he understood by two Christians lately escaped from the Turks, D That two daies before, the Turks hearing of his comming, were strucken with such a general and sudden seare, that Sinan had much adoeither by faire meanes or by soule to stay the lani-zaries from flight; and that when he had done what he could, yet that certaine companies of them were quite fled and gon. But the truth was, That Sinan feeing the general feare of his Army, and he himselse no lesse searfull than the rest; vpon the Princes approach sled with all his Army, leaving behinde him for haste his Tents, his great Ordnance, with much victualls and other warlike prouision; carrying with him onely such things as were of most value. As for the city of Tergovista, with the castle which he had made of the Monastery, hee committed to the keeping of Haffan Baffa and Bogdanus the late Vayuod (now become a renegat Turk) with a garrifon of 4000 chosen soldiers, promising within a few daies, if need should be, to re-lieue them, but fled himself in all haste with his Army to Bucharesta, a daies journey from Tergovilla. From whence he presently writ backe againe to Haffan Baffa, willing him if hee could to defend the castle; but if he should think it not possible to be kept against the power of the Prince, then betimes to forfake it, and to thift for himselse. But these letters being intercepted by the Christians, neuer came to the Bassa's hands. Not long after the departure of Sinan, the Prince comming to Tergovista, entred the forfaken Campe, where hee found many tents, with some Ordnance, and great store of victuals; and without further delay summoned both the city and castle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day after, Hafsan considering the flight of Sinan, the power of the Prince, and withall doubting, if need should be, to be relieved by Sinan, whom he not without cause suspected not to love him, was about upon some reasonable composition to have yeelded up both the city and the castle. To which the garison foldiers (being most of them Ianizaries) would not in any case give their consent, but flood upon the desence of the place. Wherfore the prince began suriously to batter both the city and the castle, and after some sew liours battery, by assault took both, and put to fword the whole garrifon only Haffan Baffa, as taken with his own hand, he spared, and two G. other Sanzackes. Bog danse the Renegate was there flain among the reft. The Christiens had there a rich prey, belides 42 great pieces of ordnance, and good flore of all manner of warlike provision. Hassan thus taken, grieuously complained, That Sinan had of a milicious purpose exposed him to so manifest peril, for the grudge he bare vnto his dead father the Visier Mabe met. vpon whom because he could neuer be reuenged, he now by sinister means had cunningly. performed it vpon his foneyet he craued of the prince to be wel vied, offering for his sanfome 100000 Hungarian ducats. Whill the Prince yet thus lay at Tergovista, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence fent forth to spoil the country, & to seek after prev, thinking to have there found him stil: who now falling into the hands of the Chris The fauitfulnes thians, were there all flain, and 60000 head of cattell recovered, which these Turkes had taken H out of Valachia and Moldavia, and should by Sinans appointment haue bin sent to Constantinople. For Valachia and Moldavia do so abound with corn and cattel, that they plentifully ferue the Imperial city of Constantinople not only with corn and flesh, but also yearely fend at least 150 thips thither by the blacke sea, laded with other kind of victuals. Of which so great commodities the Turks were now deprived, by the revolt of the faid Countries.

The Prince having a strong garrison in Tergovista, let forward with his army towards Bucaresta, hoping there to have found Sinan: but he hearing of the losse of Tergovista, and this king bimself in no good safety at Bucaresta, fled thence also to Zorza. The prince comming to Bucaresta, found it abandoned by the Turks, & so took it without resistance, yet had there in certain field pieces, with good store of thot and pouder left there by Sinan. Having there is staid a while for the maning of the place, hee set forward against owards Zorza, and that with such speed, that he overtook great numbers of the Turks, whom hee put all to the sword. So that the fields betwixt Bucaresta & Zorza were in many places covered with the Turks dead bodies. Nevertheles he could not make so great haste, marching still in good order, but that the fearfull Bassa disorderly hasting, was about some six hours or more before come vnot he bridge he had with great charge made over the river Danubius; the forme whereof you may here see.

The Bridge made oner Danubius by Sinan Baffa, Anno 1 595.

A Ouer the hithermost part of which bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the Sinan fliets. greatest part of his Army, before the comming of the Prince, got ouer into an Island in the midft of the river, wherin he had at his comming over incamped : but doubting now there to flav, with all the speed he could got him ouer the other part of the bridge, to the farther side of the river, with fo many of his men as in fo thore time possibly could: where to stay the further pursuit of the Prince, he brake the bridge on that side, and set fire vpon it; and therby cut off also many of his own men that were not as yet come ouer. Whom the Prince inclosing, forced many of them into the river, where they perished; the rest flying into the Island, were by the Christians fiercely pursuing them, either there slaine, or seeking by the other part of the bridge to have got over (wherof the farther end was before broken down by Sinan, and the B hither end toward the Mand now cut off by the Christians) were together with the bridge ca. ried away by the violence of the river, and so all together perished. Others of the Christians in the mean time took the bridge that leadeth to the castle of Zorza, which stands compassed about with an arm of Danubius, and being not very great, was kept by a garifon of 700 fcle& foldiers. Vntowhich castle the prince presently laid siege (the resolute soldiers being not by any means to be persuaded to yeeld it vp, but to hold it out even to the last man) and after he had fore battered it, by plain force took it, and put to the fword all the garrison souldiers hee could lay hands upon. About 100 of these Turks seeing they must needs fall into the power of their enemies, desperatly leapt from the top of the Castle into the river, where not one of them escaped, being all either drowned, or flain with small shot. In the winning of this castle C. 250 of the Christians were lost, and many wounded : but of the Turks and Tartars betweene the eighteenth and the last of October, perished about six and twenty thousand. In this Cafile were taken thirty inine great pieces, with fuch store of armor and other warlike prouision as might have ferued for a whole kingdom, and 4000 Christians, besides women & children. whom Sinan had taken out of Valachia, restored to their former liberty. With whome the Prince, after he had fet all things in order, returned in great triumph to Tergovilla, and to afterwards to his palace at Alba Iulia, where, as also at Claudiopolis and other Cities thorow The Prince vehis dominions, he caused publique prayers, with thankes giving to Almighty God to bee de tarm with vi woutly made for fo great a victory: as did also Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, who in all Hory to albathele great wars against the Turks was nothing inférior to the Tranfylvanian himfelf.

A greater losse than this the Turkish Emperor received not at land in many years before; being by this so happy and victorious a prince, and the revolt of these three countries, deprived of so much territory as they had not from the Christians in long time gained. It was by some of the better fort of the Turks that were taken, reported, That Sinan Bassa should oftentimes say, That this yong Transylvanian prince had bereft him of all the honor and renowne he had with great travel got in the course of his long life; and that although he had escaped his hands, yet that he seared he would be the cause so thim in these his great years, even in the winding up of all, to lose his life together with his goods and honor. Now was the Transylvanian princes name (after the overthrow of this great Bassa) become dreadfull to the Turkes, and also famous thorow all Christendom: which as it hath filled the ears of many with admiration, so haply may the lively representation of his seature, by cunning hand set forth, seed the longing eies of some with delight, and serve in better stead than the rude description of his person.

Of Christ thou wert a soldier true, inferior vnto none;
Thy countries ioy and glory great vnto the world well knowne.
If worthy Vertue, that thee rais'd about the starry sky,
With stedfast pace had run the race so wel begun by thee.

Jenna yeelded to the Tranfylvanians, Whilst this worthy prince was thus busied in this expedition against Sinan, hee caused the castle of Ienna, standing upon the highway betweene Temesware and Giula, to be besieged by certain of his Captains appointed to that service; in which castle lay one of the Turks Sanzacks with a garrison of 700 Turks, who much troubled such as passed that way. They now brought to some extremitie, and terristed with the successe of the prince, offered to glue up the Castle, so that as souldiers with their scienters by their sides they might in safety bee Mought to Panoda. Which their offer being accepted of, and they now upon their way, the Hungarian light horsmen that should have conducted them, informed that these Turks now under their charge, had secret intelligence with the Turkes in garrison at Giula and Temesware, That they should lie in ambush for them neer Panoda, and so cut them off by the way;

A serve on these Turks whom they should have conducted, and cut the throats of sour hundred of them and yet still holding on their way, metwith these Turks that lay in ambush for them, whom they after a sharp skirmish over thew, and having slain a great number of them, put the rest to slight. By the taking of sena the waies therabout were quieted, especially for them of whom they asked as and sanzack of sena the waies therabout were quieted, especially for them of who his Bassa's and Sanzacks in Hungary, That such casses and towns as they thought were not to be defended against the Christians, they should be times as occasion scrued yeeld them so for sand them, so to spare the needlesse losses of hold oldiers, of whom he had with so many towns and strong holds lost no small number this year in Hungary. Ienna thus taken, and children with their treasure and such other things as they made most reckoning of, out of the city in wagons, to be conveyed vnto places of more safety: of which Wagons seventy sich booty.

Mahmet having this year fully purposed the veter ruine of the Transylvanian prince, and the reducing of the countries of Transylvania, Moldavia, and Valachia vuto his oberifance by teth in the great Bassa Sinan; had for the better effecting thereof before provided, That the Crimtartar (ready stil at his call) should with his own people (whereof he hath great store) & certain bands of the Turks, at the same time invade Moldavia, & possessing himself of this country, to place one Sidrake Vayuod, in stead of Stephen placed by the Prince, and to people the Country with his Tartars, in reward of his good feruice, as he said; but indeed to have them always neer at hand to do his commandements in Hungary, Polonia, Transiluania, or the other countries of the Christians thereunto adioining. The Tartar according to his appointment, same with 70000 Tartars, accompanied with their wives and children, to have planted them felues in the countrey, at the very same sime that simin came to Tergonista. But being come vpon the frontiers of Moldavia, to have put in execution what he was by Mahomes commanded, he found there Zamas shie the great Chancellour of Polonia ready with a strong army to oppose himselfe against him, and to stay his farther passage. Whereupon some light skirmishes passed betweene the Tartars and the Polonians: where the Tartars were still put to the worse with the losse of 3000 of their men. The Tartar Cham with Sidriake the Vayuod appointed by the Turke, sinding themselves, though in number moe, yet in strength inferior who the Polonian, and that without his good leave he could not passe; sent who the Chandellor to excuse that was alread is past, as done without their consent by the infosence of the souldiers; and to tell him. That their comming was not to sight with him, as having expresse commandement from the great Sultan Mahones; in no case to disturbe the league betwixt him and the Polonians, but quietly to passe by their frontiers into Moldauia, and thereto place sidriakt Vayuod his tributarie, in stead of stephen that now vsurped the place by the appointment of the Transiluanian, which that they might do, they crauded his leave as friends to passe. Where to desend those commandement of the king to desend those countries from the inuasion of such as had in them nor right. St that there had so flong time bin an entient league betwixt the Polonian Kings and Turkish Emperours, your certains conditions, which he would for his park keep similars with the force of the Turkish certaine conditions, which he would for his part keep inviolate, with the favor of the Turkish Emperor, yet so, as that the kingdome of Polonia tooke no harm therby, and that they might quietly lius by him as their good nelghbour, which league he protested not to have been by him, but by them infringed as for to give them passage, he said he could not. Messens passage thus to and fro, and some parley had, at last certaine articles were agreed upon, to the reasonable contenument both of the Tartar and of the Chancellor (though not of Sidriake, disappointed thereby of his Vayuodship) as also of the Turkish Sultan, whose pleasure they both seem'd so have in special regard. Heseapon the Tartar with his multitude presently returned, leaving the Chancellor to his owne designs; Now was it commonly thought, that the Chancellor had don ahe Transistanian Prince great service by keeping out of the Tartars, & much bonour was by many that saw least spoken of him therefore. But far was it from his thoughe so do the Transistanian therin any such good, at whose glory he chuied, and had with the cardinal and his brother, the princes uncles (but most deadly enemies) secretly conspired, somuch as in them was, his veter ruine and ouerthrow: withing those Countries rather in the subjection.

Whereunto the hauty Baffa (then fearing pothing leffe than that which immediatly after happened, to be driven our of those countries by the Prince) proudly answered. That it was not the great Sultans mind that I the Polopians should at all inuade Moldania, for that beside he could without their helpereduce those countries to his obedience, he had given that country so the Tartar in reward of his good feruice alreadie don in Hupgary and other places, whole fuhice the Tartarswould ere long be ready with their wives, and children to take pollession of a Neuerthelesthe Chief. cellor proceeded to defend the new Vayuod by him placed: whichwas no great matter for him to do Sinan the Turks champion (as is before declared) being prefently after energh own and driven quite out of those countries by the Prince. This foul dealing of the Polonian in Moldavia much grieued many good Christians, as rending to the general hurt of the Christian commonweal. For which cause the Emperor by his Embassadors sent for that purpose to the Polonian king, sought to persuade him to desist from such invasion of the Transylvanian Prince by his Chancellour, as not standing with his honor; and that some good reconciliation might be made betwist the prince and the cardinal Bator & his brother the Princes vncles, authors of all these troubls. To which purpose also the R Pope fent a messenger with like instructions and letters to the king persuading him nor so to profecute his wars against the prince, but to turn his thoughts vnto a more peaceable & Christian-like course, especially with him whom he was so neer linked to in mariage. To the like effect hewrit also to Cardinal Bator; and after many grave admonitions, percuptorily cited him to Rome. But forasmuch as the proceedings of the Polonian against the prince are more plainly to be gathered by the Popes letters vnto the King, it shall not I hope be mistaken, if I here fet them down, as I find them by others reported.

Pope Clement the eighth; To our best beloued Sonne in Christ, sigismund by the grace of God, King of Polonia, with the Benediction Apostolical sendeth greeting.

BY how much greater affection of fatherly love we embrace your Maicflie in the Lord, fo much the The Protester more fernently wee wish all your actions to bee adorned with the greatest commendation of wishome tersonio the bolb before God and men. Wherof it proceedeth, that we are fo much the more wehemently and grieuou- Polonian King. By mooned, if we hear any fuch thing of you as may feem not agreeable to your vertue and approved Zeale toward the Catholike Religion, or tending to the obscuring of the glory of your name, as is now brought unto us concerning the affairs of Moldavia wheref not without great grief we write unto you. And torchearfeshings a little before past . With what earnest nesse dealt I with you, that for Gods cause, and D the defence of the health and liberty of the Christian Commonwealth against the tyrannie of the Turkes, you would combine your felfe with our most dearly beloued some Rodolph the Emperour, and many other Christian princes? And that you should not let slip so notable an occasion, so worthily to descrue of God, of the Catholique Faith, and of the Christian Commonweale in generall? And albeit we then thought, as well for many your owne prinat respects, as also of your Kingdomes, That you were to be born with all and excused, if you did not now openly descend into this confederation of the Christian Princes, against the most mortall and Common Enemy, neither apertly loyn your forces, or gine aid for the represing of his infolencie : yet we alwaies affured oor felucs, That no let flould in any cafe proceed from you, whereby either the Emperour or the other Christian Princes should be the rather hindred, infly to prosecute their injuries, or to cast off from their necks the heavy yoke of the most cruell Tyrant; whose defire of sourcaigntie is not comprised within the compasse of any bounds. But that you should in fauour of the Turkes im-Pugnethe Catholique Princes and defenders of the Christian Faith, and so joine hands with the Enemies of the Croffe of Christ, as that by your help their force and fury should be increased and ours not only weakened, but in the very course of victorie hindered, and cast into most grieuous perils; this wee have not only not thought of you, but not so much as once suspected : yea and can scarfe now be persuaded to beleeueshose things to be done by you, which are reported unto us as most true and undoubted. For the report goeth, That you having intelligence with the Turks and Tartars, have with them conspired . And Bamely against our well beloued Sonne Sigismund Prince of Transylvania, who with inviteible courage fighteth the battells of the Lord; and lest he should be able to abate the force and the attempts of the most proud Enemy (which by the singular mercy of Godhe hath hitherto about his owne power performed) but rather be inforced much to fear his owne estate, a new Vayued or Prince as it were, by atriumvirate authority and compact to bee placed in Moldavia, and him by the Turkes, You, and the Tartars together, to be made Gouernour of that Countrey. Which unto us seemed so new and to strange, and contrary to the good opinion we had alwaies conceined of you, yea and so unbefeering your reale and G w. scaom that for grice and admiration I had almost cried out with the Prophet, You heavens bea. mafed at this, and you gates thereof be you exceeding heavy. For what could be suffected or ima. gined further from the expectation of vs and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigilinund the most religious King of Polonia and Sweden, who had alwaiss professed himselfe a most carnest desender of the Catholicke Religion, who was ready even with his owne blond to redeem the wittery of the Christian, and glory of the Croffe, against the most wicked enemies of the same, to be upon the sudden become to up. like anto himselfe, and (so much as in him was) to ent off the hope and happy successed that Religious Warre : and to do harme to a Christian and Catholique Prince, not to refuse to joyne in league and friend this cuen with the most barbarous Nations and the Tartars, the perpetuall enemies of himselfe and of the king dome of Polonia. For which causes our minde is tormented with such bitternesse of griefe, that wee H could not but by speedy messengers write onto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the son. ner fee the oreatnesse of our griefe : and we also without delay might fignific unto you, what our fatherly loue towards you requesteth in so important a matter. For haply we will send one even of purpose to you concerning this canse, the care wherof grieneth ws more than can be well expressed. Wherfore most dearly beloved forme exhort you, and in the most effectuall maner wee can, advise you and befeech you in the Lord more attentiately to confider, what great diffleafure both of God and man, this your action andrefor lution may incur what a flaine it may brenz white your Crowne and dignitie. For beleene ws, that arete you in flead of a father in Christ, who love you not feignedly, but faithfully, and indeed; who wish for your alory in this world, and your eternall felicitie in the world to come : believe ws (I fay) this doth much blemish your fame with all Christian Kings and Princes; all mentake it in eaill part, and detest it as a 1 thing monfrom, that it should by your means be wrought, that the Christian affairs should not profeer. that an heroical! Prince, who had vowed himselfe for Christ and his Country, should not have proferous successive in this so necessary and religious a war against the Insidels, Turks and Tartars, no lesse yours, or peraduenture also more yours and other Christian Princes enemies, than his. But what do we say ? youto hinder the proceedings of the Transylvanian Prince ? this were haply but a small matter nay verily, by this means not onely a Christian and Catholique Prince, and valiant Champion of the Christian failb (a vertue both admirable and amtable in the very Enemy) but your owne brother in law bound valo you with so many bonds of "ffinitic, whose children shall be as it were your childrens breshren, is by this means brought into great danger, and exposed onto the fury of the mercileffe Turks. What do youthen my most dearly beloued fon? Beware that all men both now living, and hereafter to come, condemne you not of the K greateft inhumanity. But beware yet more that you feem not ingratefull not onely to your ownnigh kinfman but to God himself, who hath bountifully blessed you with two great king domes, and so many good things, and that you prouoke not him to wrath against your selfe, that rejecteth and confoundeth all fuill and wicked denices; and that this mischiefe that you have brought upon your brother, by the just indement of God redound not to the greatest destruction of you and your king dom, which he in mercy forbid. Doe youthink, that the Tranfylvanian being ouercome, you fall in fafety line from the trechery of the Turk? Do you not know him to be a faithle fe man which measureth all things by his owne profit, which keepeth faith with none but as stands with his own commoditie who with an insatiable desire gapeth after every king dom, nay thir steth after the destruction of all Christendom. Think also my son, what wrong you shall do unto the Emperor your cousin out of whose Imperiall bloud you have becotten somes and heires, and by Gods grace (hall more; but also our dignitie and the dignity of this Apoltolicall feat (which you have alwates to demoutly honored) is therby hart, and your most dear mother (which we know you of all other least would) the Roman Church is offended, which for maintenance of this facred war is at very great charges? and our forces which by you ought to have bin relieved and increased being in so waste a time by these firs in Moldavia diffeuered and diminished, and the enemies on the contrary increased and strengthned, into what danger and distresse may both our armies of the Church and the Emperors fall? And withall, how greatly all the maner and managing of this whole war is therby confounded, every man feeth. Moreout, which no leffe concerns the dignitie of we and this learned See, we have undertaken and certainly promised to our dearly beloved fons Rodolph and Sigismund, that you should no way hinder or hurt their affairs. Nor d dwe herof affure them upon light occasion, but moved with great reason, not only because we M on hi fo to do in fo suft a cause, but also for that it was so unto us plainly and expresty written by the rentrend father the Bishop of S. Severus, our apostolick Nuntio with you whom we know to be faithfull to vi, and so you dutifull : neither can we by any means doubt thereof, because hee writ unto us concerning so waighty a master, that be received it even from your owne mouth. Which things fo standing, seeing you your felf fee the manifest absurdities of this fact on energ fide, not to feak of the heinousnes thereof we requelt you again, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to apply the necessary remedies to these hurss. The Tran-Selvanian Prince your brother in law, denoted to your felf, and desirous of your favour, either protect with your defence, or at least wife hurt him not : yea hurt not the whole flate of the Christian Commonwealth. and relieue not by any means the quarrell of the enemies of Chrift. If you have any controversie with the Prince Sigismund, or defire of him any thing, refer it unto us, that is to fay, to your most louing father. You know your affairs to be of us fauored, and we hope by the power of God it may cafily come to paffe, that Come convenient means may be found, wherby peace and quietnes may be confirmed betweet you, and good R valtie grow betwirt you two brethren our fons, and so all the root of bitternes and displeasure to be vitterly plucks out of your minds. This have I writ unto you my fon, frankly and from a fincere heart thoughtruby much grieued, because we love you, and are much carefull of your honor and good. Shew you agains indeed that you take it to as written from your father; and that you altogether prefer our fatherly or wholsom exhortations before the finister persuasions of others. Further concerning these matters you shall onderstand by the same Bisbop our Nuntio now with you, to whom you may, as you have done, give credit in all things, as to our felfe.

These letters dated from Rome the eight day of November, were delivered to the King in Decembers with others to the Cardinal and Chancellor, whom the Pope sharply reprodued, as the authors and contrivers of all these mischiefs.

The Tartar Cham, before stirred up by the Turkish Emperor Mahomet, for the invasion of Moldavia (as is already before declared) about this time fent his Embassadour also vnto the Polonian King, for the confirmation of such articles as he had before agreed upon with the Chancellor: which because they manifestly declare the ground and purpose of his intended expedition into Moldavia, with the foul collusion of the Chancellor with the Turks & Tartars against the Transylvanian Prince, I thought it not amisse, or from our purpose (for the more manifestation of that which is already said here to set them down as they are translated out of the Tartar Language.

Cham Kazikieri, vnto the King of Polonia and Sweden, our Brother, one of the great Lords amongst the Christians, humbly boweth his head.

I Irst we signific unto you I bat Aaron Palatine of Moldavia was a forsworn traitor; who having ga. The Tartars thered a power of the Valachians, and joyning unto him the Polonian Coffacks, spoiled the teritorics lived Colonian of the great Sultan. But afterwards diffention arising among St them, the Hungarian Coffacks living in Valachia, sent Aaron in bonds unto the King of Vienna. After him followed another traitour called Rozwan, who also having raised certain companies of soldiers, began in like manner to forrage the coun-E tries of the Turkish Emperor therabout. Which as soon as he had knowledge of he writ unto me his brother, That I hould with all possible speed go into V alachia to chastise these rebels, to burn their houses and towns , and having with the edge of the fword flain their men, to carry away with me their wives & children into captinity. Having this in charge, I the great Cham of the great territory of the great Lord Karykterey, with my brother Letikerry Galga, and other my brethren & Counfellors, warlike and valiant Captains and Murzis : mounting myne horse, came with myne army into Valachia unto the River Prut, where it meeteth in another River called Cocoza: here we chanced upon a fait hfull fernitor of yours our brother the Chancellour, who was also come a little before vs into Valuchia; with whom after some light contention, when we began to be more tractable, hee declared unto us, That he was of purpofe come into Valachia to place there a new Vayuod; which (as he faid) of antient right belonged unto the Polonians, without any wrong or preindice therinto be don to the conenants and league they had with the Emperor of the Turks: and defired. That one letemias whom he had appointed Vayuod, might have the command of that province and that the antient amity, such as was in the time of Sultan Solyman and Cham Daw lethgerd, wight be faithfully kept , Which when I had on my part faithfully sworn to do and he also had caused the same to be done by such of his as he had therfore sent unto me; we decreed to gether, That the Cossacks on the farther side of Nijester (disordered and rekellious man), should be utterly nonted out that they should not hereaster do any harme in the territories of the great Sultan, and thus the Presims of sultan solyman, should no more be distanted nor any harms be hereaster done in any part of our dominion. And therefore when the Chancellor had promised with over that he would take order that these Cossacks should be utterly destract that call consistency. That he would take order that these Cossacks should be utterly destract that the ray nod single according to the pleasure of the royal Maiels y of you my brother, leventian should hald the ray nod single V alachia: which I forthwith by letters signified who the Turkish Emperor. Now if it beso, that your Naiels you shall give your consent unto those things which we have here agreed upon with your Chancellor, you shall then for ever finde brotherly friends ship with me, my brother, and all other our captains and starties: but if you shall not destroy these Cossacks, you shall not then perform the cash and concennismade. These things we have commanded to be declared unto you by our Embassacra our brother Gianach Metalgra, whom we request your Maielty curteously to entertain, and by him to send the presente union who we will not now thus year send any other.

After the Tartar Embassador had deliuered those letters vnto the King, with a speech in effect to the same purpose, hee in the name of the Cham gaue vnto him an horse and an arrow for a present: and afterward being brought to a lodging appointed for him, was commanded there to expect his answer. At length his dispatch was given him in Letters sealed vp, which he took much against his will; requesting the king to send an Embassador vnto the Cham, and surther by word of mouth to tell him what to answer vnto his Lord. But other answer could he get none, than was already deliuered him in writing: and so rewarded with a gownessured with Sables, was dismissed without the present requested by the Cham, or any Embassador to accompany him.

Thus the Transylvanian Prince, on the one side mightily impugned by the Turk, & on the other by the setting on of the Turke, ready to have bin no lesse indangered by the invasion of the Tartat, received greater harm from the Polonians being Christians, than from both those great Mahometan Princes: the Polonians in some sort performing for the Turk, what bee had plotted to have bin don by the Tartar, & so by the taking away of Moldavia from the prince, not only weakned his strength, but also opened a way for the barbarous enemy into his Country. How beit much it is that the Polonians alledge for the excuse of themselves, & defence of that which was by the great Chancellor then done in Moldavia; which for that it cannot be better told than by the great Chancellor himself, let vs heare how he by his letters answereth the matter even vato Pope Clement himself.

John Zamoschie, vnto Clement the eighth the great Bishop.

Zamofeby bis letters to Pope Clement. M Ost holy and blessed Father in Christ, and most gracious Lord, after the kissing of your most blessed if seei, and my most humble commendations, I have by your Holinesse Letters directed both wat the Kings Maiesty and my selfe, waderstood, as well bis royall Maiesty and my most gracious Lord and Massier, as also my selfe as his servant, to be both accused wat o your Highnesse, as if by those things by widow in Moldausa, the endeavours of the Christians had bin hindred, and the power of the enemy consistend, Wher of I am not with many words to purge my self with your Holinesse, for smuch as I assured, where your Holinesse to have already sully understood both what the things were that were done in Moldaus, and how they were don; partly by the Kings Maicsties Letters, and partly by the principall Secretary, for that cause as specially sent unto your Holinesse. That if it hath known me for a man, will not say of any capacity or without even of the least experience in the world, or of any religion at all, so to persuade it selfe of mee, nothing to have bin done, especially in the Matter, wither rashly, or to the hinderance of the Christian commonweal. I will not now repeat what myst opinion was concerning the league and consecution to be made with the rest of the Christian princes, for combining their forces against the Common enemy, especially his sacred Maiesties: as also what myse one later or indeavor was in the last assembly of the States in the high court of parlement: which thing after it

A was cuen by whom is most concerned either delayed or negletted or veterly cast aside and get his Marelly had fil a great defire to do the Christian commonweal some great good, talso to the ottermost of my power labored to that end 3 that by the common decree of the king dom an expedition might be made into Tartary, not so much in revenge of the inturies don by that enemy in these late years past, as so in the meantime to turn him from the necks of the Christians, as that he should not join hu forces with the Turk. Or if it so pleased God to blesse those our indeaners reterly at length to root out that so great a mischiefe. But how is came to paffe that this expedition, so much by the King desired (yet scarcely began or taken in hand) took not effect, it is not for me to declare, for that I suppose your Holine se hath by others, especially your Nuntio, underflood the same. In the mean time, by Letters and often me flengers news was brought, that Sinan Baffawith agreat army was already come ouer Danubius; and I by letters from the Vaqued of the R farther Valachia was advertifed how that he not able to incounter him had for faken that province which at the first impression taken and almost veterly wasted by Sinan, hee was now some fast upon Transilvania : and in Moldavia the Tartar was fill expetted; infomuch that Rolwan (who having taken prifener Aaton the Palatine whom he scrued in his house, and so himself injoyed the Palatine) began now also to anake for fear, and to crauc belp of me, or rather to feek how he might fly away (as not long after hee did) neither having any great frength about him, or expecting any greater from the people of that countrey for why that pronince was brought fo low by the mijeries of the former yeares, but effecially by fuch as had easilt governed the same, that at such time as I entred into Moldavia, I assure your Holinesse there were not init of houshelders about 25000, and those also for the most part poor country people of the bafelt fort in whom there could neither be any great help neither if they had bin able to have don any thing aurit Rolwan have trusted himselfe with them, upon whom he had with all kinde of cruelty tyrannifed. Chotim a castle in the very confines of this king dom, was kept with no greater Garrison than 200 Hungarians, who perceiving themselves neither of sufficient strength to hold the place, nor to withstand the enemy, they also by and by followed after Rolwan. All the rest of the prouince was not only unarmed, but without any defence at all , two castles only excepted, which standing upon the confines of Polonia might have lerued better for the enemy out of them to have infelted vs than for the defence of Moldania against them. So that had the enemy once fet foot into that pronince, neither could it without a great power have binrecourred; neither being recourred, could easily have bin defended against so puissant an enemy; and that which worfe was was not it felf alone to have bin confumed with that fire, but like enough to have caried away with it Podelia also bordering upon it with a great part of Rascia. Wherefore in this state of n things, when as that province was in greatest danger to have bin lost, and so many enemies houered not more over the heads of all Christendom, than over this Kingdom, what was of vsto be done ? I know to whom I speak these things, even unto him, not only whose Divine wisedome, but singular love also toward my native countrey is to me most known. Verily I entredinto Moldavia with no great Army, yet such a one as haply (as in like case it often chanceth) Fame had made among it the enemies a very great one, So that Sinan fearing, if he should thrust himselfe with his Army into the streits whereby he was to breake into Transilvania, to be fout in by our Army, stayd his journy, and the Tartar the more earnestly he was called upon by Sinan, by reason of the same of this our Army, resolved to make himself so much the stronger. So that whilf he affembled the Nogaian Tartars and others farther off, and fo from all parts raifeth the greatest power that he could, the matter was delayed almost unto the end of November: at which time hewith a most buge Army, accompanied with Sendziack Ichiuense, and agreas power of the Turks rai. sedout of their prominces there by, came directly upon me in the fields of Coroce. Sendziak the Tartar Cham his fifters for now called himself the Bassaof Moldavia; as did the Tartars eldest son name him. felf Prince of another part of that province alfo. For fo that Country was to have bin divided betweene them, that that part which was next unto the Tartars dominions should be alotted to the Tartar, and the other pare confining upon thu king dom, to be gonerned by Sendziak, as Baffa therof, and fo to make at the feat of a perpetual war, from whence Podolia, Rascia, and the lower Polonia might be with continual incup some wasted anen before our faces. Concerning which matter they now dispersed their letters, wherein they published the power and authority given them from the grand Seignior, exhorting the people of that country to receive the same. A whole day we fought with this multitude, our men alwaies by the goodnes of God basing not only the upper hand, but without any notable loffe alfo, yet not without great flaughter I theirs: and would to God I had had such strength, as that not onely the conditions of peace, but even the enemies themselves might have bin in my power. But when we were oftentimes come to parte (they fill requiring the same) and so at length to conditions of peace; if such were given them, as wherby this only king dom had mithout the wrong of any other byw delinered from fo great and funden adanger subut rease 6 Conable man could finds fauls thereps to, if we fould have professed the health of our countres (whereum all good men owe all they have before others profits & But now shafe things were forden as have were in lelle promided for the good of the neighbor Christians, yea and baply not the least for theirs; who for the Come flander this king dom unto your Holinoffe. The fury of Sinan Baffa marby this meaner represent who whill he feared to be fait up trathe firetts by our urmy now zome into Meldawia, and expected the Tartars comming, frent almost all the reft of the summer sillely unitaristions doing any thing . The Tar. tar himself was not only turned from the bowels of Christendow, whereinto he had purposed Via thereare before) to have entred, we having with our own brefts received his force and fury but being brought wa to conditions, was empresy enjoyned in 4 most short prefined time, and without any more harm deing to re. turn again into his country by the felf fame way he came, and by no other : wherey inis comese puffe, that 14 untill this day Christendon hathmot this year get felt the fury of the Tartars weapone. Busmine Tran-Cilvania and Hungary, what a face and power was given for them to gather their frength and farces to. gether, and out of the same places to appose ag ainst the enemy when as our Army kept them fafe at their backs, and cased not only Moldavia, but Valachia and Transplvania, also of that care ? Whereas if this confe of delay had not ben obicited, to the Turks first, and after unto the Tartars a not to fay and thing. of. the Turks, the Tartars at the very felf fame time that the Tranfylvanian army was gon into Kalachia as gainst Sinan, might have broken into Transplvania before it could have returned home con clamarch. ing directly towards that army, might have met with it out of Transquania. As for Moldavia, which tou gether with the memory of the Christian name yet left in it had utterly perished, it was most manifelted preserved by the comming of our army. Which what end it would have had, if the enemy at his plasure 1. might have raged as he did in the farther V alachia, those most bitter remembrances init jet atthir day Smoking do well declare : out of which it is well knowne more thousands of Christians have bin carried away into most mi serable captivity, than almost out of any other province in all the time of this miserable wars. Which though it be thus, yet boalt we not ther of, neither fend we any triumphant letters unto jour Holineffe, nor brag we of any good feruice done for the Christian commonweal but content our felues with the conscience of the thing it self. In the meantime we are accused unto your Holinesse. But for whit. cause? If any man complain for the taking of Moldavia. I will not say it was by them before willingly form. (aken, whill I was yet in the frontiers therof, but that this king dom hath a most antien right winto it, and such a right, as that our Kings busied in their wars against the Muscovit, the Cruciat Teuronie brethren, or others, some others also troubling the state theref; it for a time became a prey unto the Turkish Tyrants; yet in all the Leagues made or renued betwiet this king dom and them, it was still excepted, That. all fuch things as the Palatine of Moldavia was of duty to perform unto the King, fould by him fill be performed. Which Kings of Polonia, and namely Augustus himself, the last of the lagellonian Familie ly, appointed divers of thole Palatines themselaes. Which although they be things milk manifely, yet han wing more rogard to the welfare of that province, as a Christian country, than of our right, wereflored to into the same state wherein it hath bin for many yeares before thise * Warres. Wherefore if anyman. doe thinke any thing done, wherby the enemies of the Croffe of Christ might be eased or strengthmed or the Defenders of the faith hindered ; it is fo far from any such thing to be don that rather (as inbefore declared) the enemies forces are repressed and averted, and greater means given unto the Christians ufront to impugnahem; the enemies being at their backs by ws four from them But I fear they have not fully inford In med your Holimesse, how these things were done, who have reported water gour said Holinesse, not onely the name of the Turks to have bin proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldavia, but also the hame of the Tartars, the proper enemies of the Polonians, and by the power and decrees of them three, with werd confederatiogether, things to have bin ordered in Moldavia. Which their complaint if it tendto that end, as if a confederation were made with them, I frankly confesse certain conditions to have been given them, but such as wherby is provided not only for the quiet and secunitie of this kingdom, but notes all for the whole Christian commonweal, as is before declared: All which things for all that, all bough then were done for the good of this king dom, and all Christendom in generall , yet were they fo done that they were all referred by me unto the Kings Maiesty, and the States of this kingdom, so that, at this present the King is at free liberty either to loyn in confederation with the reft of the Christian Princes or afteration nor upon certain and indifferent conditions be agreed upon "yet with no mans injury or hast torishing the this joyned with the health and good of a great part of the Christian commonweal: only God grant that the Christian Princes was Grien and that the Christian Princes was Grien and the christian Princes was great part of the Christian Princes was great part the Christian Princes may scriously think both of this fo Christian, a confederation against the Common

This have I written at large, as respectful which I most himsely before higour Holinesse wish your divine wisdom to consider of and with your when I tedelemency to accept the same wand so prostrat at your Holinesse feet; I mast hambly commence me to your Clemencie, Prom Zamolchie the tenth of lanuary, 1996.

Thus much the great Chancellor in defence of himselfe, and of that he had don in Moldavia which how foeuer it contented the Pope, wel I wot it nothing pleased the Emperour, and much lesso the Transylvanian Prince, now not a little weakned by the taking away of Molda.

Toend this troublesome yeare withall, many sharp and bloudy skirmishes yet daily passed in divers places of those frontier countries, the Turks almost in every place still going to the worse. In the beginning of Nouember, Leucovitz gouernor of Carolitat the second time forb prised Wihitz in the frontiers of Croatia where thesewars first began; but being not able to take the castle, contented himself as before with the spoil of the city, and afterward terting it on fire, departed. Maximilian also attempted Zolnoc: and the Christians in gerison at Stri-C gonium and Plindenburg, now become neer neighbors unto the Turks at Buda, did with cofttinual inrodes not a little molest them both all the larer end of this year and the beginning of the next. And the Turks in Braila in Valachia vpon the fide of Danubius; fearing after the flight of Sinan to be belieged by the Vayuod, for look the city, & in such hast passed the river, that in that turnultuous passage three hundred of them perished Sinan Bassaby the Fruhsylvanian prince of late driven out of Valachia, was not long after fent for to Constantinoples but the crafty old Fox not ignorant of the fierce nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late miserie of Perat, found occasions to delay the time so long vntill that hee was sent for a gain, and after that the third time also. In the mean while he had so wrought by his mightle friends in court, and by rich rewards mightier than they, that at his comming to the court he D was there honorably received, as chief Bassa, and being afterwards offered to be discharged of the wars, as a man about 80 years old, hee refused so to bee, saying, That hee was borne and brought up among foldiers and martial men, and so wished among them to die: as not long The death of after he did, as it was thought of conceit of the cuil successe he had in his Wars against the Sinan Basta.

Mahomes the Turkish Emperor exceedingly grieved with the losse of so many his Cities and strong places lost this yeare, viz. Strigonium, Vicegrade, Sifeg, Petrinia, Lippa, Ienna, Tergovista, Bucharesta, Zorza, and many others of lesse name; and both by letters & messengers understanding daily of the slaughter of his people, and wasting of his frontiers, commanders ded great preparation to be made against the next Spring : giving it out, That he would then B in person himself come down into Hungary with such a power as neuer had any his warlike predecessors, and there take most sharp revenge of all his former wrongs. Nevertheles these his fo hasty designes were by the plague & famin (both which then raged extreamly in most parts of his empire) and by other great occurrents of the same time, so crossed, that by that time the Spring came, he fearcely welknew which way to turn himself first. For besides these troubles of the West, of themselves enough to have filled his hands, the Georgians in the East (a warlike people) moued with the good fucces of the Christians in Valachia and Hungarie, had taken up arms against him: and the old Persian King but a little before dead, had left that great kingdom to his fon, a man of greater spirit than was like to endure the manifold injuries before don vnto his father by the Turks, to the great dishonor of that kingdome, and prejudice of himself. Of which things the Basia of Tauris gaue him ample intelligence, withing him becimes to provide for that from : which joined vnto the reft, filled his head with many troubled thoughts, wherunto we leave him untill the next Spring.

The Trafilvanian prince careful of his estate, and not a little troubled with the diffeuering ty varo the

of Moldavia, thought it not whit for his affairs, now after the dight of sines and diffemniture c of the Turks, to go in person himself to the Empury, to declare two him the wrong donhim by the Polonian; and further to conferre with him concerning, the manneging of the Wester against the common enemy. So having pural things in readings for his journy, he see formed in lanizary, 1 396, and by the way of Callovia the fourth of Pebruary arraned at Prague in Bo. hemis; where he was by the Emperors appointment most honorably entertained. But immedietly after bis comming thither he fel fick of an ague, which grienoully verted him for three weeks space. In the later and of February having somwhar recovered his health, he went when the church, where after his deuotions done, he was by the Dean of the Cathedral church welcommed with a most eloquent oration, setting forth his worthy praises, and surther animating him vnto the like exploits against the common enemy of all Christianitie. Whereinto H he forthwith answered in Latine so eloquently and for readily, that all men maruelled that heard him. Protesting in his speech, That as he and his subjects had not hitherto speed their lives or goods in desence of the common Cause; so would they not afterwards sparethe same. but adventure all for the benefit of the Christian commonweal : wel hoping that the Emperot and other Christian princes would not as occasion required bee wanting wato him with their forces, or the Clergy with their prayers. Which done, he doubted not (as he faid) by the power of God, but to obtain more notable victories than he had yet, against the Turks the Enemics of God

The Siculi re-

Whilst he yet thus lay at the Emperors Court, it fortuned that the people called Siculi, offended to have their liberties in some part infringed in the late assembly of the States holden in Transylvania in December last past, rise vp now in armes in divers places, refusing to yeeld their former obedience vnto the Prince. A matter like enough to have wrought him much trouble, and supposed not to have bindon without the privity of the Cardinal his Vacle t but by the wisdom and courage of such as he had in his absence put in trustwith the gouernment of his country, divers of the ring-leaders of this rebellion were apprehended, and in divers forts executed; and 300 of their complices, to the terror of others, had their nofes and cars cut off. By which wholfom feuerity all those troubles were appealed, and the Country again quieted.

At the same time also the Transylvanians obtained of the Turks a notable victory, with an exceeding rich booty. Mahomet the Turkish Sultan had about this time sent a new Bassa for K for the government of Temesware : against whose comming the Bassa the old governor had in 75 wagons truffed vp a wonderfull deal of wealth, which hee had there gotten in the time of his former gouernment; to have bin together with himselfe with a strong convoy condu-Red to Belgrade. Of this his purpose the Hungarian Heidons lying at Lippa and lenna hauing intelligence, lay in wait for him vpon the way, and in his paffing by fet vpon him; where in a sharp conflict they ouerthrew the conuoy, and slew the Basta, whose head they sent as a present to the Princesse at Alba-Iulia, and took the spoil of the Basila's carriages, wherein was taken a wonderfull wealth; for in one of thosewagons is reported to have been found 20000

The Balls of flaine, and a great booty

In this absence also of the Prince, 10000 of the Rascians revolting from the Turke, came L Hungarian ducats. and offered their seruice vnto the Princesse: wherof she by letters with great speed certified the Prince her husband : who therupon hasted to dispatch with the Emperor, and having proeured both from him and the Pope the promise of some aid to be afterwards sent him, took of him his leave, and being honorably accompanied, departed from Prague to Vienna, where he arrived the 11 of March, fitting in a princely Chariot drawn with fix most beautifull horses, the gift of the Emperor. At his comming thither he was met by the Nobility of the Comtry, and by Aldobrandinus the Popes nephew, who presented him with three goodly horses for service, richly furnished. Him the prince took into his charet, and so accompanied entred the city, where he was with all due honor receited and toyfully entertained, and fo brought who the Emperors palace, where by the learned students of that Vnsuersitie was for his pleasant M acted before him the notable history of Islue. Haning staid there three daies, and purposing to haue in his returne visited his mother in law as Greics in Croatia; newes was brought him, That the Turkes and Tartars by the fetting on of Stephen Bather his Vacle, were about to break into Transylvania. Wherfore changing his purpose, he departed thence to Presburg, and so with all speed kept on his way toward Transylvania, where to the great ioy & comfort of his subjects in general he arised in safety in the beginning of April.

In this while many hot skirmishes past betwirt the Christians and the Turks in the frontiers of their territories; and now the plague and famin which had long raged in Constantinople and other places of the Turks dominions began to asswage. Of which so great calamities as had denoured many thousands of his people, the Turkish Emperor finding himself fomwhat eafed, forthwith caufed the continuation of his wars against the Emperour and the Transylvanian prince to be three daies together proclaimed in Constantinople, and a great army to be raised to be sent into Transylvania and Hungary : giving it out, That he would B with that fo puissans an army in person himself passe into Hungary. At which time it was alforeported, That he had already fent his tents and other his necessary provision before to Hadrianople. For now was nothing more odious in the Turks court, than the name of the Tran-

Of all these things was not the Emperor ignorant, as fully therof certified both by letters and espials, as also by the uniform confession of such Turks as were daily taken prisoners. For which cause he also with as much speed and care as hee could, prouided for the raising of his army, as he had the year before; as also for the leuying of mony, and provision of all things neceffary, than the enemy at his comming might not find him unprovided. Neither spared he to pray sid of his neighbour Christian princes, especially the Polonian, whom he had divers C times sought to draw into the consederation with the other Christian princes against the Turk. Towhich purpose he now also sent to him the Bishop of Preslaw and the Lord Poppelim his Embassadors : as did the Pope also send vnto him the cardinal Cajetan his Legat; and the Princes Electors also their Embassadors: vntowhom the Polonian gaue good hearing and good words, but would not by any means be perfuaded to break his league with the Turke, or to afford any aid to the Christians; although the Cardinal with many pregnant reasons shewed him what small affurance there was in the Turks leagues, and how dangerous it might bee to his state, if the Turk making peace with the Emperor, should turn his forces upon him; as it was like enough he would, knowing no man longer for friend, than flood with his profit: beside the immortal blemish of his honor, by diffeuering himself from the vnion of the Christian princes, to hold friendship with the Turks and infidels. But all this & much more was to no purpose, so resolutely was the Polonian set down for keeping of the Turks sauor, So that of althe Christian princes so neervnto the deuouring enemy, none stood the Christian commonweal in lesse stead than he. Which for all that, most men imputed not so much vnto the King, as to others about him, especially to Zamoschie the great Chancellour, by whom that flate was most swayed; who was not only supposed, but openly reported to haue secret intelligence both with the Turk and the Tarrar.

All this while the Lord Palfi gouernor of Strigonium ceased not with continuall inrodes to vex the Turks even to the gates of Buda; as did also the other Christian captaines in other places of the Turks frontiers in Hungary. Neere vnto Buda were two great country villages for most part inhabited by Christians, who having given their oath of obedience vnto the Turk, lived a miserable life for the paiment of an excessive tribute yearly. These poor Christians weary of the Turkish thraldom, and the continual! spoile of their labours by them of Strigonium; by fecret messengers requested the Lord Palsi, of mercy to carry them and their goods and cattell away into some other place of the Christian territory, that so they might yet liue among ft Christians; as he had but a little before done for them of old Buda. Vnto which their foreasonable a request the Christian gouernor charitably hearkned, willing them against a certain appointed time to put themselves and all their things in readinesse. There was of these Christians about 755 families, who with their wives and children, & such trash as they had packet up in fourfcore Wagons drawn with fourteen or fixteen oxen apiece, at the appointed time about midnight committed themselues with all that they had, vnto the conduct of them of Strigonium, sent out of purpose for them, by whom they were in saferie brought to Strigonium. Among them were many rich men, who brought with them good flore of coyne, with an exceeding great number of cattell. Vito these new come guests Pals assigned certain fields betwixt Strigonium & Vivaria, on the North side of Danubius, where they to commodiously lined as was possible in to troubled an estate of a countrey.

Shortly after, 600 garrifon foldiers of Lipps feeking after booty, and adventuring toofer into the enemies territorio, were discouered by the Turks feours, & fo befet by the Turks and Tartars bilited in the country about Tomeswar, that there was no way left for them to eleme. Which they well perceiving, refolued among themselves (as became valuet mem) to figheir out even to the last man and with no lesse resolution performed what they had before determined, for being on every fide befer and hardly charged by their enemies, they as mea before resolved to die, although scarce one to twenty, sought most desperatly, seeking for nothing elfe but to fell their lives as deere as they could vnto their enemies and fo fighting were all flain except fome few which by great fortune escaped, leaving vnto the enemy 4 sight bloudy victory: ver by this loffe of fo great a party was the garrifon of Lippa greatly weakned, which the the enemy knew right well, and thereupon began forthwith to prepare to beliege the Towne. Which Barbelus the Governour (a most valiant man) wisely foreseeing, fent in post vato the Transviganian Prince, to request him with all speed to send him foure or five thousand good foldiers, with which power he doubted not by the help of God, to be able to defend the town against althe forces the enemy was at that time able to bring against it. To whom the prince Lippa befired without delay feut 8000, who all in fafety in good time arrived at Lippa: for shortly after their arrival, 40000 of the Turks and Tartars came and fat downe before the towne, inclosing it on every fide, and so lay for certaine dayes without any thing doing worth the speaking of they of the towne in the meane time doing them all the harmothey could with their great thot, which they fent among them not sparingly. But they had not so long lien, but that news 1 was brought into the camp, That the Transyluanian Prince was with a great power comming thither to relieue the towne; whereupon they presently rise, and retyred to the place where they had before incamped about two miles from Lippa: where certainly understanding that the Prince neither was, neither could in short time be in such readinesses was before reported, they forthwith returned, and more streitly besieged the towns than before. They had now brought with them seventeen pieces of batterie, eight waggons laded with shot and pouder, and forty fix others laded with scaling ladders and other warlike provision: thus appointed they began to batter the towne, and afterwards gave thereunto divers desperat assaults, which the Christians valiantly received, and still with great slaughter repulsed their enemies. For that strong town was with towers and bulwarks flanking one another, so fortified, that out of K them the Christians with their murthering pieces made great spoile of their enemies, and still inforced them with loffe to retyre, no bullet almost flying in vain. In the heat of one of these a sfaults the Gouernor caused one of the gates of the town to be set open, having before within the town placed fixteene great pieces at the very enterance of the same gate, charged with all kind of murthring shot. To which gate as of meer desperation set open by the desendants, the Turks and Tartars defirous of reuenge, came thronging as thicke as might be, thinking to have thereby entred: when fuddenly, and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the aforefaid murthering pieces cut downe as with a fithe, and so againe, and the third and fourth time, before they could cleere themselves of the danger thereof, their heads, armes, and legs, and other rent limbs, flying in the aire most miserably to behold. Neuerthelesse the was by them continued, & the often affaults fo resolutely maintained as if they had therupon purposed to have gaged all their lines. But this so obstinat a resolution was by an enexpected accident when they least thought, converted into such a desperat seare and assonishment, that they upon the fudden, no man forcing them, for fooke their trenches wherein they lay incamped, and leaving behind them their tents, their great Ordnance, and what soeuer els they had, they betook themselues to a most disordred flight. The Transylvanians, who by chance were euen then comming thither, pursuing them, slew divers of them, & took some others of them prisoners. At this siege, the Bassa of Temeswar himselfe was mortally wounded, and Hamat Sanzacke of Giula with divers others of good place flain, and 4000 of the common foldiers. The cause of the Turks so great and sudden searowas this: Whilst the Bassa of Temeswar lay M at the fiege of Lippa, as is aforesaid, they that were left in the City fearing no harm, lived in great securitie; in the meane time the Gouernor of Lugaz sent out six thousand souldiers to wards Tameswar, now in the absence of the Bassa to seek after booty: who comming to Temeswar with great speed, rifled the suburbs of the City, slew all the Turkes they could light

A vpon, and fet at liberty a thousand captines; and so having trusted up their booty, set on fire all their suburbs and departed. Which fire grew so great and so terrible, that it was plainly seen into the camp at Lippa, making a shew as if the whole city had bin on a light fire. Which so daunted the hearts of the Turks at the fiege, that they prefently fled (as is before faid) leauing all that they had behind them.

The Transylvanian all this while busied in raising of his army, and prouiding of all things Plenia sackets necessary for the maintenance of his warres, was come into the confines of Hungary towards Temeswar, euen as the Turks fled from Lippa. At which time certaine Hungarian Heidons that served him, getting ouer Danubius not far from Nicopolis, took Plenia a little towne of the Turks, which they ranfacked and burnt; and having flain in the country therabout about

Not long before, the Christians had surprised Clissa, a strong frontier town of the Turkes clissa regained in Dalmatia not far from Spalato: which town the Baffa of Boina fought now again to reco. by the Timber. uer, and thereto laid hard fiege. For the reliefe wherof, Leucowitz gouernor of Stiria and the other prouinces thereabouts belonging to the House of Austria, and the governor of Zenge. with a fleet of forty two ships, wherin they had imbarqued 4000 foldiers wel appointed with all things necessarie, fet forward toward Clissa and by the way lighting upon a galley of the Venetians bound with certain warlike prouision toward the Turkes campe, tooke her as good prize and rifled her. This fleet with a fair wind arrived at Siret, neer vnto Trau, where the gouernor landing his men, marched that night part of his way toward Cliffa, & all the next day C lay close. The night following they set forward againe, and having marched fifteen miles, came to the enemies camp before day: where fetting vpon the Turks in their trenches, fearing no fuch peril, they brought fuch a general fear vpon the whole camp, that the Turkes as men amased fled, some one way, some another, every man (as in such sudden sear it commonly hapneth) making shift for himself, leaving whatsoever they had in their trenches behind them. The Christians contented to to have put their enemies to flight, fel presently to the spoile, as more de sirous thereof than by the hasty pursuit of their enemies to put themselues in possesfion of an affured victory. Which the Turks quickly perceiting, and from the hills with the dawning of the day discouering the small number of the Christians, and how they were disordred, they gathered themselves again together, and comming down, inclosed on every side D the difordered Christians (greedily hunting after the spoil) and slew them downright. Leucomitz himself, with the governor of Zeng & some others got into Cliffa, where having staid two daies, and doubting to be able to keepe the fame, they fecretly by night iffued out with 600 men, in hope to haue recouered their fleet; but the Turkes suspecting such a matter, had so beset the passages, that of all that company, Leucowitz had much adoe himselfe with three others to escape. The enemy now again possessed of his trenches, laid streiter siege vnto the town than before: which they of the garifon perceiuing, and now out of hope of relief, agre. d with the Bassa, that they might with bag and baggage depart, and so yeelded up the towne. Thus Cliffa one of the strongest townes of Dalmatia, through the greedy conctonines of the disordred soldiers, sel again into the hands of the Turks.

About the fame time Palfi gouernour of Strigonium, understanding of the meeting toge-sambachtaken ther of certain notable aduenturers of the Turks at Sombock, a castle almost in the mid way by the L. Pals. betwixt Alba Regalis and Buda, raised the greatest strength he could, and so with certain pieces of artillery, and other things necessarie for an affault, set forward from Strigonium the two and twentieth of May, before the rifing of the Sun, and about three a clocke in the afternoon came to the aforesaid castle; wherunto he presently gaue a most terrible assault, which he neuer gaue ouer vntil he had taken it: for after he had by the space of three hours together, with great danger maintained a most desperat affault, at length he with much disficulty preuailed, and put to the sword all the Turks he found therein, man, woman, and childe, and with the reft, fifty Ianizaries but that day come thicher. This castle was of great beauty, and most pleasantly scituated, whereunto the Bassa of Buda oftentimes for his pleasure repaired: For which cause Palfi was very desirous to haue taken it without spoiling; but the fire be had already raised therein so preuailed, that it burnt downe all the goodly buildings thereof, with great flore of victuals and other prouision, nothing remaining but what the Christians had

Time/ware in

The Transylvanian Prince having raised a great army for the reliefe of Lippa, it beeing by G great chance a little before his comming relieued, came and laid fiege to the City of Temef. war, where he had not long lien, but that the Turks and Tartars, fearing to lofe that fo famous a city, affembled together from all places thereabouts to the number of 40000, and fo came to raise the siege. Of whose comming the Prince hearing, rise with his army and went to meet them, and had with them a great and terrible battel, the victory for a great while standing very doubtful, yet feeming to incline rather to the Turkes and Tartars than to the Christians. but at length the Turks disordered with the great artillery, and the Transylvanians charging them afresh, began to give ground, and so at last to betake themselves to plain flight. In this battel were flain of the Turks and Tartars 5000, and of the Christians 1500. The Prince was reported to be flain in this battel: which was not fo, being referred to the further plague H of the Turks, & comfort of his afflicted country. After this victory he returned again to the fiege, which he more fireightly continued than before, leaving nothing vnattempted that he could possibly deuise for the winning of the city. Where whils he yet thus lay battering the city both night and day, news was brought him, That Giaffer Bassa and the Tartars were comming with a great army to the reliefe of the belieged. Whereupon he confidering his owner frength, and the power of his enemies, and that the aid promifed him both from the Emneror and out of Hungary was not yet ready, with great griefe of minde raifed his fiege, and retyred with his army to Lippa, there expecting new supplies as well of his owne, as from his friends, Whilst he yet there lay, hee was certainly informed, That the Bassa of Natolia (the fore runner of the great Sultan Mahomet) was come to Belgrade with fourteen thousand horse I and four thousand Ianizaries, to joine with the Bassa of Buda for the relieuing of Temeswar: whose forces joined together were in number threescore thousand; and that Mahomet himself (of whose comming had been rife report all this yeare) was now comming after with a farre greater power. Wherupon he departed from Lippa, leaving therein a strong garrison, and fo returning to Alba Iulia, called there an affembly of all his States, for the repressing of so puissant an Enemy.

Makomet for the better successe of his wars in Hungary, had drawn forth the Tartar with a mighty power: who although he was at the first so vnwilling to that seruice (considering the great losses he had therin before received) that he would not as hee faid, send so much as one Affe therunto: yet ouercome with great gifts, and the respect he had to the Turkish Sultan, K was now ready with a strong army upon the frontiers of Moldavia, to meet him in Hungary: vnto whom the late chosen Vayuod sent certaine presents, with such store of victuals as hee could possibly prouide for him. Yet for a smuch as hee was not that way to passe without the Lauc of the Polonian, Mahomet had both by letters and diuers Embaffadours intreated with the Polonian King for his passage, as also for the confirmation of the antient league hee and the Polonian kings his predecessors had to their good of long time had with the Othernam Emperors: from which he welknew the Christian Emperor, with divers other the Christian princes, to feek by all means to draw him. Mahomet also not ignorant, how hurtfull and dangerous the confederation betwixt Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, and the Transylvanian, was vnto him and his designes; sent vnto him Embassadours, by the shew of great danger to L deter him from the Transylvanian, and by many glorious promises to allure him to submit himselfagain vnto his protection, and in token of his sidelitie to deliuer vnto the Sultan two of his frontier towns such as he should require; in regard whereof he should together with the Sultans fauor receive golden mountains. Wherunto the Vayuod answered, That as yet he was not weary of the friendship he held with the Prince: and for the towns here quired, that they were not in his power to giue, as belonging to the Prince; vnto whom hee faid hee would write, and stay the Embassador in the mean time vntil he had from him answer.

The Emperor on the other fide had with al carefulneffe fo far as in him was, prouided that his army might be ready to take the field with the beginning of the Spring:but as commonly it chanceth, the speedy proceedings of great actions (wherin the hands of many mighty are M required) to be much hindred by delaies, fomtimes of one, and fometimes of another, fo fell it out with him now: for albeit that his own forces were in some good time ready, yet was the Spring, yea and a good part of Summer also far past, before the aid promised from other princes, metrogether. At length after long expectance, when some conuenient number for an army was from divers places come together at Vienna: they were by the lord Swartzenburg and their other cammanders brought forth into the field, and not far from Altenburg encamped, within the selfe same trenches that were the last yeare cast up by County Mansfelt for the fafety of his army; there to expect the comming downe of the great ordnance and other prouision by the river from Vienna, as also the rest of the Christian forces dayly looked for. From Altenburg the Christian army remooued to Comara, and not staying there long, the foure and twentieth of July marched towards Vacia, otherwise called Woczen: but before it Vacia abandofoure and twentieth of July mareneo towards vacia, otherwise caned vy oezen sout before it a sea came thither, the Turks hearing of the approach of the Christians, for fooke the town, and with and of the Turks, a sate. their cattell and best pare of their substance fled to Pesth, carrying also away with them the bythe Corisi. great ordnance; the greatest whereof they buried by the way, which was neuerthelesse after-B wards found out by the Christians. And although the Turks at their departure had fet fire both vpon the towne and castle, yet the Christians left there did what they might to quench the same: by whose diligence and the helpe of two thousand sootmen, and certaine troups of horsemen sent thither by Swartzenburg, a great part both of the towne and the castle was preferued: the whole army of the Christians following after, encamped in the open field, and with their horsemen braued the Turks euen to the gates of Pesth. This so sudden a comming of the Christians brought a great seare both vpon them of Pesth and Buda, insomuch, that they fent their wives and children, with the chiefest of their substance downe the river unto places of more fafety, and farther off from danger: which was done fo disorderedly (as it hapneth in such common feares) that many of them for hast thrust one another into the ric uer, and so perished.

Hitherto in the former wars against the Turke, had Mathias bin Generall of the Christian armies: but now of late, Ferdinand the Emperors vncle County of Tirol being dead, Matthias was by the Emperor his brother preferred to the government of that rich countrey and the prouinces thereabouts, not inferior to some kingdomes; and Maximilian his younger brother appointed Generall in his stead : who departing from Vienna in the later end of July, came into the campe the fourth of August, where he was by the Lord Swartzenburg his Lieutenant, and the Lord Palfi, honourably and with great triumph received. Now were the Christians threescore thousand strong, and having fortified Vacia, and therin placed a conuenient garrison, resolued by common consent to besiege Hatwan, a strong Hatwanbesse. D towns of the Turks in the vpper Hungary. And thereupon rifing with their army from Va- grad by row chia the 13 of August, came the 15 of the same moneth about noone and sat downe before the towne, and that with such speed, that they were seene of the Turkes in the towne, before that they heard any thing of their comming: infomuch, that at the first shew of them, they of the towne rooke them to have been some come out to seeke after booty; and therefore fallying out vpon them, skirmished with them a while, vntill they perceived the whole battel comming. The Christians approching the town, encamped themselves as they thought most conuenient, and began in three places to batter the counterfearfe. This frontier towne of the Turks, besides that it was kept with a strong garrison, was also strengthned with a broad ditch, and fortified with a broad counterscarse and strong palisadoes. Whilst the Christians thus lay E at the fiege, the Turks fallying out of the towne, brake into their trenches, and there did great harme; and like enough they were to have done more, had not the horsemen in good time come in upon them and inforced them to retire. In this fally, amongst others was one Greis a notable captaine flaine, being shamefully for saken of his owne men, who for that their cowar-cowardife dife, were all in the fight of the whole army difarmed, and fo turned out of the campe as men purplied. vnworthy any longer to beare armes. One morning also as the Christians were at their denotions in their trenches, a Turkish priest from out of an high tower not far off, railed most bitterly vpon them, curfing and dericing them: wherewith one of the Christian canoniers much moued, made a shot at the tower, which he so well bestowed, that therewith he strucke downe the tower, together with the idolatrous priest, as he was yet rayling and blaspheming. At length the Christians had with exceeding labor & continual battery made the rown faultable:who to with the Turks discouraged, offered (but all too late) to yeeld up the town upon the same conditions that they of Strigonium had : whereunto they received no answer; yea, commandement was given throughout the campe, That no man vpon paine of death, should have any Parley with them. Shortly after, all things being now in readinesse for the assault, the Christians one a day about five a clocke in the afternoone, affaulted the town in four places, and after G three houses hard fight, by strong hand tooke it, with the scriching and lamenting of the wo. men and children, and other fearefull people, who now gaue themselves all lost and forloine. Foure houres execution was done upon all that came to hand, without respect of age, fer, or condition:women were flaine great with childe, and young children hanging at their mothers breafte; it booted not to cry for mercy, the bloudy fword denouring all The fury of the Wal lons here exceeded, who ript the children out of their mothers wombs, and made thong and points of the skins of men and women, whom they had flain quicke. Which their cruelty they afterwards excused when they were therefore reproued, by pretending that thereby they did teach the Turks hereafter not so wickedly to blaspheme against Christ, or with such their wonted and barbarous cruelty to torment the Christians that fell into their hands, for feare of H like themselves. In this affault and sury perished of the Turks about 4000, and of the Christians not past 300. In this towne beside that which the fire deuoured, was found a very rich prey. The first that entred the towne was one Terskie a notable captaine, with his company. after whom followed Ruswarme, who each of them were thought in their entrance at the breach, to have flaine with their owne hand eight or ten Turks.

.stahomet the great Sultan

Now in the mean time Mahames the great Sultan being come to Belgrade, removed thence to come downe into the heart of Hungary; fending Cicala Baffa before him : and at length efter da with an ar- long looking for, the second of September arrived at Buda, having in his army about two hudred thousand men, and three hundred field pieces. From thence he presently sent forty thousand to Temesware; but staied there himselse with the rest of his army.

The Christians yet lying at Hatwan, & doubting lest the Sultan suddenly passing the river should come upon them not yet ready for battell, departing thence, and setting backe sgaine, came and encamped not far from Vachia. And albeit that the Archduke before his departure from Hatwan, had left a convenient garrifon for the keeping of the townervet such was the terrour of the Turks approch, that the next day after, they that were there left in garrifon forfooke the towne, and ferting it on fire, followed themselves after the campe. This comming of the Turkish Sultan to Buda, brought also a great scare vpon them at Vienna, as much doubting left he should that way have turned his forces, which caused them both day and night to labor for the better fortification of the city, and for the prouision of all things, as if it had bin them great harme. But seeing the danger greatly encreasing, and that the city was not longer to be holden they fer it on fire; having before conveiled all the best of their substance with themselues into the eastle; which the Turks quickly perceiving brake so suddenly into the city, as if they would together with the Christians have entred the castle also, but in the attempt therof they were notably repulsed & many of them flaine. Adioyning to the oastle was a great and frong bulwarke, against which the Turks for certain daies furiously thundred with their great ordnance, and that without intermission; and having in divers places fore shaken it, in the space of two daies assaulted it 12 times, but not without the wonderfull losse of their men: & Abulwarte yet gaue it not so ouers but as men with their losse more enraged, came on againe with greater affaulted in fury than before, and foat last by plain force took it : and there put to the food all them they two daises found therin, except such as by good hap got betimes into the castle. This bulwarke thus lost, the Christians the next day sallying out, again recourred, wherin they slew a great number of the Turks, with the loffe of fome thirty men, and as many moe wounded. The befreged now divers times both by letters and messengers craved aid of Maximilian the General, giving him to understand, that they could not long hold out for want of thot and pouder, if they were not betimes relieved (whereof the enemy also was not ignorant) yet were they resolved to hold it out even to the last mansalthough the great Sultan had oftentimes by messengers sent of purpose, willed them to yeeld it vp, with promise that they should in safety with life and goods departsotherwise threatning vnto them greater extremities than was of late shewed vnto the Turks at Hatwan, if they should as obstinare men hold it out vnto the last. Wherunto they ne-C uer answered him any thing: for Terskie had forbid them all parly with the enemy; and in the midst of the market place had caused a paire of gallowes to be set up, threatning to hang him thereon, who foeuer he were, that should once make motion of yeelding up the city.

But Mahomet not provided for the vidertaking of fo strong a place, and not ignorant of the difgrace his great grandfather the victorious Solyman had sometime received under the wals thereof, had no purpose thereto, as having bent his thoughts quite another way. In the vpper part of Hungary is an antient famous city, well fortified and honored with a Bishops See, called Agria, not far from Hatwan; vpon this city, as the chiefe fortresse of the Christians in those quarters, had Mahomet at his comming into Hungary cast his eies, and began now that way to make head, with purpose by taking of that city, and placing therein a strong garrison, to himder the uniting of the Emperors forces with the Transyluanians, for the mutual strengthning of the one the other by the way of the vpper Hungary. Which the Archduke perceluing, fent thither forthwith the valiant Colonell Terskie with a notable company of Italians and Ger. L mans, and a thousand other harquebusiers, who all arrived there in safety. Atwhich time also the Lord Teuffenback fent into the city three thousand footmen, under the conduct of County Turne, with good store of warlike prouision needfull for the defence thereof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet attended upon by the great Ballaes, Ibrahim, Giaffer, Haffin, and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his army of an hundred and fifty thousand men, came and encamped betweene the two rivers of Danubius and Tibifcus, covering a great part of the country with his tents. Approching the city, he with wonderfull celerity cast up fue great mounts, and from them with such fury battered the wals, that the Christians were glad night and day to stand in armes for the defence thereof. And although that the wals were so great, and in many places so weakly fortified as that they were not but by a greater garrison to M be defended against so puissant an enemy; and that therefore the defendants with their honor lawfully might even the first day have set the city on fire, & retired themselves into the castle, which was both faire and strong and the only place to be trusted vnto; yet for the space of fix daies they worthily defended the whole city against the fury of the enemies; and out of it did

Whilest the besieged thus lay in hope of reliefe, the Archduke vpon the comming ouer of the Sultan towards Agria, having retired with his army to Strigonium, and there staid somewhat too long expecting the comming of more aid; began now at length to fet forward, and to make some shew as if he had indeed purposed to have relieved his distressed friends so hardly befet at Agria. But such was the foulenesse of the weather, hindring the passage of his great ordnance(not to speake of any thing else) that in fourteene daies he marched scarcely twelve miles forward. Whereby the enemy tooke occasion to prevaile as he did in his siege: who D now hearing of the comming of the Christians, and seeing to how little purpose he had so long battered the castle, converted all his indeauors to the filling vp of the ditch of the old cafile, with fagots, earth, and fuch like matter : for the hastening of which worke, Mahomet himselfe spared not to ride up and downe in all places of his army, with his presence and cheereful speech encouraging his men in that desperat worke. But whilest the Turks were thus busie in fulfilling his command, the Christians fallying out vpon them made great slaughter of them, and put to flight Ibrahim the great Baffa with fuch as were about him: after whom they fo cagerly followed, that he in the flight loft his tulipant for half, & was there very like to have bin taken. Neuerthelesse the worke went still forward, and was now at length with the restlesse labour of fo great a multitude brought to fuch perfection, that the Turkes thought it now no E great matter by affault to enter the castle : and thereupon the tenth of Ostober gaue vnto it foure desperat assaults one voon another, being still with greater slaught of his men repulfed. But comming on againe the fifth time with fresh supplies, and greater sury than at the The old castle first, they prevailed and so entring, put to the sword all they sound in the castle, in number sates. about eight hundred: foure hundred of whose heads one of the Turks captains caused to be carried vnto Mahomet in the camp, in the beholding wherof, he is faid to have taken great pleafure, as in the vindoubted fignes of his victory.

The old castle thus taken, nothing remained but the new castle, against which the Turks conuerted their whole forces, wher in they reposed not so much hope (although their battery were very terrible, and their power great) as in the secret mines wherewith they had in 14 places F vndermined the castle, and were now almost ready to be blowne vp. Which the besieged perceiuing, and withall confidering the state wherein they stood, and not hearing any thing of reliefe; resolued among st themselues (without the consent of their chiefe Commanders) no longer to hold out, but to yeeld. And thereupon altogether as if it had been but one man, rife vp in a mutiny against their two Gouernours, Paul Niari, and Terskie; who at the first by all the reasons they could deuise, dissuaded them from such cowardise, putting them in mind of a the oath they had taken : which not prevailing, they afterwards upon their kneep requested them as men to hold it out yet a while, in hope of speedy selicite yea, Teskie with his hands cast vo entreated them, that if they would no longer hold it out, but needs yeeld, then they should first kill him with their owne hands, that he might not live to see so great additioned But what availeth persuasion with men possessed with so great scare? And in the meaner interested into two hundred and fifty of the common foldiers, among whom were many italians, feeretly efcaping out of the castle fled into the camp, of whom divers became runegats & turned Turk which added to the former feare, so much discouraged the minds of the rest, that they forth with required to come to parly with the enemy, and so agreed, That they might with bag and baggage and their swords by their sides in safety depart the great Sultan giving his faith for the the performance thereof, with hostages deliuered on either side. So the 13 of Odober about noone, the garrison soldiers came out of the castle in number about two thousand; but they were not gone far, but that they were in a great plaine fet upon by the Turks and Tartars, and there cut in pieces; some of them were flain quicke, and some other of them otherwise shame. fully difmembred; the Turks in the meane time vpbraiding them, and faying, That faith was not to be kept with them that had so cruelly before dealt with them of Hatwan. This perfidi. ous dealing much offended divers of the better fort of the Turks, infomuch than some of them complained thereof vnto the Sultan; who (as is reported) caused some of the chiefe authors the 10f to be put to death : and afterward by open proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turks or Tartars had taken any of them prisoners, they should forthwith set them at liberty. I Thus is the famous city of Agria, of long time a Christian Bishops seat, now become a sure receptacle for the Turks and Infidels.

Tervinia beficged by the Whilest Mahomet thus lay at the fiege of Agria, the Bassa of Bosna with certain other of the Sanzackes thereabouts, having raifed a great army, came and befieged Petrinia in the borders of Croatia: which he at his first comming so furiously battered by the space of sevendaies. that it was of many thought not possible for it to hold out two daies longer. In the mean time the Lord Herbenftein and Leukewitze, with all the power they could make out of Croatia and Windismarch, came towards Petrinia: but having no meanes in so great haste tomakea bridge ouer the river of Kulp, they retired towards Sifeg, there to passe ouer. The Turks hearing of their retire, and supposing them to have fled for feare, put six thousand horsemen over w the River to pursue them: Vpon whom the Christians turning, and charging them home, ouerthrew them; and having flaine many of them, draue the rest headlong into the River, where most of them perished. The Christians neuerthelesse keeping on their way to Siseg there the next day by a bridge passed ouer the River, and so marching towards Petrinia, and being come neere vnto the Towne, were encountered by eight thousand Turkes, whom they also put to flight; and by certaine prisoners there taken, understood that the Bassa the day before was rifen from before the Towne and gone: which they at the first beleeved not, but comming thither found it fo, to their owne good contentment, and the great joy of the late be-

Maximilian the General marching on faire and foftly from Strigonium, at length the feventeenth of October came to Cassouia, soure daics after that Agria was lost and there met with the Transylvanian Prince, who was come thither with eighteen thousand men, and forty field pieces to aid him: of whom eight thousand were mercinary horsemen, fifteene hundred were of the nobility of his country, and the rest footmen. The next day after, they setting forward from Cassouia, joyned themselues with the rest of the army led by the Lord Tenffenbach and Palfi, and foof all their vnited forces made one army, confifting now of two and thirty thoufand horsemen and eight and twenty thousand foot: who drew with them an hundred and twenty field pieces, and twenty thousand waggons, wherewith they every night enclosed their army as with a most sure trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards: Agris, with a full resolution to give the Turks battell, whereof the whole army seemed to be very M defirous. By the way at length they came to a faire heath two miles long and foure broad, where they were to passe ouer a certaine river, the passage whereof Giaffer Bassa had before taken with twenty thousand Turks and Tartars, the rest of the Turks army lying still not fare from Agria. Now the purpose of the Bassawas, to have enlarged the passage of the river, and fo to haue made way for the whole army, to haue afterwards passed to the other side, as most commodious for many purposes, especially for water, whereithey so might themselves have had plenty, & yet kept the Christians from it. But of this his purpose, by the comming of the Christians he was quite disappointed: for the next day being the 23 of O Cober, they skirmithed with him in divers places, especially at the passage of the river; where at the first incounter he loft 300 of his men, and in the end feeing himfelfe too weake to withftand the whole power comming on, fled to the Sultan, having loft two of his enfigues & 20 field preces, but of his men not many, both for that he fled betime, and the approch of the night hindered the pursuit of the Christians, who were now become masters both of the passage of the river, and of the place where the Baffa lay which they finding not so commodious for them as they had at B the first supposed (especially for lacke of wood, the weather being then extreme cold, as also hearing of the approch of the Sultan with his whole army) they forthwith for fooke the same, and retired again ouer the river to the place where they lay before, inclofing themselves with their waggons, as if it had beene a city strongly inclosed with woodden wals. The next day which was the 24 of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his army shewed himselfe vnto the view of the Christians, and fent 3000 Tartars to passe the river : of whom the Christians flew a great number with their great shot, and put the rest to flight. Both the armies were populous and firong, and couered a great deale of ground, a most goodly sight to behold : both drunke of the fame river, as well the men as their horfes, and therfore kept continuall watch all that night on both fides of the river, especially at the passage. In the morning betwirt fix and C sewen a clocke, Mahomet with his army ranged in order of battell, came within sight of the Christians, his squadrons as it were covering all the country on that side of the river as far as the Christians could well fee; and now again fent part of his army ouer the river : with whom A great and the Christians skirmished from morning till night, both the armies parted but by the river, all tong stermiles this while standing fast, and as it were facing the one the other. But being at length on both Tarks or the fides well wearied, and many flaine, the Turks retired again ouer the river to the camp: in the confluent mean time (as if it had bin by confent) they refolued on both fides the next day to try the fortune of a battell; and so commandement was given through both the armies, for every man against a certaine appointed time to make himselfeready. So the next day, being the 26 of October, Mahamet brought forth his army again out of his campe, which was not far from the D Christians; and began now to draw downe towards the river. Neere vnto this place were the ruines of an old church, where Mahomir pluced certain companies of Ianizaries, and 24 field pieces, and commanded ten thonfand of his felect fouldiers to paffe the river, which they rea- ere thenfand dily did. The Christians also ready for battell and now thinking it time upon the comming Turkepage the

oner of the enemy to begin; with part of their army thereunro appointed, fo fiercely charged together with the Turks electwore already come out that they quickly out them, and not them only, the Tartate but certain companies of Fartars alfordhat were in another place come ouer the river and not so contented, but following them they had in chase, put to flight them also that stood on the faither fide of the sitter, of whom they flow a great number, and by the comming on of the reft pursute breaking togetherwich the Turks into their tents, and there killing a great number of

of the army, tooke from them 190 great pieces of artillery : whereof fo great a feare rife in army fled in all haftertowards Agria filedding forme reares by the way as he went, and wiping his cies with a piece of cheateners garment, which hee for reverence carried about him as arclique. Italien now nowards night, and the Archduke was about to have caused a retreat tobe founded; and that day to have done no more! But the Transy manian Prince, the Lord

Palfi, and the reff, perfuaded him in thanforgreat feare of the enemy to profecute the victory; and the rather, for that the Turks began againe to make head, and to repaire their difordered battels. Wherefore the Christians still keeping their array charged afresh the front of the anemies reftored battell, confifting of forty thousand men, and that with such violence, as that they in thort time had flaine the moft part of them, and put thereft to flight : and with the great flaughter into their owne dampe. Now commandement was before given throughout

them and feeing in every place great store of rich spoile, contrary to the aforesaid commande. G ment, left the purfact of their enemy, and disorderly fell to the spoile of the tents, vntill they came to the very tent of the great Sultan. But here began all the mischiefe, with a most fud. The Covidian den change of fortune. For here these greedy disordered men, not now worthy the name of sol diers, light vpon a strong squadron of resolute men, with good store of great ordnance readu recedity after charged, which they discharged amongst the thickest of their enemies, and rent in sunder a number of them, and after that came on resolutely themselves : when in the meane time Gita. la B. fla with his horiemen yet vntouched, brake in vpon them also, and with the terrour of hie comming brought fuch a feare vpon them, that they began amaine to fly, especially the Hun. garians & Germans, most busied in the spoile. Neither could they in that seare, by any threats or intreaty of their commanders be perfuaded to make a fland, or fo much as once to looke H backe, or to shew any token of true valour : which their hasty flight was the ouerthrow not of themselves only, but of others also that would have sought; for whilst they fled headlong vp. on the spur, and could not be staid, they ouerran their own footmen, and so furthered the enemies victory. Thus for want of good order, through the greedy conetousnesse of a fort of dif. ordered men, the most notable victory that ever the Christians were like to have had over the Turks, was let flip out of their hands. Many noble gentlemen & commanders, in feeking to flav the flight of their own men, were here flaine: & although the enemy followed the chase scarce halfe a mile, yet were the Christians possessed with such a feare, that they fled amaine all oues the country with greater shame than losse, no man pursuing them. The Archduke himselfe Keing all desperat fled to Cassouia. The Transylvanian of all others most orderly retired him! I felie towards Tocaij, hauing not loft in this battell aboue 200 men, and of them neuera man of name. All this loffe he imputed to the couctoufnesse of the Hungarians, and cowards feof the German hortemen. The Lord Brenstein having charge of the great artillery; fled also, and made thift for himselfe, as did Palfisanu in fine all the reft. Neither was the seare lesse amongs the Turks (a wonderful thing to be fooken) than it was among the Christians: for the night following they for fear of the return of the Christians, truffing up the best of their things, fled alfo towards Agria. And it was afterwards known, that the Torks great ordinance; sems, and baggage flood three daies in their trenches, either altogether vngarded, or fo flenderly garded, as that they might haue bin calily taken by the Christians, if they would but have mide head againe. Yea, Mahomet himfelfe is reported oftentimes to have confessed the danger and searche g was then in to have bin taken, and al his army destroied if the Christians had (as they should) purfued the victory, and not fo bafely run after the spoile : by which danger he then warned, afterwards ever shunned to adventure his person to the like perill in the field. In this battelof Torentie thon. Karesta (for so it is of a place thereby called) and at the siege of Agria, were lost of the Christia Jand Christians ans about 20000, and of the Turks 60000, Mahamer after this victory fortified figris, and for flain, or three ans about 20000 and of the Lurys 60000 managers and for the seeping thereof left in it 10000 foldiers, and for thursed to Belgrade.

The Bassa of Buda persuading himselse that the Christians after so great an overthrow could not this yere to any purpole recouertheir ftrength, came wishall the power hewas able to make, and the fourth of November belieged Vacia in hope to his weafily carried in but finding there greater resistance than he had before imagined, & hearing that the dispersed Chriflians in the upper part of Hangary were making head for to come so the reliefs of the towns, he more afraid than burt, brake, up his, sege, and so returned to Bada: for indeed the differed reliques of the late army of the Christians were drawing together, but was med and unfertile able, as having in the laft flight flamefully cast away their aimes, and therefore could fast done the Baffa fmall harme if he had consisted the flegt in that believe to distribute the Maximilian with a (mall retinue arrived at Vienna in the later end of November, where he found the Viscont of Burgaw, Swartzenburg, and some other of the commanders of his late army ; most of the rest, especially the Italians, being slaine. The small remainder of this vinfortunat yere was spent with often skirmishes and inrodes one into anothers frontiers, as the maner of war is, without any great thing done worth the remembrance.

Rodolph the Christian Emperor, notwithstanding the late discomfiture of his army not farre from Agria, made choice again of his brother Maximilian the Archduke for the managing of his forces for his next yeares wars against the Turke. Whereunto the Pope by his legat Fran. Aldebrandine promised of his owne charge to send him 10000 Italians, under the couldest of the Duke of Mantua; as did also the German Princes their wonted aid, with some others. All B which flowly at length meeting together neere vnto Poffonium and Altenburg, in the months of July and August, departing thence, marched to Pappa, which after eight daies hard siege Papparagents they tooke, and so again retyred to Altenburg, where they took a general muster of the army, and afterwards in the beginning of September shewed themselves before the strong rown of Rab: where the lord Bernstein approching too neere the walls, was with a shot slaine. Neuertheleffe the rest there staied, untill that hearing of the comming of Mahomet Baffathe Turks Generall with a great army, they left the fiege, and the 24 day of September passing ouer the river Danubius, into the Island Schut towards Comara, there on the North side of the river encamped. Where they had not lien past 8 daies, but that the castle of Dotis standing upon the South side of Danubius, was by the Bassa before their faces, and as it were even under their C noses besieged and taken; the whole army of the Christians in the meane time as idle beholders looking on, but not daring to relieue their diffressed friends : but afterwards arising, marched to Wacia; where hearing of the Turks comming against them from Pesth, they set fire on the castle, and so retired along it the North side of the river, vntil they came over against Vicegrade a castle of their owne on the farther side of Danubius; where by the good direction of the lord George Bastas most expert captaine, and lieutenant Generall of the army, they encamped so strongly, as that the Turks after many brave attempts given to have forced them in their trenches, were glad with fome loffe to depart,

Neither went things this yere better forward with the Christians in other places than in this fide of Hungary: for Sigifmand the Transiluanian prince by his Chancelor belieging the strong D city of Temelwar in October, was by the valor of the defendants, and the vnfeafonablenesse of the weather enforced to raise his fiege, and with distinguist of depart. Mobiael also the Vayuod Michael the of Valachia, who mitted with the example and perfuafions of the Transyluanian Prince, had Vayand yelrevolted from the Turks, and don them great harme (as is in part before declared) now wearis fanconto the ed with their often inuations and the spoile of his country, almost brought to veter desolation, Turks, and yet many thousands of his subjects being by the Turks and Tastars carried away captives, and his bin townes and castles for most pare valed to give his people a time of breathing, submitted him. christians. felie againe unto the Turkith obeifance; foleranly receiving at the hands of one of the Turks Chiaus (for that purpose sent from Gon Aantinople) an ensigne in token of his submission vnto the Turkish Emperor, as also of his fauor towards him. Which the more to affire him of, he E by another honorable meffenger frurely after received from Mahomer the Turkish Emperour more kind letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Wayuod ship of Valachia by the grand Seighior his folemne oath, unto Michael the Vaytood and his fun Pater, then shout thirreene yeares old, for the terme of both their lines, without disturbance, paying but the halfe of the old yearely tribute by the Turks before demanded. Soglad they were vpon any condition to have reduced that marrial man with his country vnto their obeifance; and in token of further grace, together with these letters he received also a goodly horse, most richly furnished, with a faire seimiter and an horsemant mace, in signe of the martiall power and government committed unto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and honors the Vayuod feemed thankfully to accept i neuertheleffe not daring too far to truft vnto the Turkish faith, of the small affurance wherof he had before had sufficient experience, he still kept frong garrifon's vport the frontiers of his countrey, with fuch other forces alfo as he was wont, excusing the fame to be done for searc of the Tartars; by whom he also excused himfelfe, for not going with the Turks Generall this yeare into Hungary, as he was by speciall messengers from the grand Seignior himselse requested telling him that he might not in any case so to do, for seare of the Tartars most horrible incursions, and the spoiles of his country, G yet knew he right well, how that they were by the great Sultan his expresse commandement charged not to do any harme either in Moldauia or Valachia, as they went into Hurlgary, But this wary Vayuod not greatly trusting either the Sultan or them, as also loth himselfe a Chris ftian to go against the Christians his friends and late confederats, excused himself by the ne. ceffary care he had of his subjects and country, and so requested that his reasonable excuse to be in good part of the great Sultan accepted; but of him more is to be faid hereafter. Thus passed this yeare without any great thing done more than is before declared both these great Princes, the Emperor and the Turkish Sultan, being warned by the last yeres work, what it was to put al to the fortune of a battel: & therfore now contenting themselves to have shewed their forces: as not afraid one of the other, countenanced this yeres wars more in shews than deeds,

What great things might by the Christian Princes at vnity among & themselves be done against the Turk, is by the considerat right casily to be gathered: but especially by the notable victory of the famous Transyluanian Prince Sigifmund, who confederated but with his poore oppressed neighbours the Valachians and Moldauians, and strengthened with some small aid from the Emperor and the Hungarians, not only delivered those three countries from the heauy burthen of the Turkish thraldom, but vanquished also their most renowned daptains.ouerthrew their mighty armies, burnt and spoiled their Countries, rased their townes and cities. which as it hath been before in part declared, so if it should be all particularly set downe. besides that it would be tedious, so also might it haply seem almost incredible. Beside which calamities of war (commonly more felt of the subject than of the Prince) the great Sultan himfelfe found no small wants, as well in his coffers, as other his necessary supplies for the maintenance of his wars, especially in Hungary; the only countries of Moldauia before these troubles veelding vnto him yerely a tun of gold 2000 horfes for feruice, 20000 greet measures of wheat, with as much barly, and a wonderfull proportion of butter, hony, and other victuals. the other two provinces paying the like or more, as a yerely tribute : whereof he had of late, to his great discontentment, by the generall revolt of these three countries bin quite disappointed, But this fowholesome a confederation (to the great hure of the Christian commonweale, and benefit of the Turks) now brokemand Moldauia by the Polonians diffeuered from the reft, and againe made tributery to the Turke as is before declared, and now Valachia alfo in a fort acknowledging the Turks obeifangeithe noble Transykusnian prince; who hitherrowith great w cheerfulneffe and courage had fought the most Christian battels against the Turke, now lest as it were all alone, and doubting how with his own finall forces to be able long to defend his country against the Turke and the Polonian whom he feared not much leffe than himself the fame should together with himletf, fat into the hands of the Turks of some other his enemies, by a wonderful change woluntarily religued this his column wof Transviusnia vinco Rodalph the Christian Emperon and his heires for ever; and so leaving his wife in Franky luanta, weathimfelf into Silefia, thereise take possession of the Dukedomes of O mel and Ratibor, which rogether with the yetely pension of 1900 p Loachima, or the four mits of the Bishoptick of Vratiflauia, he had in lieu shereof receiued of the Emperor swhere upon the possession of Transylusnia, by the generall confent of all the States of that countay seas in the beginning of this yere 1598, dolivered yespetal Archbishop of Vacia, the Course Nadafi, and Direct the Emperors commissioners; and a folemne outh of obedience and loyalty taken of them at in generalital beit the aforefaid Commissioners as also the Emperounbinsfelsewould have persuaded the Prince cither not at all; or at lea Awife not fo fuddenly to have forfaken his country, but to haue fillkept the gonerament thereof himfelin yet for any date or two well for fleeing, that the same could not so conveniently be governed by any other as by himselfe; a natural Prince therein borne, and exceedingly beloued of his hip in dis. The fatte Commissioners as fo in link following, going into Valachia, there conkeins like oath of ebodience of Michael the Vayued and his people: who loathing the Tarkish source igney, all willingly weelded themselves and the Emperors protection. These commissioners also at the same time came to agreement with M the Tartars Embassadors, offering unto the Emperor peace and side for the yearely pension of 40000 duckats, and as many theep-skin-gownes, their vivall manner of apparellant All this while continued the Dict of the Empire, begun in December last past at Ratisbon, greater aid for the maintenance of his ways againft the Turks the common enemy, than was by the Princes and States of the Empire offered twhere after great and long deliberation, a large proportion was by them all agreed upon for the delvaying of the charges of those wars, and defença of the Christian commonweale cobe paied in three yeares next, and so thereupon was the affembly diffolued. But as they were returning home, behold contrary to all hope, Rab one of the ftrongest fortresses in Christendome, three yeares before betraied wato the Terks by County Hardick, was now by the wifedome and valor of Adolphia Baronof Swartzenburg; the Emperours Lieurenand in the lower Hungary, againe recougred, to the great gricle of the Turks, and wonderfull rejoycing of the Christians, in fuch fort as followeth:

This noble gentleman the lord Swart Zouburg, of no leffe courage then experience, then lying B at Comara, and still in doubs less the Turks so neer vnto him at Rab, should attempt something against him and his charge, prouided for his owne defence all that Winter tittle with a strong garrison, keeping continual watch and ward, although it were as then no time for the enemy with any army to keepe the field. So Winter passing, and the Spring appropriate, it streamed Two Latina that the 22 day of March, about 7 a clocke in the night, the gates being there, were heard mere prisoners fly vnder the walls of the towne, two men, who by their speech seemed to be Italians: with great discourt the inflance requesting, for the fafegard of their lives, to be let in, for feare of the enemies pursuit. Hate of the Which by one of the fentinels was forthwith reported into the Gouernorisho doubting it to Lara Swart. be some subtill practise of the enemy, commanded them there to take their fortune vntill the waburg.

morning : at which time they were received into the city, and being brought before the Go-C uernor, profitating themselves forthwith at his feet, pittifully requested him to have compasfion of their milery, & to comfort them with his charitable relief that fo they might at length returne againe into their country. Who at the first asked them, what countrymen they weit, and from whence they came at that time of the night ? Whereunto they answered, That they were Italians, and that they had but even then escaped out of the cruell hands of the Turks at Rab. But defiring to know of them fome news, they after their manner humbled themselves, shewing by their gesture not to know any. Yet would be needs understand of them the particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turks, and the means they had vied to escape out of that cruell feruitude, in all order as had befalto them. Wherethe yonger of them beginning, told him, that now almost two yeres ago, at such time as the Christians were ouerthrown D by the Turks under Agria, and enery man in that confusion then feeking the best and neerest way to faue themselves; they having by slight now escaped the greatest danger of the enemy, and fo trauelling ouer the country towards Vienna, were to their great misfortune (by an hundred Turks come out of Rab to scoure the country, and to seeke affectorey) taken prisoners, and as flaues committed to the chaine, where they had almost two yeres until now, with great patience ferued. These two fugitiues by their outward appearance seemed to be men of good spirit and valor, which caused the Gouernor the more desirous to know of them the meanes they had vsed for their escape. So the yonger proceeding in his tale, gaue him to understand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had bin three months before still carefully denifing how to recouer their loft liberty, which now feemed to make some offer of it selsevnto them : for E that fince the time that the Emperors army rife the last yere from before the towne, they were not kept fo fireit or looked into as before, but lay as men by the Turks not much regarded: which caused them the more cheerfully to take the offer of the time, and to resolute either the somer to die, or to set themselves at liberty. And that so one day as they were carrying certain munition from the palace of Giaffer Baffa for the foldiers, they fecretly conneied three pieces of cord of some reasonable bignesse, therwith by night to let themselves down from the wall, and as as they might to esoape which Itolno cord that it should not be seene, and so their purpole suspected, they buried in the ground. But the night being come for them to effect in, what they had fo long defired, and they roaming up and downe in the darke, and fill finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to flay, and to defer it vntill the night following:

which being come, and choice made of a most convenient place, they made fast the cord aboue, and so thereby slid downe, first the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to swimme, was yet by the good direction and helpe of his fellow conducted ouer vinto the farther fide of the broad and deepe ditch : and that fo, in the night (fo darke as that one of them could hardly fee the other) they were come by chance to Comara, thinking to have

Wherefithe Couerner having melaconfiddred thougheauth himself that it by some ingenious denice he might by night with some good frength apon the sudden enter the towns, it haply might be fo againe reconsted. V pon which to great defignement he thought good to confult further with the Lord Raff, whoming requested, small half & with as much fecreey as was possible; with I doo foot, and as many horse as he could make to some vito him to Comara. Who upon this advertisement hald not, but presently giving order vito the his men, let forward by night, and the 26 of March before day, with 1400 foot, and 120 horse arrived at Comara , where they were all joyfully received, and the gates after they were enter red again fast thut, & fo kept for feare of the enemies fecret pies; of whom no man can be too wary, be he neuer fo wife. Now, whileft these soldiers were refreshing themselves, in the meane time the Governor with the Lord Palfi discoursed to the full concerning the intended enters ptile; which refolued vpon, they found themselves vpon the view of their mento have seen toot of the garrifon foldiers, and 300 horse all good and couragious men, and well appointed for the intended feruice : who there staying two dates after their comming; and many of the m in the meane time (after the manner of their religion) confessing themselves, and receiving the Sacrament, were become fo couragious, as that they doubted nor in the quarrel of the Christian religion to ancounter a far greater number of the Turks than themselves. And the more to flir them vo, the Lord Palf, at the same time delivered noto thema motable speech not for all that selling them whither they were to go but, That they were his Christian foldiers and brethren, under his leading both of long and late time i who never by him deceived of their wonted pay at fuch time as it was due, would not now as he hoped for fake him. And albeit that he wellknew them to have descrued at his hands a greater contentment; nevertheles being himfelfe deprined of his rengme by thefe lare, warres, and his possessions subject avery house vato the incursions of the Turks, could not therfore according to his defire, and their deferts, shew vnto them the great good will be bare them: Yet now and enempresently was come the time wherein they might not only abundantly enrich themselves, but also adorne their heads with w an immortall crowne of glow, and make themselves for ever famous, by performing the most happy and glorious explainthes euer was by valiant fouldiers attempted or atchieued in that part of the World, And course intent that they might know how dearely he accounted of the life and honor of every one of them, he would therefore himselfe with the Lord Swartzenburg (of whom proceeded all that faire denice and new stratagem) be present with them in the action : and that therefore they were not to shinke that they were led forth to any privat danger, farther than their commanders themselves, whose folly were to be accounted great, if rashly and voon no good ground they should adventure their lives and honours together; whereof they ought not now to doubt, having by a thousand proofes known, how much they had beene of them always regarded. And that therefore it behoued them so much the more to snew their valor in this piece of seruice, undertaken for the great benefit of the Christian commonweak, and the honour of Christ Iesu, untowhom they were with one accord to make their prairis, with his mighty hand to strengthen their hearts, and with glorious victorie to bring to happy end the intended exploit against his enemies, to the honour of his name, and the advancement of the Christian religion and faith. At the end of which speech all the souldiers cried aloud That they were most ready to do any their commands, and to follow them whitherforms. So order was taken, that within three houres they should every man be prease and ready with their armes according to their places; and fo having well refreshed themselves, about clears of clacke the feuen and twentiethday, of March they in good order beganto fet forwards to ward Rab. But for that the multitude of fouldiers of tentimes, giveth the enemy warning of M that is intended against him; Palfi gaue order to one Jahn Stroine his Sergeant Major, to follow faire and foftly after him, with 1700 hoffe and foot, which he well performed. And fo won the breake of the day they began to draw, towards Rab, and there lay close in ambush all that day vntill night, about feuen miles fhort of the townewrefreshing themselues in the meable time with plenty of victuals, which they had brought with them from Comara. Night (the fauourer of deceit) being come, in two houres march they began to draw neere to Rab, and there flaied about five houres; from whether they idnt before them a French enginer, a man of great indgement, with thirteen others (before rewarded with 1500 duckets) having with them 4 petards, engines of force to blow upinto the aircamy thing whereunto they be fallened, be it neuer fo great and weighty a where by good change they found the draw-bridge downe, and the nortculleis up : for that the Turks then cafting no perill, expedied enery houre for certain waggons with provision from Alba Regalis. By which good hap the Christians unperceived comming to the gate, and therunto fastning cheir perards, in good order gaue fire to the same, which presently tooke not hold:yet were they not farefor, but that they were by a fentinell discreed. B who demanding what they were, was presently answered by the violent engines, which in a trice tore in funder the gate with some part of the wall & of the fortifications neere vnto it. When now the watch (but all two late) began to give the alarme, and the Christians in the foreward Tibluspifed thrusting presently in, tooke the gate, none of the Turks yet comming to the desence thereof, ass, or to hinder them from entring. The first that appeared were 200 Turks, which with their wonted cry Alla, Alla, in such hidious maner as if they would therewith have tent the heattens, would have staied the Christians fondatther entring, but were themselves overcharged by 200 which were already entred. At which time also the Bassa came on with more than a thoufand following him, and that with fuch courage and fury as was neuer greater to be feene in any Turke; where after an 20ft terrible fight maintained by the space of two houres, the Baffa Two of the C himselse heing flaine, the Furks began a little to retire, whereby a thousand Christians moe Tarks asset had leifure to enter: when freitway after came Giaffer the great Baffa with about 1000 tall faint. foldiers following him, all the inhabitants also of Rab running after him, and that with such force, that they constrained the Christians to retire unto the gate whereby they entred. Who resolued rather honorably to die within the towner than with distinctor to be forced out, there with incredible courage sustained the greatest impression of the furious enemy; where was to beseene the true Christian valour for the performance of so greaten exploit well worthy of eternall memory. But this Baffa also (the other being dead of a wound in his necke) encountered by the Lord Swartzenburg, after he had in that sharpe conflict shewed great tokens of his valour, was there at length flaine alfo : both whole heads ftrucke off, were for a prefent after-D wards sent to the Emperor at Prague, with all the particularities of the whole action. But now the Turks perceiving that all their chief commanders were flain, retired most part of them into the city: some 300 of them crept underneath one of the bulwarks, where stood certain barrels of gunpouder, which they desperatly set on fire, and so together with themselves blew vp 200 Christians that were aboue voon the bulwarke; the greatest losse the Christians had in all that victory, who were otherwise supposed not to lose therein about 200 of their men. Thus the Turks discomfited, and altogether full of seare, losing both their force and courage, fled in euery place before the Christians, they in euery corner making of them a most horrible slaughter. The Turkish women all this while out of their windowes and other high places, ceased not to cast downe stones, timber, and such like things upon the heads of the Christians, whom B they thought by all means to annoy, and to helpe the Turks. The bloudy execution continued all that day untill night, the Christians still finding one or other hidden in the most secret places of the city, vpon whom to exercise their wrath; who ransacking also every corner thereof, were by the wealth therein found greatly enriched. But comming to the palace of Giaffer Agreat boots, the great Bassa, they found such great store of rich furniture, as better beseemed some great Prince than a Turkish slau. There they found also letters written in characters of gold from the Baffa of Buda to this Baffa, greeting him, and promifing him in his behalfe to deale with the Grand Seignior again the next Spring, with the first that his army should take the field, that he might therin have some honorable place of command, to the end he might in the field thew his great valour, and no longer lie idle in that strong towne. So sound they there also many things written from the great Sultan himfelfevnto this Baffa, with great flore of coine, which all fell to the fouldiers share; infomuch that by this so notable an exploit so well performed, the publique State, together with the fouldiers privat was not a little bettered. There amongst other things were recoursed threescore and fix pieces of Artillery, which were knowne to haue been sometime the Emperors, and source and twenty others, which the Bassa

Thus Rab one of the strongest fortrestes of Christendome, not full foure yeares before besieged by Sinan Baffa: with an hundred and fifty thousand men, by the foace almost of three moneths, and then ar length by the treason of the governor to him betraied was now in one night by the valour and policy of a few resolute men; to their immortall glory againe restored to the Christian commonwealth the inhercenth day of March in the yeare 1598. Of which for notable a victory the Christians rejoyeed not a little both in Hungary and eliewhere: the great Sultan with the Turks no leffe griouing and florming, as H well for the loffe of the towne, before got with no small charge, as for the death of his people there flaine, to the number of about fix thousand and moe, with the toffe of fearce fix hundred See Tark Door to the Tark In soon of Hours of Googness Colory

Yet for all this, Mahomet, the great Sultan ceased notto make great provision for his war in Hungary and that greater than before, and fo with greater fury alfolto profecute his wrathfull indignation to be reuenged upon the Christians. Whereupon order was given vitto Ibrain Balls his brother in law, and Generall of his army, with all convenient speed to take the field Agreet tumult which for all that fell outfar otherwise; for that now thinking to have had all things in good forwardne ffe, a great di ffention rife betwike the Ianizaries and the Spahisthe latifizaries beine the best footmen, and the Spahi the best horsemen of the Eurkish Empire ; both the faithfull keepers of the person of their Prince, and the greatest strength of his state : whereby it commeth to passe, that in setting forward towards the wars, these two sorts of valiant soldiers, the one flanding upon their firength, and the other upon their honor, and both jealous of their ie. putation and credit have no good liking of one the other, but often rimes, and effectially of late in this corruption of their martiall discipline under their degenerate Emperours, fall at odds among themselves, as now they did, to the great hinderance of their affairs, and trouble of their General, Infomuch that to appeale this tumult he was glad to put to death certaine of the infolent Ianizaries refusing to set forward as they were by their Aga commanded. But proceeding further, and thinking to have executed some others of them also, to the further terrour of the rest he was by them and their adherents put in such seare of his life, that to avoid the prefent danger, he was glad to excuse himselfe by his lieutenant, laying all the blame upon him as the cause thereof: who was therefore as a sacrifice deliuered vnto the surv of the Ianizaries, by whom he was there presently flain, with some others of the Bassa's followers. So these broiles with much ado ouerpast, Ibrahim having taken a generall review of his army at Sophia, there staicd, expecting order from the great Sultan where to begin his wars, in Hungary or in Tranfyluania, for as yet that was in question: which could not well be before the beginning of July, by reason of the scarcity of victuals even then arising in the camp; for the supplying whereof Mahomet himselfe had no small care. But this long delay was the eause that a great number of the Ianizaries comming from Hadrianople, and hearing by the way, that the Generall would not as yet fet forward; not knowing the cause of his stay; and doubting to be deceived of their promised entertainment, were about to have returned backe againe: which known at the court, commandment was presently sent thence vnto the General, withour longer stay to set forward toward Hungary, which the more haftened his departure with his army.

In this the Turks folong delay, the Christians had good leifure to prepare their new forces, being now the latter end of Summer: for well they might thinke that the enemy slept not, knowing what prouision he had made as well in Constantinople as in other places. Wherefore reasonably doubting, that Summer well spent, and August now at hand, he would not so late turne his forces into the lower Hungary, they thought is best to prouide for the safety of the upper countrey: And to the end that the enemy approching those frontiers, might there finde forces ready to encounter him, the lord George Baffa a man of great experience and valor M was appointed Lieutenant Generall for that countrey; to the great contentment of the foldiers in generall, all thewing themselves most ready at his command. The Lord Swarzen burg in the meane time remaining in the lower Hungary at Rab, with eight thousand good foldiers; and the Archduke Matthias at Vienna for the dispatch of George Basta, and the halling

They of Buda in the mean while feeing the delay of the Turkes, of whom not one band yet appeared in shofe quarters; and on the other fide perceiuing the great preparation of the Intperials, and the great garrifon at Rab for near at hand; began now to doubt forme new resolution of the Christians : wher in they were no whir deceived; for no army of the Turks being in field in the lower Hungary, and the country plain and open, the Lord Palfi with a continuent Buda befreed B power, & certain pieces of battery, (dt forward to attempt the enterprise; and the 16 of Odo. b) the corn. perwith 16 pieces of antillety began to batter the city of Buda, to the great fear and difcomfiture of them within having first taken the fort S. Gerard, with hope to have gained the rest alfo. For which cause, the men, the women, and all that dwelt in the City, most instantly befought the Bassa, not to endure the destruction of the same, with the inhabitants and wealth therof altogether, but being not able to hold out against so surfous a battery, in time to hearken to lome reasonable composition, that so they might yet euery man at least with life depare. Whereinto the Baffa for all that would not hearken, but put them fill in hope, that they should be presently relieved. Howbeit the batterie still continuing, and they not able longer to endure the force of the Imperials, nor any relief yet comming, they were glad at C length to abandon the city with the loffe of two thousand of the Ianizaries, and but 300 of the Christians slain, and 800 hurt: the rest of the Turks'at the same time retring themselves into the castle, where they might for a space deem themselues safe. So the Lord Palfi possesfed of the city with all his forces laid fiege vnto caftle, which although it were in fome places shaken with the continual fury of the cantion, yet were the desendants fell ready to make good the fame infomuch that Palf in good hope of fucces giving therento a general affault, was by their valor inforced to retyre; they within in the mean time with great labor and indufiry repairing the breaches made by the artillety. So that Full confidering the difficultie of the affault, shought it better by vadermining to thake the rocke wheren'the castle stood, than by a new affault to expose so many worthy mento somanisest a danger. Which his purpose D by the enemy diffeomered was by them also by countermining diffappointed. Yet for all that were the Christians all in good hope by another mine nor yet by the enemy perceived, to artain to the full of their defire; and the mole; for that they law not fo much bradery or flew of courage in she defendants as before: Who now West themselves filere and quiet, as if they had bin continuing about good ding up of the callie, as men bereft of all hope of reliefe or fuccor. The Christians beeing now possesses of a twong abby and fortresse fast by, and having brokendown'all the bridges ouer the river Danibins; in fach fort as that the befreged could receive nowelluf either by land or water! But for afmuch as the time of the year began now to grow tedious, and the winterweather tharpe, the Christians thought it not best there long to protracted waterne, and therfore resolved to present with the castic another general assault, and arthe fametime to blow up the mine but in gilling this affaire they were againe repulled, with the loffe of 200 men. Atwhicheime alfor number of Turks fallying our of the Caftle couragiously incountred the Christiana, but not with succes answerable to their valor, being there almost all cut in pieces. Neither did the mind take the defired effe a, but being blown vpdid little or no harmarall. So the Christians weary of their long suffering of the entreamitie of the weather, and withall confidering the great courage of the defendants, were even von the point to have lifen; yet willing to give a fresh attempt vpon the mine, they began again to work in the fame rand hoping to prettall began to parley with the defendants about yeelding voor the castle. But all to little or ho purpose; for that the mine having taken no effect the foldiers could hardly be drawn on through the deep and muddy ditches to give a new affault: In fine, feeing no hope to prevail, and hearing alfoof the comming of a great Army of the Furke for the relief of the beffeged, they raifed the flege, and at their departure The chiffian burnt their suburbs, carrying away with them a great booty; and so retyring towards Stri- depart from gonlum, expected further direction in what places to winter. But Sie ismund the Transylvanian prince in the mean time repenting himself of the victoral change he had made with the Emperour, in difguifed apparel hafting in post our of Silese came to Clausenburg in Transylvania, and there was joyfully received of his subjects and taking of them anew oath of obedience, by mellengers lent of purpole certified Martinilian the Archduke (appointed by the Emperous for the government of Trapfylvania, and now voon his way as far as Cassovia) of the causes of his return; persuading him rather to come his forces against the Turks, for the recovery of Agris, than to crouble himself to come and farther for Transvivania, now againe by him to the great contenument of his subjects renof. fessed. As did also the Princesse his wife (Maximilian his Cousin germane,) wishing him u to confider, what hurt and dishonour hee should do ynto the Emperour his Maiesty, himselfe the Roman Empire, and the whole Christian Commonweale in generall, if in sodangerous a time hee should attempt any thing against the Prince her husband; and vnto him by her so

Now the Turks great army being come into the upper Hungary, lay incamped under the walls of the strong city of Veradinum, where that worthy Captaine George Balls was Lientenant General for the Emperor, but not having sufficient strength to go against so might an enemy, or to relieue the belieged city, having as then but a weak garifon he gaue knowledge therof to Maximilian the Archduke, who (as is aforefaid) with a convenient pomer was but a little before come to Caffovia, to goe into Transylvania, had hee not there by the way been I flayed by Embassadors from Prince Sigismund, but lately before returned out of Silesia i and having again taken upon him the government, by these his Embassadours requested him, no further to trouble himself in that journy a offring to give him aid against the Turks when the uer he should require it. The befreged nevertheles in the mean time notably defended themfelues, and with certain brave fallies did the enemy great harm : ftil expecting than Biffs the Licutenant, of the Transylvanian prince, or Maximilian the Archduke, or they all with their vnited forces, thould fend them relief. Vnto whom they gave knowledge the 19 of O Rober, how that the Turks with all the force and fury they had yfed, had as yet little prevailed; besing by their valor fill repulled, and with many frame fellies to their great loffe incommend, tract the time until they might by them their friends be relieved : yet not doubting but that the Turks according to their wonted maker mould down as they might to subdusthem. and some of their great ordnance cloied in such forts an that they were in good hope to pro. I to have relieued them, was letted to to do bythe Tartets, to shappurpole filmed up by the Turks : fo that he could by no means join his forces with Maximilian for looking to the false ty of his own people and country, Yet in roken of forwardnes he feat nertain Companies of braue foldiers vnto the Lieutenaut Bolla ; who understanding that of two shouland good feldiers in garrifon in the city in the beginning of the fiege, there were fearce 700 left aline all the rest being with continuall assaults either slain or moreally wounded ; ried a morable sus tagen to delude the enemy withall; for having our his men in good order, and comming braucly on, as if he would even have presently joined bassel (which the Turkes mon defire) whilft they likewife with great filtre were putting themfolues in order of battell and wholly bufied therin, he by another way of the Luks leaft fulpacked cuspingly thruft into the City 800 good foldiers; and that don, presently setyred again, into his stenches, wherin he stoogly incamped, feared not all the Turks forces, who thinking ouen then to have come to a day of battel, and still in vain expecting the lame, resurned deceived by this finenesse. And somethy after, inforced by continual foul weather, raifed their fiege, not without great difficultie and danger (reliefe lying fo neer at hand, and the defendants strengthned with new supplies) so haue bin longer maintained. So passed the troubles of this year with no gain but great less of the Turks: who at their departure inforced by the valeafonablenes of the weather the feat together, left behinde them in their trenches many Tents, with forse great pieces of Anillric, being not able to conuey the fame by water to Buda, and withal fearing greatly to being countred by the forces of Baffa, ftrengthacd with new supplies even then sent vato him from

The Archduke Masthia, Swarszenburg, and the other commanders of the army in the lower Hungary, being twelve thousand strong, with the garrison soldiers of Rab, Strigonium, & Komara in the mean time because they would not stand idle, together with the Hungarian horsmen, ouer-ran all the country therabouts euen vnto the gates of Buda ; in good hope also to haue met with eight thousand Turks (as they were by their espials advertised) comming toward Petth with victuals for relief of the cattle of Buda.

Whilst things thus passed in Hungary, Mahomes to shew his greatnes, as also the more to keep the Christian princes in suspence, sent Cicala Bassa (or as the Turks call him Cicala) his Admiral with a great fleet to fea: wherwith being come vpon the coast of Sicilia, he requefled the Viceroy of that kingdom, to fend him abourd his fleet the Lady Lucretia his mother. a who dwelt in Messana, for that he greatly defired to see her, and to do her honor, promising so quietly to depart without any harm doing. And the Viceroy again confidering, how that the angry renegat for the like curtesie to him at another time before denied, had in his rage done great harmall along it the sea coast; couenanting with him to send her in safety back againe. ent her honorably accompanied aboord the Admiral gally swhom Gicald her sonne received with great loy and triumph, and having kept her with him one day with all the honour that might be; according to his promise sent her backe againe to Messana, and so without any harme done for her sake to any part of Christendom, peaceably returned back again with his રાજ્યાસમાટ

Nowinshe mean time Michael the Vayuod of Valachia with good forces of his owne, beea cause howould be doing somthing also, resolued to give an attempt voon Nicopolis, a City of the Turksin Bulgarian and so giving order to his people, caused a bridge to be made over Damubius, to passe that great river by. Wherof the Basta's of Silistria and Badoua understanding, thought it good with al their power to disturb him in that work : & so comming as the faid bridgewas by chestayuods foldiers layd ouer the river upon boats, without further flav attempted to haue broken the fame, to the intent that the Valued flould not that way paffe. Who hasting thither with his army, rescued his work, and inforced the Bassa's to for sake the exploit by them begun, where betwire them for a space was fought a most hard conflict, till at length the Turks were with a great flaughter ouerthrown, & fo glad, some here, some there, by flight as they might to faue their liues. After which victorie, he without let passing ouer n) the river with his whole forces, came and incamped under the wals of Nicopolis; where they of the city vuderstanding of the late slaughter of the Turkes, and finding themselves vnable to hold its our against the force and valor of the Valachies, and now out of hope of any help of relief to come in time from the Fur'ces, without further refishance yeefled themselves into the power ustine Vayuod, who having sacked the city and set it on fire carried thence a great Nicopolia sacked spoiland boosy, with a number of the Bulgarians, chusing out the best and most able bodies and burnt by among them to levus him in his wars, and appointing the rest to inhabit and manufer the wafled places of Valachia. The report of this ouerthrow given vnro the Turks by the Valachian, with the facking of Micopolis, running abroad, brought a general feare upon the Turkes euen inshellmpuria being of Conflantinople: For the staying wheref, Mahomet commaunded E the chins of his Balka, with a great power of mmultuary foldiers taken bin haft, to go forthwith against the Vayand to stay the course of his further proceedings, to the difinaying of his people him felf thandering out most horrible threats against little! Who incouraged with his late victorie, and well acquainted with the Turk's maners, little regarded the same as know-

Who without delay to make the Vayhood worder frame liow highly the great Sultan was displeased with him, put himself upon thomay with fin hundred lanizaties towards Hadrianople, with putpose there to Winter until the flexe Spring and fo to expect the comming of the rest of the Army, that so with the fame, vnited to the forces of Mehemet Satergi (who the last year besleged Veradinum) he might G appear the more terrible vnto his enemies. The Christian Emperor also at the same time refied much discontented, that his people in fo fair a way for the winning of the castle of Bude. had yet failed therof. The Wallons laying the fault vpon the Lords Swartzenburg Palfi. & the rest of the commanders, that it was not won; for that when they as valiant men offred to have don therin the vermost of their deuoir, their leaders had made choice by the spade & mattock rather than by the fword, to perform the same.

The Turkes a. gain spoiled by the Yaynod.

But Michael the Vayuod seeing the Turks not a little dismaied with the sacking of Nicol polis began afresh to their greater terror and hurt to make new inrodes you them, in such fort as that he was entred an hundred miles into their territory against whom Mehemer Sates gi (as yet the Turks General in Hungary) comming with his forces, he again retyred, carving # away with him the spoil of the country by him wasted.

They of Buda in the mean time fearing some sudden assault to be given voon them a fine fering within great want of viduals, expected long to be relieved both with viduals & other necessaries:vnderstanding yet withall, That the grand Seignior had caused it to be ginen our at Constantinople, That he was raising a great power of his best and most expert soldiers and had therfore fent for vnto the court all his old men of war, fuch as had ferued in the Wan of Persia to be now again imploied in Hungary. Where the Turks in the mean time privating to relieve the diffressed city of Buda both with men and many other necessaries refer lute Hungarians understanding by their espials, that one of the Turks Basia's with 2000 foldiers was comming thisher to increase the garrison, laid themselugaciose in ambush in a I place wherby the Turks were to passe. Where they had not long staied, but the the Turke without fear diforderedly passing by were by them with such force and sury assailed charins moment, when they least thought, they were ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loss of many of their horfes, much mony & jewels, and many captions there when prilomersthe Ball fa himfelf with much ado hardly escaping into the City. But shortly after, 400 Christians fcouring the country about Buda and having taken a good booty of cattel and otherpillage, returning loded with the prey, were by the way affaulted by the Turkes, and inforced to forfake the same, and to fight for their lives whom for all that they notably topuled, with the flaughter of divers of them, and fo again recovering their booty, returned with victory: And about this time or not long after in the vpper Hungary; a great power; of the Turks and Tate K tars having forraged a great part of that country, and don the Christians much berne, came before Callovia making thew as if they would even prefently have belieged that city. Which put the inhabitants in such a fear, that many of them without further deliberation flat forthwith as fast as they could into the mountaines, thinking themselves more fase there; then in the city. Meuertheleffe by the perfuefion of Grerge Baffe the Emperoura Lieuteneminchola parts, 2000 valiant and expert foldiers staid there with himsexpecking what the Tanke would dowhoapproching the walls, demanded of them in the city a great furn of money by many of contribution, threatning otherwise the etter ruin and destruction therof. Which their prond demand was by Bafta frontly rejected, and they with the bolle of a great many of their lines inforced to get them farther off. Wherfore feeing themselves not able so pressile againsts city fowel furnished, they for feare by night sife, and depended quite another way then the wherby they came, doing great harm fill as they went. The free Haiducks of Valachinal for warlike kind of people living for most part upon prey, & willing to frew some token of their hatred toward the Turks, by certain bridges passing over the Danubius, encountered with the Bassa of Natolia with a great power, whome they overthrow with much shughter of his prople, and the loffe of his brother there flain also sand to afterwards ours running the categories did there exceeding great harm, and took the len of the fame Bella prisoner. Thus passed Winter, with many light skitmithes and incurations in divers parts of Hungary and officials frontier countries; which had don great harm back it nor beane before hand well provided for by the Imperials; who in most places strengthed with new sapplies, flayd the surveilles M by the Imperials, who in most places, throughout with new supplies when the barbarous enemies. About this time also Sigifmand the Transylvenian Prince (whom hitherto all men admired, as a maneuen fent from heaven, for the vone fa of his bountry and of the Christian Commonweal) by a wonderfull change gaue a most manifest foken of a discreased viconstant nature, to the great wonder of the world ; for having broken the ngreement made with the Emperor the last years, and being secretly in post returned out of Silesianto Transylvania, and again taken voon him the gouernment (as is bufore declared) and having withall requefted D himself & the Transylvanians his countrymen to be discharged of the oath of obedience and loyaltie by them before given vnto the Emperor, and the city of Veradinum with the Country therebout, to be again restored wato him; and the Emperor pausing therupon; did now, (doubting of his own abilitie for the keeping of that country) in the beginning of this years 1599, by his Embaffadors, the Bolhop of Aloa-Iulia and Stephen Pafehal his Chancellot, fent of purpose vnto the Emperoun request him to have the first agreements again renewed, and the Principalitie of Trebnits in Morauia to be added to the two dukedoms of Oppel and Ratibor in Silefia, with fifteen thousand ducats to be yearly paid vnto him out of the Chamber of the Empire; and a generall pardon given vnto all the Transylvanians, that following him, had of late revolted from the Emperour, and their antient Liberties to be vnto every one of them again confirmed. With all which Conditions obtained at the Emperours hands (as of him who faw how needfull it was for him by any meanes to keeperhat strong Countrey in his power) the same Embassadours with their dispatch returned from Prague the nineteenth of April.

But Sigifmand in the mean time at home, was entred into new conceits with certaine of the Polonlan Nobility, far differing from the former agreement with the Emperour; and having sent sor one of the Turkes Chiaua from Constantinople, and for his Cousin Andrew Bathor the proud Cardinall out of Borusia, and so meeting with them in an obscure Village in the Confines of Transylvania towards Polonia, accompanied with certaine of the chiefest of the States of his Countrey: there in the presence of the Polonians and of the Turkish Embassadour, resigned all the right and title he had in the Countrey of Transylvania, vnto the Cardi- siglimund rehal his coulin; commanding all the States there present, to sweare vnto him their obedience fivanies his and fidelity: who shortly after together with the Polonian Embassadour, sent one of his espe- cousin the carciall Fauourità to Conffantinople, to defire fafe conduct for his Embassadours to be sent this direct ther to cunclude of all matters with the Turke. Which messenger to sent, together with the Polonian Embaffader, were both curtoently rebalued in the Torkis court, and in token of fore & cial favor rewarded with fumptuous garments grand charge given shamon That the Cardinell within three months next frould fend thithed adolamh Embaffador, with the old argulloned tribute by the Turk demanded. Thus through the inconfiancie of the Prince the ambition of the proud Cardinal, and the foule collusion of the Polionian, the Country of Transfelonia (one of the fronge ft fortrelles of that fide of Christianston) falling from the Hoperors the dience, and fo in a fort cut off from the Christian communities became again tributary your the Turk; most good men detesting the lightnes of the one; the ambilion of the other and the flines of the third. A state of the mobile of the smooth and smooth guilful has mingle of the state.

Now the Turks of Buda not able longer to endure the great familie therein had moft earl neftly intreated relief from the other Mutkosheir friends in Hungary who sprallbands ran H to have relieved them but comming neere theseunto, could not put in fuch provision as their had brought forrelief of the same theing letted to do by the Imperials, who shows leave off diligently attended energy motion of the onemy: from whence the Lord Swarzenburg in the night fecretly approching one of the gates with his followers, thought with a petard to have broken it open, and so to have entred. Which his device taking not effect as did therei Rab (the gate being within frongly fortified by the enemy) he was inforced to depart being alfo discouered by the Turkes from the wall. Now shortly after, the Balla of Buda with free hundred horse issuing out of the city, to have met with vi Quals that were comming thither. fel into the hands of the Haiducks, who after their maner fiercely incountering him, our him. to flight, and took him prisoner, his horse in the chase falling under him whom his souldiers 1 feeking to rescue, there began a new skirmish, which increased their former overthrow, with the loffe of the greatest part of them that wate left ; amongst whom the Bassa's son, with the Aga of the Ianizaries, there loft their lives also. Which conflict thus ended, the Bassawas in fafety brought to the camp, and there with great threats inforced to teneal the flate of hiscity, with other the fecret defignes of the Turks. Wherupon the Haiduckes renumed back to: ward Buda, feeking by all means to stop the comming of victuals this Berifo in hope at length to have gained the diffressed city. But whilft they thus lay upon the passages, behold news was brought them, That the Baile of Boina, with the Sanzacks of Sigoth, Quinque Eccletia; and Coppan, with 1 oood Turks were comming to oppresse them, and to open the passages by them holden. But they knowing their own thrength, and nothing fearing fo small outes, staid & not for their comming, but went to meet them, and in a place of good advantage waiting for them, you their first appearance, with great affurance and courage charged them, brake their array, and flew the most part of them, together with the Buffa himfelf syet with so muchado, as had not the Lord Palinin good time fent in vnto their aid certain companies of fresh men, it was not without cause doubted, but that the Haiducks had bin put to the worse, about 300 of them having there already loft their lives. The Tartars yet nevertheles in good numbes held on their way towards Buda, with purpose to have overrun the country, and so have with drawn the Imperials from the city: but for a fmuch as that base nation was known to be good for nothing but to rob and spoil, the Lord Swartzenburgs Regiment onely going against them, and incountering them overthrew them, in such fort that part of them beeing there slaine in fight, and part for fear driven into Danubie, the greater number of them there most milerably perished.

Basta the Emperors lieutenant in the upper Hungary, at the same time lay at Cassovia with eighteen thousand men, doubting lest the enemies army, which he heard to be at hand, should come to besiege that City. In the meane time Ibrahim Bassa Generall of the Turkes forces came to Solnoc, with an army of fifty thouland frong, amongst whom were ten thouland lanizaries. But for all that, understanding that Basta nothing dismaied, awaited his comming at Cassovia; not thinking it good to go any farther (his souldiers being already wearyed with long trauell) neither yet safe there to stay so neer ento his strong enemy, retyred backe againe vnto Belgrade, a place of more ftrength and fecurity, expecting a great fleet of ships, which M charged vpon the Danubius were to bring victuals for the army as also for the relief of Boda, Alba-Regalis, and other fuch diffressed places, with divers great pieces for battery, and other leffe artillery vpon cariages, with a number of wagons and other infirmments of Warredeck ring their purpose for the performance of some notable exploye; all guarded with fine those

A fand Turkeowhilch conducted it vpishe riner. Of all which the Imperials understanding, the Lord Fulf difparetted his Licutenant with a convenient power, and the Captain of the Huf. The Tarks re-failing them, and so comming so a hand fight, cut them in pieces, & rifled the ships, of whom the christians, the greater para were there funk in the deep riner, and fo took an exceeding great booky, decmed to be worth a million of gold whole among other things of great value, there was found abound subbob Dollar periods worke all divided among the foldiers as a reward of their traneil. This great ouerthrow once known at Buda/Alba Regalis, and the Cities thereabouts, brought vponthem agencial fear, yea, the army of thrahim grew therby much discontented, as being at once dilappointed both of their victuals and their pay. Besides that, the Imperi-B also defrais all the country therabout, ranfaoking, facking, and deftroying all the country villages and caffles without mercy, although the poor inhabitants offered them a large Contribution to have flayd their fury, which would not be accepted. Vpon this notable ouerthrow alfo, the Lord Sware Cenburg was determined with all his forces to come again to the fiege of Buda, in hope in fo great a discomfiture and want of victuals to haue had it deliuered to hime and for that purpole fens for certaining reac pieces of Artillery to Vienna. But whileft things went thus wel in the lower Hungary, Colonel Redeler of S. Andrews in the upper country, took occasionalio spon this querthrow of the Turkes, with 500 horse and 600 foot to shew himfelf with this small company before Agria, having yet left the greatest part of his forces a litthe off in secret ambush. Which small company the Bassa of Agria beholding, presently put himself in arms, and so sallying out, began a hor and braue skirmish; when suddenly the other foldiers left in ambush, starting out, and couragiously assailing their enemies, brake their order & pur them to flight, purfuing them at the heels even to the gates of the city: & had there bin a greater force of footmen, it was verily thought that the Turks, difmaid with the flight, and altogether confounded, had abandoned the defence of the place, and the Christians had become masters of the city, which had bin the cause of their notable cuerthrow in the yeare 1596. Neuertheleffe they with great brauery and final losse retyred, having flain a great number of the Turks; and carying away with them 100 prisoners, with a booty of 500 horse, and much other cattel.

The free Haiducks also strengthned with new supplies, had dongreat harm in the country D about Buda, seouring freely all ouer it without any resistances for which cause the poor Chrisstians which yet dwelt in that Country, rise vp against the Turkes, promising their obedience vato the Emperor: and moreouer, to the intent they might be no more molested by the Imperials, offered to take vp arms themselues against the enemy, & to the vtmost of their power to hinder his paffage both by land and water. These same Haiducks also had broken down all the bridges which the Turks had made betwixt Buda & Alba regalis, to the end they should not that way commodiously bring either victuals or munition from the one place vnto the other. And the Lord Palfi and Madafti understanding by their espials, that the Tartars divided into three companies; had ouerran a great part of the country, and with a great booty were retyring toward Buda; presently went out against them, and inforced them to fight; which barbarous people better inured to filching, there loft all their lives, together with that they had before ftoln. After which vi cory, the fevaliant men turning their forces against certaine other places of the Turks there by, took two of their castles, with much rich spoil; which Cafiles they sacked and burnt, together with the great towne of Zolna, breaking downe also the bridge vpon the river Trava.

Now at this time the Turkes of Buda held themselnes male-content within the City, had uing no Gouernor, their Baffa being before taken by the Haiduckes, and they themselves pinched also with great want of victuals. Wherfore doubting some sudden attempt of the Christians, as men difmaied, for their better safety retired themselues into the Castle, a place of great firength, leaving the city to the Imperials; who ready to befiege it, but doubting of the Turks great Army, which as they heard was marching thitherwards, the auauntgard thereof being come to Mohatesh, where Sartes Bassawas also looked for, (the report being given out. That the Turks having relieued Buda, would go to befiege Caniffa or elfe Strigonium) they flayed to goe any farther, as men indoubt what to refolue vpon. So certaine Colonels and other Captaines were sent with their souldiers, to sortifie certaine passages whereby sho

Turks army was to passe. Therefor in the mean time respiring for that the paissenemy bear gan now to appropriate also for that they known the given desire, that lead to mean tier again Strigonium, and had therfore iene sigted the imbenof fil argain to foregoind was the country, and so suddenly having relicued Buds and Agria; here spiresome whither to win his forces. The Imperials in the meantime incamping astrate Hatman and Zolnos to hinder the Turks from victualling of Buda; as they disfired out off five handre delithern at their first wal, who to that puspole were going toward had suited tooked for the Turks. Summer now almost spent, threhim the great Bassain the beginning of September came to Buda, with an Army of an hundred and thirty thousand frong; and from thence in the name of his great lord and Master gaue the Emperour to understand, That for the fauing of further effusion of innocent bloud, and not for any fear or diffrust of his own frength and power, her could be content to hearken to fome reasonable conditions or treaty of peace 1. Whereanth both these great princes (hasting wel wearied themselves with these long wars, and exhausted I their Treasures) feemed not now vnwilling; expeding, as was thought, nothing more, than for the honour to be first entreated. And the tather, for that the old Sultanne de Mabemet his, mother (who by the weakenes of her fonnes gouerament, fuch as neuer was in any the Orbe. man Kings or Emperours before, did beafe the greatest sway in his affaires) did what shee might to further the same. Wherefore in the later end of September a place was agreed up. on for a parley for peace, which was in an Island in the river of Danubius, beneath Strigonia um. Whither the Lords Swartzenburg, Nadafti, Palfi, and the Bishop of Vacia being come for the Emperour; and Amurath Bassa of Buda, with the Lieutenant Generall of the Tattars, and some others, for the grand Seigniour, The Turkes at the first, after their vareasonable manner, demaunded to haue Rab, Strigonium, Fileck, Setchin, and all the rest of the Townes g and Castles in fine years before taken from them by the Christians, to be now againe surres dred vnto them, with a certaine yearly tribute by the Emperor to be payd vnto the great Sultanat Constantinople; as also there to have his Embassadour Lieger continually attending vpon the Turks Court : for which they offered to deliver vnto the Emperour the city of Agris onely. All which their proud and vireasonable demands being by the aforesaid Commissioners on the Emperors behalfe rejected, they were contented to come to some more reafonable talke, offering to leave vnto the Emperour Rab and Agria (wherof Rab was his own already) onely for Strigonium, exchanging as it were Strigonium for Agris. Which when it could neither be obtained, the parly was to broken off and nothing concluded; and fothe wars again continued, without any memorable thing more this year betwirt them don, either L on the one fide or on the other; the Christians contenting themselves to have distressed the chief Cities the Turkes held in Hungary ; and the Turkes no lesse apayed to have relieved the fame.

But whilst things thus passed betwirt the Christians and the Turks in Hungary, Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, yet the Emperors friend and Confederat, and under his protection, certainly informed his life to be fought after in the Tarks Court, by the ambitious Cardinal Bathor his envious neighbour, but lately become the Prince of Transylvania; as is before declared; by commandement from the Emperor, and to be revenged of fo great a wrong, as also betimes to prouide for his owne fafety, with an army of three core thou fand firong fuddenly entred into Transylvania, in most horrible manner burning the country, and killing the per M ple before him as he went. Where whileft the Cardinall (who was thought to have purpo fed to have ferued him in like fort, had hee not beene by him prevented) was making held against him: he in the meane time had the city of Corona (commonly called Brasso) with the firong castle of Fogaras yeelded vnto him : from whence hee marching towards Alba hella

A the 26 of October, with all his Army, before divided into three parts, but now againe united. came into the plains neer Temifon, about 3 leagues from Hermenstat; where vinderstanding that his lieutenant, corrupted by Ibrahim Baffa, had promifed to kil him, and now well affured therof, to sid himselfe of that danger, with his owne hands presently cut his throat, and so difoarched him. When by and by after came vnto him the Popes Nuntio, fent by a fineneffe from the Cardinal, accompanied with another embaffador, the better to countenance out the matter stelling him, That the fame Embassador had commission from the Emperous, to will him forthwith to defift from armes, and without further delay to depart out of Transylvania. Which thing feeming vnto the Vayuod very strange and almost impossible he desired to see the Commission. Wherunto the Nuntio, before instructed, answered, that he had left it with R the Cardinal. But I (faid the Vayuod) have another here present from the Emperor, of another purport, which I purpose fully to put in execution : Yet was he for that day intreated by the Nuntio to stay his army. And so in the mean time lying both still and in great suspence. the Vayuod defired to know of the Nuntio, the cause why the Cardinal forgetting himself. so troubled that country by intruding himfelf therinto, to the great prejudice of them to whom it of better right belonged, not attending the government of the Church, better beforming his calling than the mannaging of arms, to the disturbance of the Christian peace. Wherunto he received no answer. So the 28 of O (tober, a day dedicated to the commemoration of the Apostles Simon and suds, these mossengers were sent back again vnto the Cardinall: Who presently returned them back vinto the Vayuod with new instructions (being then busic with C. his youg fanyth fetting his men in order of battell, presently to go against the Cardinall) of whom they could ger no other answer, but that he was resolved forthwith to come voto the ssiell of a bartely with him . So the two Armies lying incamped not past a quarter of a league theone from the other, and the fame day meeting together, joined a most terrible and cruell hamelwhich for the pace of five hours was with much desperat resolution fought, as if they had enery man vowed so have carried away the victory over his enemy, or there to have left themselves dead upon the ground; until the Cardinals people at length overcome in a long and bloudy fights were there veterly overthrown: among ft whom were 30000 Turks & Tarben fent vitto him from Ibrahim Baffa the Turks General. The Cardinall himfelfe feeing the The Cardinal disconfiture of his army, was by some reported to have sauch himself by flight; but by others overshown by n was faid to must bin drowned in passing a ritier; as hee fled from the Valachians that had him bishad feater in chace. But the truth was, That the Vayuod now mafter of the field, fent out certain troups the Emperor. of horfmen divers water Rivto pursue him, and himself with the rest of his Army prosecuting the victoris carnero she Cardinals camp now by the Transylvanians & Turks for faken, wherinthe found as places of artillery, with great flore of coin & wealth, befide a number of tents subhorles, alewhich became varo him w prey! Prom thence he marched to Alba Iulia, where bewar with great toy resolved of his friends and confederats there : for although the greater percef the Frankylvanians, especialty the Nobilitie, had together with the Cardinal, submitund shearfelnes to the Tarks protection, & followed his enligues yet were there divers others sifowho Rilfandred the Emperour, and therfore rejoiced not a little at this victory. The Vaiwoodster that fent his Lieutenant to Claudiopolis, to see if they would yeeld alfo. Which they willingly did. with many other Cities and Caftles in divers parts of that Countrey. which having mone to reft voon, now yeelded also (in such for that horsely after, all Transylvania submittedit self againe unto the Emperous obeysance and swore unto him obedience; most of the Nobility of the Countrey being either flaine in that battell, or afterwards put to dearisby the Waynod's antonigh whom were flue, which corrupted by the Cardinall, had beforevaderrakente kill him. Now the fourteenth of November, after divers reports of the Cardinals escape, his vngvactous head was for all that presented vnto the Vayuod. Which to the removal enthers beeing for a while fot up in Alba Iulia, (where hee had but a little before commannal be as a Prefent from the Vayued vines has Empleyed and the Archdukes his brethren. His headlesse body being afterwards by the bolten and ement of the Vayuod honourably buried in a Monasterie at Albe sulid in the same Tombe which he had before made for his brother, beheaded by his coufor Prince Sig Mound Bathord The Cardinalls treasure also fell into his hands, which was faid. to have bin valued at three millions of gold. Thus the Countrey of Transylvania, lately

before by the Cardinal yeelded vnto the obeifance of the Turke; was againe by this worthy G Vayuod recoursed and restored to the Christian commonweal, the proud Cardinall cast one and brought to confusion, having not yet possessed these his new bosours full eight months His coulin Sigilmund the late Transylvanian Prince, who almost all this while had flaid at Borusia, and in disguised apparel seen Dansk and divers other the free cities therabouts, now hearing news of the Cardinals ouerthrow, fecretly got him away into Polonia, to feck spaine his new fortunes. The Lord Smartzenburg at the same time vniting his forces in the lower Hungary with them of Stiria, and now 20000 strong, sought by all means to reduce so many places upon those frontiers as he could, unto the Emperours pheisance, and so tooke in above 200 villages: but afterwards thinking to have furprifed the ftrong saille of Capillar, and by night fecretly approching one of the gates with a petard, which took not the expedied effect, w he was discouered by the watch, and soby the garrison soldiers (nomeassed with shealarme) repulsed, and inforced to retyre with the losse of about a hundred mental divers others wound ded all men of good account. In revenge whereof Swartzenburg afterwards fent out divers troups of horimen, which fcouring all ouer the country as far as Sigeth, did great harme and fo returning caried away with them a great booty.

Ibrahim Baffa hearing of this ouerthrow of the cardinal with all the forces he had feathing much troubled therwith, fent post news therof, to Constantinople: the brute wherof brought a general fear upon the whole city alfo; infomuch that Commission was forthwith fent unto him from the great Sultan, giving him power, (if it miste bee) to come to forechonourable peace with the Emperor, and to bring it with him to Consentinople whither he mas thouls 1 to return, being now no longer time to keep the field with his army, which be fider be sold fide fon of the year suffered great want of bread the plague elforaging therein, with the death of many his best soldiers both botle and societies, the many his best soldiers both botle and societies, the many his best soldiers both botle and societies. alfo: in fuch fortabat the foldiers not able longer to endure the faminand wanthingstaffnet fel to robbing one of another, and fo at length into muniny, whorin divers of them being flats and cut in pieces by their fellows, the rest forthe most part brake in pieces of themselves and fo by divers waies returned home not wel trufting one enother. Sothan nothing more was now done with the preparation of the Turks, their Army being diffeon freel with wasts and the cuil fucces of their affairs as wel in Hungary as in Tranfylyania, Neither did Hindrentle great Balla, for relief of those cuils, at his return bring any conclusion of peace wate his great & incher Euripe tell, was Water e Vavi at Age and Age an

Which hee quickely perceiving, fled forthwith thorow Syria into the countrey of Arabia with his horsemen and the horsemen of Simes the Georgian; purposing the next Spring by the help of the Arabians and Persians, to appear in field with greater forces than before. After whom Mehemet the great Bassa following, came with his army to Aleppo, there to winter, and to expect the return of the Rebell together with the Spring. This fodangerous a rebellion, with the troubles of Transylvania and Valachia, were the cause, that the grand Seignior, seeing himselse in so many places for sken of his subjects, was the readier to encline vnto peace with the Emperour. Whereunto for all C that the Emperor was not hafty to hearken but vpon honorable conditions; as knowing that the Turke required the same, not for that hee had any desire to live in quiet, but for that his troubled affairs both at home and elswhere abroad so required his lanizaries and other men of war in this his fo weak government being grown fo infolent, as that they were hardly to be by him commanded, openly threatning in their discontented humors, not only to depose the chief officers about him but himself also and the banishment of the Sultanesse his mother. faying. But the rebel Culahin the next year grown again very strong, was now come into the field, and even ready to have given the Baffa battell: Who as he was a man of great wifedome and experience, well confidering with what a desperare enemy he had to doe, n thought is belt again to proue, if his rebellious followers might by fair means be drawn from him and fo comming neer vato him, by open proclamation promifed a free and general pardon to all fuch as had followed the rebel in those Wars, if for faking him they should forthwith result abome to their dwellings and foro the obedience of their luft and lawfull Prince and Soucraign. Which general pardon to proclaimed was the ruine of Culabin; for that the greatest part of his followers, now inriched with the great booties they had gotten, and now alfolianing free pardon offered them, returned home into their own Countries, there at eale to line of their etril gotten goods; leaving their Captaine with some few others that stayed with him, with fittle hope to be faued. So that within a few daies after, Cufabin thus forfakan of his followers, was himself taken and brought to Confiantinople, where shortly after he and tertured to B waswithmost exquisit torments tortured to death,

A token vnto the Turks at Alba Regalis, who for all that altogether beleeved them not, yet willing further to try them, fent them for hostages two Chiaus; for whom the rebels sent allo two other of the better fort of them to Alba-Regalis; with conclusion, that the five and twentieth of Lune at the farthest the mony should be paid, and the town delivered. For the resciuing whereof, and for feare of some hidden treason, the Turks and Tartars began to make themsclues firong the Imperials also doing what they might for the appealing of so dangerous a tumult. So the tenth of Iune the Sord Swartzenburg with two thousand horse and soot came within two miles of the towne, and from thence fent 24 horsemen to diffused the rebels from yeelding the towns vnto the Turks, & to tell them that they should shortly receive their pay: who shamefully deriding them, sent them backe againe as wise as they came : so that B. Swart Zenburg perceiving himselfe with so small forces to be able to do nothing against them. neither yet by faire means to persuade them, retired again to Rab, untill some greater strength were come vnto him. Immediatly after, D' Petzen Counsellor for the wars, a man of great authority, gravity, and wisedome, was by Matthias the Archduke with foure hundred horse conducted to Pappa, to see if he by his difference could have diffused them from their fo vngod. lyapurpole; for the yeelding of the towne vnto the enemy; whom they not only refused to heare, although he spake vnto them most kindly, but also bent their muskets and harquebusies voon him, threatning to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. When shortly after, twenty of the Hungarians imprisoned in a cellar in the town, brake out, and comming to Rab, brought newes thither, That the Frenchmen and Wallons in Pappa were at variance among ft themc selues about the yeelding up of the towne vnto the Turks (some better minded than the rest. not willing to consent thereunto) insomuch that they in the castle shot at them in the towne, and they again at them in the castle; and that they had already received from the Turks twenty thousand duckats, with some provision of victuals, and were shortly after to receive from them the refl of the mony promised them, and so deliver the towne. For preventing whereof, the Lold Swarzzenburg the 22 of lune fent the Lord Sharpfenstein a French Colonell, with 3000 fouldiers, certaine Petards, and a number of scaling ladders towards Pappa; whom the talfe rebels suffered peaceably to enter the towne the foure and twentieth of lune, still encouraging them to come on, calling them their countrymen and brethren, and in token of friendship that king them by the hands, telling them that having affurance of their pay, they defired no more: n But having now received in formany of them as they thought good, and as they knew they ware well able to deale with, thurring the reft out, they cut them all in pieces, and afterwards inderigion called upon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of these mbels at the fame time had laied themselves in ambush by a mill fast without the town, who by the Wallons & Haiducks without discourred, were also by them charged: vpon whom for all that, by reason of the shor out of the towne, they could do no good; but having lost three hundred men, and among ft them Hannibal Kralzs the Lord Sharpfenkein his Lieutenant Generall, and one Del la Margoft the chiefe enginier; they retired which loffe the desperat rebels (if it had bin in their choice) had wished rather to have happened vnto the Dutches than to the Wallons or Hungarians. About three daies after, three of theferebels being by chance taken E prisoners by the imperials and brought to Rab, were not only apparelled but also trimmed after the Turkish fashion as men not desiring longer to be accounted Christians, the rest of their fellows in the town also inflicating the Turks fashions, as well in their apparell as in their manner of feruice: yet for all that would not these metamorphosed monsters yeeld the towne vnenthe Turks, before they had the full fumme by them agreed upon, the Bassa of Bosna being commanded from the grand Seignior in all halte to prouide it for them, and so to receive of them the towne. Nevertheleffe, for their more strength and their more credit with the Turks, they received into the town one enfigne of the Turks, with certain wagons of vi Quals, brought thither with fo firong a control as that the Imperials durft not meddle therwith in which wa. A most wieted gons (being discharged) they sent in bonds 600 Hungarians and Dutch, men, women, and chil. fall. F dren, prisoners to Alba Regalistbeing all of them glad to be so fent away, in hope to find more fauor and curtefie at the hands of their enemies; than they had found with these renegat Chriflians. So thortly after these rebels sent our certaine messengers vito the Gouernor of Alba-Regalis, to know his full resolution: which messengers (conducted by certain Turks of great account) were upon the way by the free Haiduckes all intercepted, and the messengers taken, with 100 Turks mo. In the meane while Michael Maretti, before imprisoned by the rebels in G Pappa, by letters fecretly advertised the Lord Swartzenburg of a certaine place, whereby he might (as he faid) casily enter the towne, and the rather, for that the rebels were at variance among it themselves. Who thereupon the z 2 of July came to Pappa with nine thousand horse and foot, but disappointed of his purpose for entering the towne, hardly neuerthelesse belaied the same : vpon whom the mutiniers many times desperatly fallied out, and right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were ftill, without any notable loffe, by their enemies (too firong for them) beaten backe againe into the towne. In one of which fallies it fortuned one of their captains to be taken, who to the terror of the rest was presently flaine quicke, and his head and skin vpon a pike fet vp before the towne, for his fellowes to behold. But the Lord Swartzenburg fill more & more prevailing upon them, they fent fecretly for aid to the Turks; H whereof he for all that getting intelligence, fentalfo for three regiments of fouldiers moem come vnto him to the fiege:by whose comming he well strengthened, and bringing his approches neares the towne, tooke from the rebels the mill, a firength which they very vowillingly loft, as in hope therby to have the more casily received aid from the Turks, who having made preparation to haue relieued them, were letted fo to do by the rifing of the water, which had fooiled all the provision for their reliefe at the bridge of Esfeg, as also hindred them from mate ching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their trenches even to the towne die. ches out of which they had let all the water: where some of the townsmen escaping ontof the towne, declared, how that the mutinous foldiers within labored both day and night to fortifie the towne, but to be in their worke much letted by the continual affaults of the Imperi. I als : as also that they now had neither bread nor wine, nor other victuals left, more than a little falt, and threefcore horse, of which they had already begun to eat and that although they were not altogether fovaliant, yet that they had refolued to die by the hands of the fouldiers, as men expecting no other mercy. Yet shortly after, viz. the nine and twentieth of July, they desperatly fell out upon the trenches of Marshurgisch, a Dutch captaine; of whose souldiers they flew many, being drunke, and driving the rest out of their trenches, raised a great glarme. Which the Lord Swartzenburg hearing, hasted thither to the rescue where with an unjucky musket shot he was strucke in the head and slain. Wherof the rebels got knowledge the same Swartzenburg enening, and Della Male their Generall in reward of that service gave vnto them that had made that fally a thousand dollars to be divided among them. The dead body of that so were g thy a man, as had done great feruice for the Christian common weale, was afterwards with great folemnity brought to Rab, and there honourably enterred. The like desperat fally they made againe the next day, and flew of the Imperials an hundred and thirty, and tooke certain prisoners and in retiring backe againe into the towne, cryed aloud, That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yeeld the towns, they would eat Christians, whereof Main should be the first.

The Lord

The Lord Swartzenburg thus flaine, the government of the army was by Mathia the Archduke committed to the Lord Redern, a noble man both valiant and learned; who although be were very fickly, came vnto the camp before Pappa the 8 of August; wherevnderstanding that that the rebels now brought vnto extremity, had a purpose by night to fly away and so begon, L he caused a more vigilant and strong watch to be kept; when lo, according to his expectation, Pappa shands. the next night after, about two houres before day they began to iffue out whereof the watch med by the mn. giving knowledge to the Generall, they were indeed fuffered to goe out as unperceived, but presently after at their heels were sent out the Lord Nadalis and the Barle of Thurn, with 200 Hussars, and after them the chiefe Colonell and County Solms, with part of their horsmen alfo, who in three divers places overtaking them neer vnto a great wood called Packem, flew most part of them : Del la Mota their chiese captain or ringleader being slain by the chies Co. lonell, because he would not yeeld, and his head by him afterwards presented vnto the Genetall in the campe: 200 Wallons the Huffars under the leading of the Lord Nadafti, County Solmes, and County Thurn, found out in the wood; who albeit that they for a space made great M refishance, yet in the end were enforced to yeeld, and so with their two ensignes were brought into the campe. The Huffarsalfo vpon another paffage light vpon other 200 moe of thefe to bellious Wallons, who because the flood strongly upon their guard, and were more desperatly fet than the rest, the Generall sent out other 200 of the Colonels horsemen vpon them, by

A whom and the Hussars they were almost all slaine : divers others of them also were slaine in comming out of the towne, and in the marishes thereabouts. Their Generals Lieutenant with such other of their principall commanders as were taken, were by the Lord Rederns commandement delivered vnto the Prouost Martiall; the rest of the rebellious traitors he at the request of the fouldiers divided into divers parts of the army, there to the terror of others to be executed, from whom the fouldiers could hardly be perfuaded even for the present to hold their hands, But afterwards having brought them to Rab, & leave given them to do with them their pleasure, they as farre exceeded in the cruell manner of their execution, as they had before in their outragious dealings, especially the Hungarians and Wallons, notwithstanding most of them were of the Wallow countries. Some of them they impailed, somethey brake upon the wheele; some of their skins they cut off their bodies as it were into thongs, and so poured into the wounds vineger, falt, and pepper, from some others they cut off their prinities, some they rofted, and some they put into the Tenalia, vpon some they dropped molten pitch, and then casting gunpouder vpon them, so burnt them to death; othersome they hanged vpon yron hookes; and some they put in the ground up to the chin, and for their desport with yron bullets bouled at their heads. In all which torments no figne of compassion was to be seene, the tormentors to make their pain the greater, doing nothing but deride them: the miferable wretches in the meane time confessing the hainousnesse of their offence, and crauing for death as a fauor. A most horrible thing it was to see, how whilest some were thus tortured, others were brought to see the same misery they themselves were by and by to endure. Amongst the rest C of these exquisite torments, one Peter orfy caused one of the mutiners to be sowed up in the belly of a mare, with his head hanging out, and fo to be rofted, in which miferable torment he lived three houres, and then died : after which he caused the loathsome body forosted, to be given to them that lay starting upon the wheele to cat. Thus was the dangerous mutiny at Pappa with much ado ended, and that strong towne like to have bin lost, preserved the rebels themselues being become a dreadfull example to all posterity, for all them to looke vpon that shall attempt the like villany.

Now at this same time also, though neither the Christians nor the Turks had as then any great army in the field, yet many a hot and bloudy skirmish passed daily betwize them in one place or other of Hungary; all which to recount as it would be much tedious, fo in filence to D passe them all ouer, were greatly to wrong those worthy personages by whom they were not without their great addenture done. Amongst the test, one Nicholas Horbach County Serinus his Lieutenant, with 150 fouldiers, and Andrew Thußi another great Commander, going forth to seeke for booty; Things hearing that the Turks were abroad for the surprising of certaine Haiducks then gone out, state fast in a secret place vntill he might heare surther newes, Horbath another way ftill going on. Now it happened that the Baffa of Sigeth having bin abroad, in returning home by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him ouerthrew him, and flew most of his men, Horbath himselfe by flight hardly escaping. But Thuss hearing this skirmilh, as lying elose not far off, and now hasting thicker to have bin partaker thereof, found the Baffa yet in the field on foot, viewing the bodies of the flaine : vpon whom he came fo fudden-E ly and with such force, as that the Bassa with his difordered men had much ado to take horse, and so without any greattefistance to betake himselse to flight; after whom the Hungarians fiercely following, flew many of the Turks, and amongst the rest this Balla himselfe, whose Two Ballan of head presently cut off, Horbath sent to the County Serines, who shortly after by These him. Significantly selfe sent it to Matthias the Archduke. This Bassa was a man of great firength and courage, a most expert and aduenturous captaine, about 35 yeares old, and for his valour of a common souldier created a Bassaby the great Sultan. His head being brought to Vienna, and there shewed to the Baila of Buda then there prisoner, and he demanded, whether he knew it or not; lighing answered, that he knew it well, and that it was the head of the Baffa of Sigeth, a bratter manthan whom the Sulran had none in all his Empiregearneftly withal defiring to know how F hewas flaine. And not long after the additioneurers out of Comara, Strigonium, and other places therabout having made a great party and taken a great booty from the Turks at a faire at Gombar, and by Tra and Bfling, thinking to have passed Danobius in hope of a greater booty, feuen hundred of them being passed the river, were by the new Bassa of Sigeth and others, with five shouland Turks in an hot skirmith our shrowne; yet not without their great loffe

But now to leave these the troubles of Hungary for a while, as the forerunners of greater the ere long to ensue det vs againe looke backe into Transyluania and Valachia, to see how Michae el the Vayuod now in the meane time behaued himselse there. The Cardinall Bather ourse throwne and flaine, and the country of Transylvania againe brought under the Emperors obedience: the Vayuod by his Embassadors gaue him forthwith to understand of all his process dings, with the whole successe thereof, as also of a purpose hee had to inuade Moldauin: for that it was commonly reported and also believed, That Sigismund the late Prince (not a little moved with the death of the Cardinall his coufin, and the revolt of tris country) aided by the Turks, the Tartars, the Polonians, and Moldanians, would now attempt some great matter for the recouery of Transylvania: All which was shortly after the rather thought to be true for that divers of his spies being taken, some at Clausenburg, some at Nossen, besidethe Letters 1 that were found, about them from him vnto the Nobility and States of Transylvania (perfus. ding them to revolt from the Vaynod vnto him, and that his meaning was shortly to come with a great army out of Polonia for the repulling of him) they also be themselves confessed. How that Sigifmund in disguised apparell had himselfe been in Transfyluania, coonfere with divers his secret friends concerning that marter. Which his Embaffadours the Emperous honourably entertained, and by them confirmed vnto the Vayuod the gouernment of Trans fyluania, fending alfovnto him divers honoutable Prefents a forbidding him neutraleleffe to filuania by the inuade Moldauia, for feare of failing a new and dangerous war against the Polontans allows. der whose protection and the Turks the Palatine thereof then rested as According vato which forces vnto the frontiers of Moldania, for feare of Sigiffound whom he heard sube harching fome mischiefe in Polonia, and ouen then to lie vpon the frontiers of that country. Some few moneths thus passing, Hastraim Aga (a grave reverend old man and much employed by the Turkish Sultan) with flux other Turks of good account, Embassadame from the great Sultan, and a great retinue following bim, came to Grontat in Fransyluania where the Vaynod then lay. Of whose comming the Wayuod hearing, with foure thousand horsements of branchy command the Vayuod flaied his intended empedition syet fending fome good part of his k mounted, went halfo a mile out of the city to meet them; the footmen in the momentume of both fides of the directs standing in good order, from the gate of the city whereby they were to entet, even vnto the Vaywoods lodging, where stood also his guard all in red and white sine. So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their horles, with great rederence faluting the one the other when prefently the Embaffadour embracing the Vayuo in ngirt his fein tar, and in the name of the great bultan put another about him, for ichly gamified with gold and pretious from an analysis that no part of the feaberd was therefore to be feener besides this he presented him wight faire plume of blacke Hearnes feathers mixed with some white (a right goodly ornament in forme of a great buffr) which the Vayuod would not in the field privile on his head, aithough hee was shereuntoby the Embaffadout montesmelly requelled with caused it to be catried before tim: he alki presented him with two very faire fed entired token of the Turks faudur and protection; she one for himselfee and the other for his force Petrafeo: moreouer, hogawovate him two quecoding faire hor for tenly furnifhed well for others, and a most faire Paulcon. The Vayuod himfolfe was most practicly mobneed, and rate M the manner of his country) had ten very faire spare togethe led before him, At whose entering into the towne all the great ordnance was discharged with he and of the best and the the Embassadour still riding on the left hand of the Mayalochbring brodg he was long in the fix of his chiefe followers energy one of them prefenced with a relief of allowers figures

A requitall whereof the Embassadour rewarded an hundred of the Vayuod his followers every one of them with a good fuit of apparell with this Embassador of the Turks was also the Polonian Embassador, whom the Vayuod in like manner honourably entertained. These Embasfados (as was thought) did what they might to have drawne this worthy and renowned man rogether with the countries of Transylvania and Valachia, from the Emperor vnto the Turks obeisance: howbeit he seldome or neuer spake with them, but that either besore or after he had conference with the Lords Vngnad and Zechel (the Emperors Commissioners) concerning their requests; alwaies protesting vnto them, not to yeeld to any thing without the Emperors confent and good liking. Whereof Mahomet aductifed, and that he was not by any thing yet faid or done, to be remoued from the Emperour, gaue him by the fame Embaffadors to ynder-R Rand, How that he was with some speech with the emperor concerning peace (as indeed he then was by messengers from the Bassacs at Presburg) which if it forted to effect, that then it should be well; but if not, that then it should be good for him whilest yet he had time, wisely to confider of his owne estate, and to submit himselfe vnto his protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vain praise of a certain foolish constancy, to adventure himself with al that he had vitto most certain danger and destruction : promising him in recompence of that his loyalty, to give vnto him for ever, the countries of Tranfyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia. and at his need to furnish him both with men and mony; offering moreover to make him a great Commander in his army in Hungary, and the Baffa of Temesware as his friend to be at all times ready with fifty thousand horse and soot (as need should be) to affist him against the Emperor, referuing to himselse whatsoever he should more win from him : for all which bounty and kindneffe, requiring only to have him vnto him loyall. All which his large offers the Vayuod little regarding, declared the same unto the Emperors Commissioners : yet still protesting neuer to start, but to stand fast for the Christian Emperor. Notwithstanding as a man' desirous to better his estate, he tooke hereupon occasion to request of the Emperour the country of Transyluania, by him so lately taken in, vnto him and his sonne in inheritance for euer. with such frontier towns as in former time belonged vnto Transyluania: and that what soeuer he should win from the Turks, might be his and his sonnes : he also requested, that all the preferments and dignities in former time granted by his Imperiall Majesty vnto Sigilmund the late Prince, might now be bestowed upon himselfe, and for his seruice done, to be furnished D with mony for the payment of his fouldiers: And that the Emperor with the other Princes of the Empire should affure him, That if he were taken by the Turke, they should ransome him: but in case he were by the great power of the Turke driven out of those countries, then by the Emperors appointment to have some convenient place allotted vnto him in the vpper Hungary to live in with the yerely pension of an hundred thousand dollars. All which his requests if it would please him to grant, he promised this yere to do so much against the Turke, as had not in an hundred yeares been done before: with vaunt. That if he had had the imploiment of the money which was spent in the time of this warre, he would not have doubted but to have broughtall the countries from the Euxine (or blacke fea) to Buda, Alba Regalis, and Solnock, vnder the Emperors obeilance. A large promise indeed, but hardly to have bin performed by E a far greater Prince than he.

Thus whilest things stood in discourse after the Cardinals death, Sigismund the late Prince in the meane time supported by the Polonians, with the aid of the Turks, the Tartars, and the Moldauians, was ready to haue inuaded Tranfyluania: yea, the Tartars (as the for runners of his greater power) were already entred the country, and had out of the frontiers thereof carried away fome booty. Whereof the Vauyod understanding, in great hast affembled his forces out of all places, which in those time was growne to some good head, the countrey people together with the free Haiducks (an adventurous and resolute kind of soldiers) in great numberdaily resorting vnto him. So being now eight thousand strong, and most of them braue and suichast the hufty men, he with them and 20 pieces of artillery removed to Cronstat the foure and twen. what focuer he could that might have yeelded him reliefe. Of whose speedy comming and ca great frength, Sigismund and Ieremias the Vayuod of Moldauia hearing, and spon the reasons. ble estate of their owne forces finding themselves too weake to encounter him, retited them felues out of Moldania into the frontiers of Polonia, there to gather greater firength, and force meet him : for as yet Isremias the Vayuod had not received from the Turke fuch forces as were vnto him promised, and as he still expected. Michael the Vayuod in the meane time this enemies thus fled) with fire and sword entering into Moldauia, tooke in the greatest part there of the feareful country people still yeelding vnto him as howent and the rather for that Ieremi. at their Vavuod (placed by the Polonian, but tributary ento the Turke) had laid upon them. a most grieuous imposition as vpon every man a duckar a month, for which they exceedingly hated him. But here in Moldauia, Michael the Vayuod (hauing still in his company one of the Emperors Commissioners in Transylvania, most trusty servants, who might faithfully report unto them the whole manner of his proceedings) after the departure of Sigismund and Ieremia w his enemies, staied not long , but hearing that they were retired toward the confines of Polonia, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth of May found them by the castle Othune neere unto the river Nester, being thirty thousand strong; Polonians, Moldanians, Turks, and Tartars : with whom he joyned a most fierce and cruell battell, which begun about ten a clocke before noone, was with great courage, but greater obstinacy on both sides maintained untill the enening. At which time the fortune of the Valachian prevailing his enemies at last betooke themselves to flight, of whom were there slaine eight thousand, beside the violation by many others of them drowned in the river Nester: where of the Valachians were lost two thousand only. Concerning Sigismund and Ieremias, divers reports were after this overthrow given out, some saying that they were slaine, and some that they were in slying drowned thow. beit the truth was, that they both by flight escaped, to the greater trouble of themselves, as of their afflicted countries also, Michael after this so notable a victory, taking in the rest of Mol-Moldania fub dauia, caused the people to sweare their obedience vnto the Emperor, himselfe, and his son, to the great offence of the Polonians, not a little (as they tooke it) wronged therin; but especially of the great Chancellor, an old enemy vnto the house of Austria. Wherof ensued greater troubles in those frontier countries than before, to the further effusion of more Christian bloud, much better to have been imploied against the fatallenemy, in defence of the Christian com-Moldauia, the furest bulwarkes of that side of Christendome, and most exposed vato the sury of the common enemy, were now once againe united under the obeifance of the Emperour, to

> Now the Vayuod notwithstanding this so great a victory, well considering that he of himfelfe could hardly keep this new gained prouince of Moldauia against the power of the Turk, (pretended that to him it belonged as his own to give to whom he pleafed:) as also against the Polonians (not more desirous to restore Ieremias againe into Moldauia, than the Prince Sigifmund into Transylvania) without the helpe of some other more mighty Prince whom be might rest vpontby his Embassadors (sent for that purpose) offered the sourceignty of al those three countries vnto the Emperor, with condition, that he should appoint him perpetual Gouernor of the same under him. The Emperour also understood, how that Mahamet the great Turke had not long before againe fent vnto him another of his Chiaus, commanding him without delay to reftore the country of Transylvania vnto the Prince Sigismund (vnto whom he was by the mediation of the king of Polonia now before reconciled) threatning otherwise with fire and sword to destroy Valachia, and by force of armes to depriue him both of Tr., afyluania and his life together. Wherefore the Emperour doubting lest the Vayuod either for feare or for the better affuring of his own estate, should to his prejudice fal to some agreement with the Turke, yeelding to all that his Embassadors had of him requested, with condition that he should be bound as need should require to serue with his people against the M Vurke; and that in Transyluania neere vnto his owne person should be alwaies resident one of the Emperors counsellors, as superintendent ouer the whole country. Wherewith the Vayuod being contented, The Emperour sent thither Doctor Petzenwith fix thousand souldiers, and a great summe of money to pay the Vayuods souldiers, as he had before requested sand monweale. Yes thus the three warlike and frontier countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and g the great benefit (no doubt) of the Christian commonweale, and hurt of the Turks; if they might have so continued, as God wot they did not long.

fo to take of them an oath, That they should from thenceforth become his Majesties faithful feruants. Which superintendent so by the Emperor sent, the Vayuod received with great honor, as vnto him of all others most welcome. Neuerthelesse being againe returned into Tranfyluania, it was not long but that (without regard of him) he began with new exactions to oppressothe people of the country, and in some fort to tyrannise ouer them; vsing great seucrity against divers of the nobility also, especially such as he knew to have taken part before with the Cardinal or now of late with Sigifmund his coufin, or any way to have favored his quarrel. All which he did without the confent or good liking of Perzen, contrary to his promife made. No more to imbrue his hands in the bloud of the nobility of Transyluania, without the knowledge or consent of his imperial Majesty or the Superintendent by him appointed: which for B all that, if he had not don, he could not possibly have kept them (disdaining to be governed by him)vnder his obeisance. Neuerthelesse the Transylvanians taking it in early part tobe so ob. pressed, and the nobility almost extinguished, yea, and indeed to be at all ruled by him; by general consent as if it had bin but one man, rise all wp in arms against him insomuch that he finding himselfe with his Valachians and other his fauorits too weake for them, retired with all fuch as would follow him, into the mountains; and from thence fent prefently for aid vnto the lord George Bafta (a worthy captaine, and then the Emperors lieutenant in the vpper Hungary) for the subduing of these rebellious people, and the reducing of them vnto their former obedience. Who by letters from Matthias the Archduke, at the inflance of the Vayuod commanded so to do, with about 6000 horse and 8 field pieces removed from Cassouis in the vp-C per Hungary the 4 of September. Whereby the way came vnto him Embassadors also from the people of Transyluania now up in armes, and confederat also against the Vayuod : who in like manner also requested his aid, pretending themselves to be the Emperors most loyal subjects, but not under the gouernment of fuch a tyrant as was the Vayund: alledging and exaggerating many his most cruell actions, and cleerely protesting. That for the present want of good Gouernor, they were enforced for the lafegard of their lives to band themselves togetherswhich if haply it might be in any thing prejudiciall vnto the Emperors claime and interest, which he with so great toile and cost had procured in that province, it was against their wills, as enforced by necessity to do that they did in desence of themselves. Which Embassadors so sent from the people, Basta with all speed dispatched away backe againe, comforting D them without further stir to expect his arrival in Transylvania: yet covenanting withall, That they should before conceine into writing the oath of their fidelity & allegiance vnto his Imperial Majelty. Now might many and important confiderations trouble the mind of Balta in fodoubtfulla case. To give vnto the Vayuod against the people, was the expresse order from Mattha the Archduke the Emperors Lieutenant Generall : but to aid the people confederat against him, as they had requested, seemed now both more profitable and honest, especially having most certaine tokens of the small and doubtfull faith of the Vayuod; who only by difpensation interessed in that province, was not so carefull of another mans neither seeming to haue regard of Petzen, or of his owne word given for not further embruing his hands in the bloud of the Nobility of Transylvania, without the Emperours knowledge and leave: vpon E which promise was likewise grounded the archdukes order for giving of them aids so that such breach of his faith, & contempt of PerZen, had hastned the conspiracy of the people against him, despairing of all other health than that which by force of arms they could procure vnto themfelues. To stand doubtfull himselfe, or to hold others in suspence, vntill that by currors in this new case he might receive new instructions from the Emperor or the Archduke, had in it too much danger, as giving leifure to each party to make fides, & to increase the flander of the last yeare, That he might so easily (and especially from the Valachian) have affured that province to his Majesty, had he not bin an heartlesse man of no resolution, even such a one as durst not looke vpon a cat (as some had said) all which might not a little pricke an honourable mind. To take part with the people confederat against the Vayuod, if it should not haply fall out at the first encounter, might betwirt the two contendants give an entrance vnto the third, either the Turke or the Polonian in fauour of Bathor : but if it should fort to the quite contrary, and so himselse to lose the day, then he saw himselse void of all desence against the malitious, especially in that the World commonly measureth the wisedome vsed in any action, according

in matters of war. In this fo troubled a tempest of contrary winds, of power to have driven a right good mariner out of his course, Basta laid hand vpon the helme of good meaning, and forcad the failes of fuch diferetion, as taught him in matters of war to be lawfull for a General to depart even from the instructions of his Prince, not concerning the and, but the means lead ding to that end; especially when the present occasion so requiresh; which the Prince could not with reason before comprehend, as depending of the most mighty fortune of war, which fuffereth not fo much delay as to expect counsel from far. So in this ambiguity Bafta resolved to joyn himfelfe vnto the confederats, most in his judgment concerning his Imperial Majelly. as being the vttermoft scope of his so great cost and charge, to keep the country of Transvine nia at his deuotion, which confifted in the people, and not in the woods or mountains, the man ter being not great by what means focuer it were done, fo that it were honourable and honeft.

Voon this defire Basta fet forward, and the 14 day artiued at Torda, and there joyned him. felfe vnto the confederats, to the great wonder of the Vayuod, in whole helpe hee was fene where reposing himselfe one day, consulting and considering of their forces, about 12000 frong, with foure field pieces, befides eight of his owne, with the fix thousand fouldiers he brought with him, in all about eighteene thousand, he determined not to give lefture wat other Vayued to call vnto him further helpe, having now with him about twenty thousand foot and twelve thou and horse, with seven and twenty field pieces : amongs whom was divers of the Siculi, in hope of their antient liberty, men of good account and fort, with a mixture of the Coffackes, Valachians, Rascians, and Seruians, people of prey seruing only to spoile; whom Baffa knew to be far inferiour in courage to his twelve thousand foot and fix thousand horse 1 not onely for the valour of his owne men accustomed ynto the frontier service, but also for the confederates, who engaged with their goods, lives, and honour, and defirous to be reveni ged of the Vayuod, were like enough to stand well by it. Wherefore hee fet forward the fixteenth day, and in two daies march came within fight of the Vayuod who having fent out certaine great troups of horsemen to take view of the enemy, and seeing them repulsed fet fire on Mirislo a village fast by, out of which they had before drawne certaine small field pieces into the campe.

Mirislo is a village two leagues on this side of Alba-Iulia, directly upon the high way street ching from the fide of Maracza nauigable river, vnto the foot of an hil; along & which the river running, somtimes necrer, and somtimes farther off, together with the rising of the hill, maketh ge an vnequal list of ground, in some places half a mile broad and more, and in some other shut vp as it were into a narrow throat, as in the selse same place where the aforesaid village standeth, & where the Vayuod lay incamped in a place of great advantage, behind a great trench drawn from the river, croffe that little space of ground betwixt the mountaine and the river. On this fide, which from Mirislo the farther a man goeth the farther the plaine enlargeth, Basta encamping close vnto the village, opposed against the comming of the enemy 3 great corps du gurd, two of them Hungarians, towards the hill favored with a Church, and the third toward the riuer, of the Almane footmen, under the charge of County Tomalo Caurioli of Brescia, Sergeant Major of the field, with all the artillery twho as in a place neere and very open vnto the enemy, there intrenched himself, stil approching neerer and neerer both on the one side and the other. 12 Towards the evening of the selfe same 17 day came to Basta one Peter Armenie with Letters from the Vayuod, containing, That having understood of his arrivall in the camp of the Conspirators, he now further desired to know whether it were by the consent and commandement of the Emperor, or not: and how it came to passe that he would so doe, considering the divers chances of war, the sword hanging as it were even over his head if he should chance to lose the battell? Whereunto Basta answered, That the morrow following he would shew him the anthority he had from the Emperor (alluding to the Imperial Standard he carried withhim) and that as concerning the fortune and danger to enfue, he referred that wholly vnto the will and pleasure of the Almighty, the just Iudge of all controversies. But in the meane time heerhorted him to leave that province he had so cuill governed, vnto his Imperiall Majesty, as he M was induty bound; promifing him free passage into Valachia, and giving him time to consider thereupon untill 8 a clocke the next morning, after which time it should be free for every man to do for himselfe what he could. Which answer the Vayuod having read, inflamed with difdaine, with many proud words full of threats and difgrace, although it was then night, preA fently caused by the found of the drum and trumper the battell to be proclaimed against the

On the other fide Basta after he had assured his campe, having not only sent, but gone himfelfe to have the counfell of his own eies, for his better understanding how the enemy lay; and finding no reasonable means for him there to attempt any exploit by, as well for the strength of the trench before the front, & in part along the fide of the enemies camp, as also for the danger of a rifing ground on the left hand, whereunto all the plain betwixt the enemies camp and the village was subject thought it best to remoue, and to make a short retreat about the space of an Italian mile, according to the commodiousnes of the place; thinking it no hard matter, of fo proud an enemy, and not altogether fo well acquainted with marrial stratagems, to gain a notable victory. This his purpose propounded in counsel, was greatly disliked of the captains of the confederats: vnto whom it feemed more fafety to affault the Vayuod, yet lying in his strength, than to retire before the face of an enemy so strong and adventurous; for that such a retreat according to the maner of that country, would be deemed no other than a plain flights and to breake his order & arife, was (as they faid) but to discourage his own people, and to encourage his enemies. But Bafta the better to perfuade them, promifed therin to them a more cunning kind of fight than was yet vnto them knowne; and declared the affurance that he in his own person, with the Almains in the rereward would give them in that retreat, in such fort, as that they should not lose so much as a man, much lesse they needed to searc to fall into any diforder in fo short a space, his purpose being onely to give the plaine vnto the enemy. wherein to flew himfelfe into the open field. So the retreat being agreed upon, the morning following beeing the 28 of September, the three Corps du guard (before fpoken of) were betimes called backe, and the baggage fent away: after which followed the Tranfyluanians and Hungarians, the Almaines in the rereward enclosing the great ordnance,

20. The Vayuod aware of their departure, fent forthwith a great troup of horfomen, especially The battell of of the Coffackes, to take view of them, and to skirmish with them, which were so far kept off the skirmish with them, which were so far kept off the skirmish with them. by a company of musicetiers in the rereward, as that they could not come fo nigh as to do any the Payard or harme, although that all the way they went they were by them still charged; to the great contentment of Biffin, to fee to good a beginning of his designes as might being them all to their wished effect. But when he saw the great artillery upon the carriages to corie out of the vil-D lage, a certain figne that the enemy fet forward with al his forces, he marched faire & foftly to give him have to overtake him : and so retired as far as he thought good from the village, hauing before thought of a convenient place wherinh is people might with roome enough woon aduantage flay: when as about halfe a mile from him, and as far from the village, he might fee the enemy march with his people in order of battell; then began he ro march rowards him alin : and pereciuing the enemy to come in one only thicke front, by reason of the streightesse of the place, having on the right hand towards the river placed as it were all his hor fineh, and towards the mountaine his footmen alone, and 900 foot placed aloft without any artillery, as it feemed he would have done, having planted fome below at the foot of the hill in the way, and in the mid figuren before the front of the battell, where the horsementaine after the soonier. E healfo placed his foundron in one front onely, to the intent nor to be inclosed by the enemy on the flanke of his army. The body of his maine battell conflicted of one great found on of about 3000 Almaine footmen, flatiked on each fide with 1/86 Rutters of Silefia: before the iquadron toward the right hand he had fet a loofewing of three hundred musketiers: in the right wing toward the hill he placed a company of launces; with two foundrons of the coun. try footmentand in the left wing toward the riner one foundion of Transyltianian footmen, & two of launces, for that the enemy was at that time very frong in horsemen: the Collecks, arthers and harquebusiers he placed in the rereward of his great artiflery he would make no vie, for that having not much he would not frand upon the defence thereof, but defired rather with all freed to come to the fword with the enemy, vnacquainted with fuch close fight, foot to foot, and well the leffe fit, by reason of their light armor. And therefore he thought it best first to see forward his squadron of Almaines to give the charge, bending toward the right hand, among ft the thickest of his footmen towards the artillery at the foot of the hill, as there whereas was the fireign of the enemies infantery. And doubting in the performance hereof, to be charged on the left fide with a great found ton of about 3000 latinces, which feemed to stand upon that wing to give the first charge; he gave order unto Sodeviz his Lieutenant, G and Colonell of the Rutters, which had the leading of the left wing, that he should at a certaine figne giuen, fet forward towards the left hand, for the charging of that great fquedron. So his people being fet in order, and the manner of proceeding fet downe, he putting on his helmet, with cheerefull countenance faid, That at that time he trusted he should shew vnto the Vavuod, that his Truncheon could do more than his Scimitar: And himselfe setting for ward betwirt the squadron of the Almaine footmen and the wing of the musketiers, above two houres after noone, marched faire and foftly towards the enemy : who without mooning expected the discharging of their artillery; whereunto the neerer that the enemy came vato it. the lesse harme it did him, by shooting either ouer or short in the field, which easily ascen. ded. The wing of musketiers went directly to give a charge vnto the artillery; and the form H dron toward the foot of the hill, where Bafta defired forcibly to charge, that thereby they might be enforced to spend their first vollies, and with some discouragement or disorder to retire, profently came in, all afront, just vpon the figne given; and so with his Almaine foce. men and the Rutters on the right hand, enclosed and compassed in behind the greatest part of the enemies footmen. At which very instant, the Rutters on the left hand also so couragion. fly charged upon the three thousand launces, that better could not have beene defired of any band of most old and expert fouldiers. The lances retiring without any hurt, and the first wol. ley discharged, forced the infantery and so disordered the rest. Wheteupon the wings cherging, there enfued presently a great slaughter and overthrow, onely forty of Baffa bismen being flaine, and as many hurt, where of the enemies were loft in the battell ten thousand, and I greater had the flaughter beene, if the village and appoch of the night had not covered many of them that fled, and staied the pursuit of the victors that followed them. Which putteth me in remembrance of the great victory that Scipio Afiatious had against Antiothus, wherein were flaine of the Romans but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the wings flood for a time doubtfull) there being loft of the enemies aboue fifty thoofand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the peafants of the countrey reported) twenty thousand flaine in this battell. By this victory Bafta recourred many enfignes and much armour, before fent by the Emperour, vnto the Vayuod, together with all his tents and baggage. And prefently after the overthrow, there were many troups of horsemen sent our every way with proclamation, to spare the lives of such of the Siculias should lay downe their amess of K whom many were fent priloners anto divers places, especially to Foggras, a stang Tome towards Valachia. As for the Vayuod himselfe, her with certaine Cossacker Wespet by The morsow following, Balla dispatched away the County Caurieli, to enforme the Em-perour of all the particularities of the successe of that expedition who seemed to be therewith pleased, yet neither gaue reward vinto the County, neither commended Besta in that bee had done (foreseeing pethaps what was to ensue thereof) although he had in writing before approved of his refolution and motion made in favour of the Confederats. Staying that day in that quarter, Rafta gave order, unto the Chiaki, to fend out a thouland horsemen to pursue the flying Vayuod; who in stead of so doing, joyning themselves with other their conforts, L fetled themselves to ransacke Alba Iulia, under the colour, that the rewas, the Yayunds wealth and substance; yet (as the manner of such men is) sparing neither Merchant nor Citien: which worthily feemed unto Baffa a great wrong, for, to fee the innocent punished and the guilty to escape free. And albeit that he made what haste he might this herwards with all his campe, and to fraied one day not far from thence, to have given forme redreffe voto the spoils that had happened, yet was all that his labour loft, for that fo many of the greates for and chiefelt among it them had their hands therein, with whom he thought it more wifedomess then to diffemble, than to fall into any tearmes of feuerity, without hope of doing any 2004 So he resolved in all haste to march towards Fogaras (whither he beard fay the Mayand come with new forces out of Valachia and Moldania) and in fix daign march came an Chie nium, where he received certaine newes, That the great Chancellor of Polonia and Application (fometime the Transyluanian Prince) were with a firong army opon, the someters of Molda uia ; hauing sent besoncthem catogses the Siculian, with about eight shouland of the sicoli (his fouldiers) to what purpole was caffe to be feene. A course of Bassa his victory; for that it seemed not reasonable to pursue the enemy, and to leave behind him a doubt of fo great importance : and especially, for that he thought he could not affure himfelfe of the aid of the countrey people, in case that Sigismund their old Prince were once feene in Transyluania. Wherefore he thought good to stay where he was, to prouide for all events as need should be; and so resolved to send the Chiaki, and one Ladislams Pithi, to parley with Mose, who made a shew of no great moment of his good will towards the confederats. In the meane time came two messengers from the Vayuod, offering in his name, that he thould doewhatfoeuer were in the behalfe of the Emperour to be imposed upon him. Vito whom these conditions were by Basta and the rest of the Commanders propounded; First, That he should for ever refigne all the claime he had or might have in the countrey of Tran- Areconclisati-B fyluania: then, That he altogether with his army, should give his oath of fidelity vnto his Imperiall Majefty : alfo, That he should forthwith through Valachia go with his army vnto the she Vayarde frontiers of Moldauia, to stay the Polonians from farther entrance : and moreouer, to give his Balla. wife and little some in hostage for the performance of these things. With which messengers was sent one Sebastian Techelli, to receive the oath and promised hostages : vnto whom was appointed for the place of their fafe keeping, the Bifhops castle in Alba-Iulia, the Vayuod hauing beforerequested, That they might be so kept in Transylvania: although Baffa thought it much better to haue had them kept in the vpper Hungary. This agreement being made, Bafta kept on his way towards Fogaras, which he found already possessed by the Chiaki, & fo from thence to Corona. After which, the Vayuod distrusting of the articles agreed upon, e went directly into Valachia, but not at all into Moldauia; not fo much discomfited with she forces of the Polonians whom he went against (not doubting to giud them a great ouerthrow) as for the distrust he had of Moses the Siculian, who in the battell might shew himselfe his enemy behind him. Now whether it were for the distrust he had in his own followers, or only for feare of treason by the Polonians plotted, being not likely that they with so small forces were come to fight, without some greater secret deceit; he not knowing whom to trust or ro feare, of his owne accord tooke his flight into the Grength of the mountaines, without any Michael for great loffe of his people, having left his baggage behind him, which was affailed and taken by feare of bing the Haiducks and such other tharkers enured to prey, who alwaies ready in like occasion, belp the Polonians, to spoile and chase them that are already running; although that afterwards in divers skir- sakes bis August D mishes with the Turks (who to cause him the rather to turne his backe vnto the Polonians, interior had prefumptuously scoured vp and downe the country) he lost many. In fine, giving Moldauia lost, lie was now out of hope how to be able to hold onely Valachia his old gouernment. Euen he which but a little before commanded abone an hundred thousand fouldiers in field; he, which in despight of who said nay, was able to command Valachia and Moldaula, and happily the other countries also neere vnto him, as having received the command of Transylvahis as Goulernour for the Emperour; he that made Constantinople to tremble, and found no Empire equall to his defignes. But it fareth oftentimes with the Great, as with birds of prey, who greedily feeking to prey vpon others, become themselves a prey vnto others greater than themselves for they never contented, and attributing onely vnto their owne valour and wisedome, their owne prosperous proceedings, are the true shewers of the vnstable whoele of Fortune for what fay I of Fortune being rather the very children of Folly. So commonly falleth it out with Princes (especially the new) which in the garboiles of war betwixt their mighty neighbours, not governed by their owne wisedome, rest themselves onely vpon the advice of their Counsellours, are by them led they wor not whither, for the greatest interest they haue in them. For had the Vayuod had but the least in fight into politicall government, he might well have understood, that among it so many mighty Princes he could not much grow, or yet well root himselfe, without the affured stay of some one or other of them. He should alfo have knowne within what compasse a new Prince ought to have vied secretty and sigour; and that he ought to obstaine from all offence in good or otherwise, which might any way F procure vnto him the displeasure or hatred of his subjects. Whereas his Counsellors not fo much respecting his profit as their owne, had not the power or not the will to persuade him so by good meanes to plant himselfe sure in Transylvania, but so both east him headlong from

Now lay Baffa encamped in the field in Transylvania, when a moffenger came vote him 6 from the great Chancellour of Polonia, to declare unto him, That it was not his purpose of trouble Transylvania, having no such order from the King : albeit that he would addie the Transviuanians, if they wished to line in quiet, to make choice of a Prince of their owne mei on, and fuch a one as the Turke should well like of, whereas otherwise they should but seek their owne destruction, together with their neighbors, Which his counsell was well marked of them all, albeit it was thought by many of the wifer fort, not fo much to proceed of atm good meaning he had towards the Tranfy luanians, as of an old grudge and inutscrate hand he had alwaies borne against the house of Austria, as also, that he even then countenanced the Prince Sigilmund with his army to no other end, but by him to raile up new flire in that Pril uince and to to draw it from the Emperors obeilance, although thereby it became agains mis H butary unto the Turke, who in all these magrees had a great hand. Yea, some sticked not to say, That he couertly aimed at that principality for his fonne, howfocuer he masked the fame on der the flew of Sigismund the late Prince. But ynto him answer was given by the Transvine. nians, (with thanks for his good will) That in all their consultations they would have a wincipall regard of their owne welfare, together, with the common. Which answer be having seed. The Chancellow ued, forthwith placed one Simon (the brother of Hieremias the Moldanian) Vayuodof Valachia in flead of Michael by him driven our, and fo leaving a convenient number of fouldies Vaynod in Val of Michael, by ans, the Turks craftily gaue place, knowing well to play the foxes where they could not play the lyons, wifely for a time comporting the injury : and the old Chancellor as crafty as then I having a secret purpose by occasion of these prosent troubles, to preser at length his son was the principality of Transylvania, and thereunto also to joyne the countries of Moldania and Valachia, had therin of purpole placed the aforefaid Simen, a man of novalour, and of a fmall apprehension, whom he might againe at his pleasure displace, and joyne those provinces vano his new purchase I which he could not so well do if he should have there placed a man of great ter reach and courage. A of leffe life than the remembrance of a benefit with the vnthankful, which the greater it is, the more it is repayd with ingratitude, either by making it to haue bin of little worth, or to haue proceeded not of curtefie, but from some other more privat and proper consideration, of the giuer. The Diet aforesaid being assembled, diners broiles were there raised by the male. Contents:as viually it commeth to passe where the people have to do with the government, apt to be moved with every humor, alwaies ready to change their opinion, as straight glutted there with headstrong, faithlesse, all in words to no end : some of them in that assembly cried out. That the Almaines might be payd, discharged, and thanked for the paines they had taken for them as their neighbors, with offering to do them the like pleasure as their occasions should require; others cried to have them put all to the fword, fo much they were devoid of reason: R others cried out as fast, That they were not by any means to indure the government of Maximilian the Archduke, but by fome nominated vnto them, would needs have a prince of their own country, and fuch a one as the Turk should wellike of, as the Chancellor had persuaded them. Balla for all that not dismaied with so vnexpected an incounter (albeit he began to sufoe & that he had lost all his labor, if he were not in short time with greater forces relieued at fuch time as the Chiaki, with other chief men among st the people, came as their manner was enery other day to visit him; with couragious speech and vnapalled countenance told them plainly. That he wel perceived their drift and purpose; and yet doubted not either of their oth Basta State of obedience guen vnto his Imperiall Majesty, either of the fresh remembrance of the great freshluspians benefit they had from him so lately received; and in case it might happen them, little to e-C steem of those things (greater than which could not happen among men) that yet they should welknow, that he was not a man to be feared with words, but fully resoluted not to stir one foot thence with his forces, but rather to lose his life, which he would for all that sel as dear as he could. Wherunto auswer was given with much curteous speech. That he should not give eare vinto any the speeches of the light vulgar people, but rather to content himselfe that the Nobility, in whose hands the chief power of that province was, had not don any thing not befeeming themselves. So after much dispute, were appointed three persons according to the three Estates (the Nobility, Commons, and State in generall) to go vnto the Emperour, to request of him Maximilian the Archduke for their gouernor : with special request also, That it would please him not to ouercharge with forrein soldiers that province already fore impoue-D rished, especially having in it self people sufficient for the desence thereof, and more nimble to incounter with the Turks, than the heavy & flow Almains, and they also of double charge. These difficulties with much ado thus appealed by such as stood fast for the Emperour, Basta thought it not good againe to call any such assembly, hoping that time, and the Emperours great wildom, would for al thele matters find convenient remedy. Yet faw he plainly, the peoples mind was, to resolue to remain for euer free, if they should have come to a second Confultation; and rather a princely defire to command, than to be commanded: yea, in that felfe fame Diet the Chiaki was declared gonernor on the behalf of the people, with authoritie of himself in many things to determine, without calling together of any assembly of the rest of the States, which they faid they did only, vntil they were by his Imperial! Maiesty prouided E of a Gouernor. Neuertheles Basta well perceived more than a Tribunitial power to be now joined by the people vnto the Emperors Commissioners, knowing that this Chiaki well hoped to have bin proclaimed Prince of the Confederats, in case they had not bin presently relieued against the Vayuod: and having in him yet noted still his great ambition, for that marching from Torda toward the Vaiuod, he caused to be caried before him a spear, with an Hungarian cap, and a plume of feathers upon a lance, in token of his chiefe command; albeit that afterward at the complaint of Basta, pretending therin a wrong to be done vnto his regiment, marching under the Imperial standard, he took it down:neither was he then a little suspe &cd to have suffered his soldiers to sack Alba-Iulia, as also to have surprised Fogaras, and to have vied divers other means all tending to popularitie and ambitions aspiring. would fend his Germans out of the country, and so after so many troubles to give it leave to G breath a little as for himselfe, he might stay at Alba Iulia vntill the men deputed to that purrole might go vnto his Majesty with their requests. Basta not a little troubled with such an imperious request, and now, but not before, perceiuing the occasion of this great discontent. ment. faw himself much deceived in a most material point, and the ground of all this action. by trusting too much to his owne too small forces, too weake for the defence of his person, much leffe to keepe vnder fo populous a prouince, such as before in the yeare 1552, under the leading of Castaldo, had of it self sent out 70000 fighting men for the besieging of Lippa, and now upon the fudden 12000 with a few noblemen in the face of a mighty and armed Enemy where they now held an armed consultation with him, the Nobility meeting together with their great retinues,& so much the greater, by how much the suspition was the more by them H feared, for them to be inforced to refolue vpon any thing contrary to their good liking:wher. as he contenting himself only with their oath, without any other hostages, and so giving and vnto the Confederats, had put himselse vpon their faith, together with all his people, into the midst of Transylvania; a matter of far greater importance than any pledge they were able to have given him. Besides that, of the 6000 men which hee had brought with him into that Country, three thousand fine hundred of Silesia now brought to 2000, could not be persuaded longer to flay without their pay before hand, the pay of their Country being spentalres. dy : and the rest drawn out of the garisons in the upper Hungary, or els there pressed, were at a certain time to return home. Yet neuerthelesse he attempted in some sort to satisfie their request, for not gricuing of the Countrey, by requesting them to deliuer vnto him some strong 1 place, wherinto he putting his men into garifon, they might fo lie without any further charge or trouble to the Country, living vpon their ownewages. Which when hee could not obtain and withall confidering, that if those few of his people which yet remained could bee contented to flay with him, the retaining of them might give occasion vnto the definous of new stirs, upon every the least disorder of the soldiers to alter the matter at their pleasure (as had hapned vnto the eight thousand Almains of Castaldo, driven somtimes out of that Country under the colour of some insolencie by them committed; although others had beene the chief doers therof, namely about some twenty Polonians) hee resolued of all these things to give notice to the Court, and so fair and softly to march with his souldiers vnto the frontiers of that country, and to faue his eight pieces of artillery with other munition in Samos Vivat K castle, a strong fortres a good way within the confines, which together with the strong castle of Kuivar, Aga Leche an Albanoise, and Generall of the Vayuods horsmen, deliuered to Zakil Captain of Zaccomar, one of his Majesties Commissioners, who there provided for the Gouernor Balta his familiar fauourit: although that the Transylvanians had with great promises fought to have croffed such delivery of the aforesaid Castles, and to have had them in their own power.

Wherfore Baffa not deceived, but by necessity inforced, yeelded that hee could not hold; and gaue that he could not fel, making a vertue of necessity; deceived in the event of the matter which he had propounded vnto himself from the beginning, for assuring that Country to the Emperor: by an excusable error, if it be true that some wise men say, Nothing to bee more vnreasonable, than by the euent of matters to judge of their wisdome by whom they were managed; which confifteth not in divining before of the certainty of the cuent, but in the reasonable coniecture therof by the means leading therunto, than which nothing is more deceitfull, as not depending from their own actions only, but from other mens also more groffe and vnreasonable:none knowing better how much the wisdom of man deceiueth it self, than those which are vnto themselues true witnesses of the euent of their own consultations. Neuerthelesse the matter was afterward so wel handled by Basta, PetZen, and others the Emperors great fauorits in Transylvania, that in a Diet holden among the Transylvanians, he was with a conucnient gard again by them received as the Emperors lieutenant, vntil further order were by him taken for the gouernment and affurance of that countrey: the Chiaki and his Complices M faintly consenting therunto, as not greatly pleased therwith. Neither had Basta much cause of be proud of such his gouernment, having thereof no longer affurance than pleased that fickle people to afford him:yet fith no better could be had, he must take it as he might, deeming it better in some fort for the present to hold it for the Emperor, than not at all. With which his weake state among it more enemies than friends we will for a while lease him. But whilst things thus passed, as we have said, in Transylvania and Hungary, the treaty for peace betwirt the Emperor & the Turks being vanished into smoke, Ibrahim Bassa the Turkes General in Hungary, having all the last Winter made great preparation for the inuasion of the Emperors territories, and the doing of fome notable enterprise for the recovery of his reputation fomwhat impaired by the euil fucces of the last yeares Wars; and euen in these his preparations of this year, not a little troubled by the mutiny of the Ianizaries and Spahl, for want of their pay at Constantinople, as also with the rebellion in Caramania; now at length in the later end of August, by order from the grand Seigniour his great Lord and master, began to fet forward with his army from Belgrade, supposed to be about two hundred thousand men strong. And comming to Babatica, a strong fortresse of the Christians in the neather Hungary, fate down before it, and having planted his artillery furioufly battered it, with purpose to have the next day affaulted it : but the captaine of the castle considering the weaknes of his garrison to with stand so puissant an enemy, and that the walls were already fore shaken with the fury of the great ordnance, came to a reasonable Composition with the great Bassa, and so delivered vnto him the place. Which exploit don, and the Castle to him surrendred, he marched from thence to Canifia, a strong town in the frontiers of Stiria, of most menbe- canifia befound fore supposed a place impregnable; for that it was scituat in a very deepe marish, and surnished with a strong garrison of valiant soldiers, part Hungarians, and part Almains. After this firong town Ibrahim the great Bassa especially longed, so to free those frontiers of the Turkes from the often incursions that the garrison soldiers of that place made therein; as also by the taking of that so strong a fortresse from the Christians, to open a more free and safe passage to the Turkes for Austria, to the indangering of those places of the Empire also farther off. Wherefore incamping his great army on the fide of the marish which compassed the Island round wheron the town stood, he began with fagots and earth to fil vp the marish, so to passe ouer his army; they in the town in the mean time not ceasing with their thundring shot to diflurb them, and to do them what harm they might who for all that proceeding in their work had brought it now almost close to the Island; where while they were about to have landed, they were by the garrison souldiers so incountred, that having lost a number of their men, as wel lanizaries as others, with two of their best captains also, they were by plain valor inforced D to fetyre. But preparing themselues against the next day, with greater force to have againe returned vinto the affault of the Isle, they faw the Imperial army now at their backs, and come so neer them, that with their artillery they did them great harm; which put them in no small fear, seeing themselves inclosed betwire the town and the camp, and both out of the one and the other to receive no small hurt, as wel with the small shot as the great; besides that out of the camp divers whole bands sometimes sallied, discharging great vollies of shot even into their trenches. In the Imperial army were but two and forty thousand horse and soot, men of diners nations, under the leading of Duke Mercury, now Generall of the Emperours forces in Hungary, with whom were the Lords Nadasti, Esdrin, Bacchian, and the governour of Croatia, with divers other famous Captains come thither for the relief of Canifia (a place of fo great E importance for the defence of that fide of the Country) and to helpe that it fell not into the power of the barbarous enemy. But Ibrahim Baffavnderstanding by his espials the smal number of the Christians, and wel knowing how much he was too strong for them, by reason of his great multitude, went out against them, and finding them as ready as himselfe, joined battell Abattell be. with them, with great flaughter of men both on the one fide and on the other. Which blou-tween the chief dy fight (the victory yet standing doubtfull, but in mens judgements more inclining to the bifore Canific. Christians than to the Turks) was at length by the comming on of the night broken off. At which time the Christians retyring themselves into their trenches, the Turkes stood all that hight in the camp, with their weapons in their hands, as fearing to have bin again in the night by their enemies affailed. Mean while the Christian Captaines at variance amongst them-F selues, and so not now to be commanded by Duke Mercury their General; ar such time as the Turks prefuming on their multitude dared them to battell the next day, could by no means be perfuaded to go forth against them, or once to stirre out of their trenches. Insomuch that the General of the Tartars ther cupon beeing incouraged, made an inrode into the Countrey

ftian camp, flew the conuoy that garded them, and fo caried them quite away. Wherby feel G want arose in the Christian Camp, that having not what to eat, and out of hope of any new supply of relief in time to come, they were glad by night to dislodge & retyre. Which could not fo fecretly be don, but that it was of the Turks perceived : who presently following after them, in the tail of the army cut off about 3000 of them, with certain pieces of great ordnance and most part of the baggage; the rest of the army in the mean time retyring farther offine places of more fafety. From this victory the Turkes returned again to the fiege of Canifa, where after a few daies, the garifon foldiers now out of hope to be in good time relieved find denly fel into mutiny, refuting any longer to defend the towne, now hardly layd vnto by the Turks, and the rather, for that divers of the Hungarians were already fled out of the Towne vnto the Baffa, having, as it was thought, reucaled vnto him the whole estate of the besieged, H So that now there was no remedy, but that the Towne must be delinered vnto the enemy tal. though Paradifer with some other of the captains did what they might, as they said afterward. to have perfuaded the contrary. Wherupon they came to parly with the Baffa, and couenant ting with him, That they might with bag and baggage depart, and with a fafe Conuov bee brought ouer the river Mur, promised to yeeld the town vnto him. All which the Baffa granted, fearing how to have bin able to have kept the field, if they should any long time have hole den out. Winter now fo fast approching. So the 22 of October the town was vnto the Bassa right cowardly delivered, and the garrison foldiers with their baggage, in 100 waggons lene them by the Turks, fafely conducted ouer the Mur, as was vnto them promifed. After the se greement made for the yeelding vp of the towne, the Baffa in courtefie fent vnto Paradifer the 1 gouernor a very rich gown of cloath of gold : which albeit hee refused, yet was it afterwards land to his charge, as a prefumption of fome treacherous collution betwirt him and the Baffa for the betraying of the town, which it was thought he might much longer have kept, ibrahim now thus possessed of the town he had so much desired, fortified it more strongly than ever it s.inteforeged was before; and for the more affurance thereof, put into it a ftrong garrifon of 4000 foot and 500 horse, all old expert soldiers; and immediatly after without resistance forraged the country round about Canissa, burning all before him as he went; the poore Christian inhabitants flying as fast as they could for safegard of their lines. But having thus with the spoile of the country wel pleased his soldiers; he desirous to have the same againe in time repeopled, as therby to yeeld vnto the Turks the more profit, staied their further outrage, ypon great paine K forbidding the same; by open proclamations in every place set vp, inviting the Christians without fear of farther harm, to return again into the country, where submitting themselves vnto the great Sultans obedience, they should under his protection safely dwell, without any tribute to be of them exacted for three years space next following. Which proclamations were in his name thus published.

Many of these poor countrey people before fled for seare of the Turks, and not knowing where to bellow themselves, now vpon this proclamation returned to their antient dwelling places, there to begin the world again under the Turkish obeisance. But for that County Serisms was the man whom of all others in that Countrey the great Baffa fought after , as him whom he most feared after his departure to trouble this his newconquest, and to feek to be resinged (having in this calamity of Stiria his country loft twenty villages of his owne, quite beent by the Turks, and the people most slain or els taken prisoners) hee many times before having fought to persuade him to yeeld his obedience vnto the Turkish Sultan, and now in hope after to great a loffe to bring him in before all his fortunes were veterly ruined (by the holle of Canifia, and the entrance of the Turks into Stiria, not a little indangered) writ to him B as followeth:

TE Thrabim Baffe, chiefe of the Viller Baffes, and coufin to the most puissant Salean Mahomet, thrabin saga to the County Serious fendeth greeting. We have oftentimes hertofore written vato thee con. but letters also serning the matter shou knowest of, but what the cause is we received no answer, we know not. From our Camp, after the conquest of Canisia, the 7 of November, 1600.

But these letters being also as the rest, answered with silence, the great Bassa having dispo-Red of all as he thought best at Canific and in the country therabout, returned with his army to Belgtade, there to winter: having before fully certified the great Sultan of all his proceedings, and the fucces of this war, vounting after his vain maner, the next year to be fiege Vicuna alfo, if he fo commanded. Of all which Mahimet ynderstanding, Se not a little pleased thern with caused great triumphe to be made four daies together at Constantinople, and in token of his love and favor, sente rich robe of cloath of gold, with a leading state all see with pearl and pretions Rones, vnto the Baffa vet lying at Belgrade.

This loffe of Canifia much troubled all that fide of Christendom, especially them of the territories belonging to the house of Austria in a fort difmaied, to feethe Turkes fo cally possessed of stown, before thought almost impregnable, and the strongest desence of all that country against the furious impressions of the Turks, to whom it was now become a most fafe and fure receptacle; all men with one voice blaming the discord of the captains in the Imperislarmy, for fo retyring withour any good doing; but about all detelling the cowardisc of Paradifer, who known to have in the town a firong garrilon, with good flore of munition and victuals (as was supposed) had sobalely delivered the same unto the enemystor doing his vemost devoir for the defence theroft wheras if he had so don, haply in the meane time the sold and unfeatonablenes of the weather (though no other relief had bin) winter being now come, might have inforced the Turks to raise their siege. Wherupon he was for this fo foule a fact by the Emperors commandenrent apprehended and east in prison at Vienna; where after he had long lien, and his cause oftentimes examined, he was the next year after condemned of felony and cowardife, and so the fifteenth day of O Ctober executed sharing first his hand at Paradyte ensfour frokes of the Executioner firstek off, and after that his head. A Regalis, one of the chiefest & strongest cities in Hungary, which seated in the midst of a ma. Alba-Regalia rich, was thought almost impregnable: beeing hardly to bee approached but by the suburbs, chillians, which strongly sortified and defended by the marish, served the City in stead of 3 most sure bulwarks; within which flood also the city it self, wel defended with a good wall and a ditch, This city the Duke for certain dayes continually battered, as if he had purposed at length to hauetaken it by affault:but in the mean time certainly informed by a fugitive lately fled out of the city, That the broad lake on the other fide of the City, over against the place where he lav.was not fo deep but that it was to be passed (contrary to the opinion both of the Turkes captives, and of the flatural inhabitants, whom he had upon that point examined) and that the Turks prefuming voon the frength therof, & thinking themselves on that side safe, had bent R almost all their care and forces to that fide of the City now by him battered, not regarding any great peril to be from the other fide feared; he appointed the Lord Rulworm with his foldiers to make proofe if the Sigeth suburbs (for so they were called) on the aforesaid side of the city, lo little regarded by the Turks, were not to be furprised, for that these suburbs being taken the City would not long hold out. For the undertaking of which enterprise Ruffworm was by the eapting Tarks and country people thereby dwelling; much discouraged; they all with one consent afficiling, That albeit he should find no other difficulties in attempting of it, yer the lake it felliwas not possible to be passed. Neither sped they much better. who were fent by the Baffa to have attempted the taking of Alba Regalis; for beging come neer theranto, they were fo welcommed with great shot out of the city, and charged with often

About the same time that the Duke began to besiege Alba-Regalis, Ferdinand the Archduke having received great aid from the Pope, with the other Princes of Italy, and the King of Spain, and so now 30000 strong, by the aduice of the Duke of Mantua his Lieutenant ge-R neral resolved to besiege Canisia : which to have againe recovered out of the Turkes hands. concerned much not them of Stiria and Austria only, but the other provinces adjoining, yea and Italy it felf also. Wherupon he with his army in good order came the tenth of September and incamped before it; the Duke of Mantua and Don John de Medices, with 2000 Har- canifoldefined quebusiers and two Cornets of horse being come the day before to take view of the towne, at by the christian whom the Turks made divers thor, but without any harm doing. And albeit that the Turkes and there in garrison (in number not past a thousand, accounting likewise 300 of the Wallons fomtime of the garrison of Pappa) with their often and gallant fallies greatly troubled the Christians, and that great bands of the other Turks came out of the strong towns and fortresfestherby, to skirmish with them, and to see if they could put any moe souldiers into the town o for the more affurance therof; yet fuch was the carefulnesse of the Christian Commanders, and valour of their fouldiers, that the Turkes both in the one place and in the other were still repulfed and put to flight, with the loffealfo of some of their small Castles and forts thereabout. To approch this strong towne, and to plant a battery against it, seemed to be a matter of great difficulty, for that it was (as we have elswhere said) invironed round with a marish : yet means was found to dry it a little, and to fill it vp on the one fide, and to come fo neere the Town, that having planted three tyre of artillery against it, the Christians began surjously to batter it, beating downe both the walls, the houses, and other buildings therin; yea at length they had brought their approaches fo neer, that they were come with their trenches even close vnto the Towne ditch, perfuading the Turks, now whilest they might upon good conditions. D to surrender the Towne, and so to saue their lines. Whereunto their fierce and inraged mindes were fo far from hearkening, that brauing the Christians, they faid, That they would indespight of all their forces keepe the place for their Sultan, do what they could. Whereupon the Archduke and the Duke of Mantua, by the adulce of Medices and the rest of the principall Captaines and Commanders in the Army, resolved to give a general assault vnto the towne. In the mean time newes was brought into the Campe, of the winning of Alba-Regalis, which there made great rejoicing; in figne wherof the Christians (as their manner is) in triumph many times discharged their great Ordnance; and by sit men persuaded the garrison soldiers in Canissa to yeeld, and not to cast themselves into such danger as had their fellows in Alba Regalis; for that in fo doing they should not only faue their lives, but easily E also obtain such other conditions as they could reasonably desire : whereas otherwise they should to their cost find the Christians strong enough to constraine them, which must needs bring with it their vtter ruine and destruction. Whereunto the garrison souldiers (among st whom the renegat Wallons were the chiefe) contemptuously answered, That they little feared such weake affailants: and with great cry and scorn commaunding the messengers to depart, in token of their confidence, as also not to seeme inferiour vnto the Christians, oftentimes to small purpose discharged their great Ordnance, as had the Christians the day before. Now although the walls of the towne with continual battery were fore shaken, and the breaches almost laid open; yet was the intended assault for a while deferred, vntil the bridges might be made that were to be laid ouer the towne Ditch for the Christians to passe ouer vpon. But all things as was thought, now in a readinesse, and the Florentines with some other Italians (whose lot it was to give the first affault) beeing come forward, the bridge by which they were to passe the town ditch, was found both too short and too weak for them to get ouer vnto the other fide by; fothat finking vnder them, not the foldiers only, but even the Commanders themselves (and namely Herbenstein) were in great danger to have bin lost. By which means they hindred, and the enemies murthering pieces continually flanking them, G and their musketiers still playing vpon them afront, they were inforced to retyre, leaving behind them 300 of their men flain. Yet were not the Christian commanders any thing there with discouraged, but being generally resolued not to give ouer that they had taken in hand until they had brought it to effect, began to make such provision as they knew to be needfull to preferue their army under, against the violence of the winter weather, as also to hinder that novictual might be brought vnto the towne, so by famin at length to inforce the Turkes and Wallons to yoeld: who although they were already pinched with wants, infomuch that horfflesh was dainty cheer with them; yet for all that, they nothing abated of their wonted fierce. nes, but being again required to yeeld, vouchfafed not to answer one word, but in stead theref shook their naked swords afar off at them, in token of their vindaunted courage. But yet for al this resolution of the commanders for the continuance of the siege, Aldobrandino Generall of the Italians, being now a little before dead of an old infirmitie that he had, the Italians began at the first some few of them secretly to withdraw themselves out of their quarter; but afterwards in great number to depart, and so to return again into their country: alledging for their excuse want both of pay and victuals. But the rest better minded, understanding the Turkes were rifen from before Alba-Regalis, and the rest of the army dis-banded, began to enter into new hope, by some device or other to passe the ditch, and so by sorce to take the town; & the rather for that they were by a French fugitive informed both of the weaknesse and wants of the befieged. Whereupon they began afresh to make new engins for the approching of the walls without danger of the enemies ordnance any more to flank them. At which time also: I viz. the fourth of November, the Lord Ruffworm came vnto the camp, fent thither from Duke Mercary with 8000 fouldiers, after that Haffan Baffa had disfolued his army. By whose comming they were also the more incouraged to prosecute that they had undertaken. Neither fais led the Turkes in the meane while with often fallies to trouble the Christians, attempting aboug all things to have fired their tents, for that lying open in that so cold a season of the year they must of necessity be inforced to raise their siege and be gon. But the succes of these their fo great defignes was not answerable to their hopes, being still beaten back with losse into the city by the Christians: whom it behooved to look well about them, for that the besieged desperatly set, and all resolued rather to die than to yeeld, aduentured themselves to all dangers, never ceasing to do what they might to put the Christians out of hope for winning K the town. But whilst the Turks with doubtful & as it were desperat hope so defend the place, and the Christians grown stronger by the comming of their friends, lay in hope to winne the fame; lo, in the later end of November, a North wind accompanied with a deep fnow fo furioutly raged, that it ouerthrew the greatest part of the tents and paulions of the Christians, and as it were buried the whole army in frost and ice; in such wise, as that in the Arch Duke Ferdinands camp (being reasonable wel prouided for) was 1500 men with 300 horses started and frozen to death. At which time the state of them that came with the Lord Ruffwormwas most miserable, who wearied with the siege of Alba-Regalis, and as it were spent with the dirty trauell of the deep way, had not brought with them their tents or other prouision, and were therfore inforced to lie abroad in fo cold and unfeafonable a time : with whose miseries] although their good Generall was much grieued, yet to do the Christian Commonweal seruice, he with them right patiently endured. In which fo great an extreamity, the Archduke The Christians with the rest of the Commanders upon view taken, well considering what small hope there inforced by vin- was in good time to take the towne, the vnfeafonablenesse of the Winter weather still more and more increasing, thought it better betimes to rise, than longer to expose their army unto the first of Al. the most certain destruction either of the enemy or the cold. Which was donwith such has and confused tumult, as that their rising rather feemed an hasty flight, than honorable departure; leaving behind them for hast their great ordnance, with their tents and baggage, a common voice still running, That they were well if they might but saue themselues : so that the foldiers every man mindful of himfelf, and in feare to be pursued by the enemy (no mancha M fing them) fled, but still accompanied with such surious windes, snow, and extream cold, that with all the labour they could take, they could get them no heat, but fell down to the eatth, many of them frozen, and so once falling neuer rose more, being vnable for want of heate to help themselues: in which case they were not to expect for helpe from others, euery man ha-

A using enough to do to look vnto himself: so that vpon the way wherby the army went thus dis foersed with the weather, lay aboue 500 dead of cold, beside 400 others lest sick in the forsaken trenches, who forthwith after the departure of the army, were thought to haue bin al flain by the garifon of Canifia. But having thus passed through the troubles of Flungary, it is time now also to look back again into the frontier countries of Transylvania and Valachia; which to have kept in the Emperors obedience, and so preserved as a lively member of the Christian commonweal, no leffe concerned him, than the keeping of any other his frontier territories, which are many. Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, the last years for his cruelty first driven out of Transylvania by Basta, and afterwards out of Valachia by the great Chancellor of Polonia (as is a forefavd) R and another placed in his stead; as a man forfaken euen of his own better fortunes, and not well knowing which way to turn himfelf, thought it best now at last to submit hunfelf to the Emperour, if so happily by his means hee might in some fort repaire his broken estate, and so at leastwife recouer his gouernment in Valachia. So resoluted, he set forward, and in the beginning of this year, viz. the three and twentieth of Ianuary, with fine and thirty of his followers, and fix Coaches, arrived at Prague, where he was by the Emperours appointment honour rably received, and his cost at the Emperors charge defraied. To whom he excused himself Michael recovaof the seueritie by him vsed in Transylvania (the cause of those late troubles in that country) as inforced therunto by the stubbornnesse of the Transylvanians themselves, whom he found stil inclined to rebellion, and not willing to be commanded by any but themselves. Which C his excuse (as true) was well admitted, and he with all kindness vsed. Now at this same time Baffalying also in Transylvania, as gouernour for the Emperour, right flenderly accompanied (as is before also declared) the parliament at Clausenburg being ended, and all controversies aswas thought, wel composed, now without sear one night, the Watch being set, went to bed to take his rest, where he had not long lien, but that certaine of the Transilvanian Lords (a. mong whom the Chiaki was chiefe) came with their followers, and furprifing the watch and entring the palace, brake into the chamber where he lay, took him out of his bed, and so kept him prisoner all that night. And the next morning going forth, about twelve miles off met Baffa imprison with Sigifmund Bathor their late prince, before secretly by them called in, whom they honoura. and by the training bly conducted vnto Clausenburg, and there deliuered Basta vnto him (the late Governour strandard). D for the Emperour) whom he commaunded to be cast into irons : and so going to the Palace. gate like order for the apprehending and fafe keeping of the rest of the Nobility also such as had taken part with Basta in the behalf of the Emperor. For now the Transylvanians were diuided into three parts; wherof the one food for the Emperour, the second for Isluan Bathor.

pretending that vnto him belonged the fourraignty of that province; but the third, & far the greatest, for Sigismund their antient Lord and leader, who now by means of the King of Polonia reconciled vnto the Turke, and in this troublesome time by his fauourits called again into his country, was of them joyfully received at Alba Iulia, Clausenburg, and the rest of the significant rechief cities of Transylvania. Who now therof again possessed, for the better assuring of his coners transstant estate, forthwith writernto the Emperour of all that had happened, requesting him to content vania. E himself, that he was defirous of his love and favour, promiting to be alwaies his good friend and neighbor, and for ever to keep good amity with him. Giving Basta also (whom hee had now at the intercession of certaine great friends inlarged) to understand, That hee was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging to his principalitie, as also to c ase from further molesting of his people, that were now voluntarily againe returned vnto his obedience. Which his request was neither of the one nor the other much regarded or hearkened vnto. For the Emperour voon the first aducttisement of this so great an alteration in Transylvania, calling vnto him Michael the Vayuod (not so much troubled with the strangenesse of the matter, as for that his wife and fonne, whom hee had left as hostages with Basta, were now fallen into the hands of the Transylvanians his mortall enemies) and satisfying him in many things that he had before requested, tooke order with him, That with all convenient speed returning home againe into Valachia, where he was now of many much longed for (the people generally difliking the simple Vayuod which the great Chancellor had set ouer them) and gathering together such power as hee could, he should joine himselfe with Basta his Licutenant General, vnto whom he had already fent great companies both of horse and foor, for the repulfing of Sigismund out of Transylvania, and the reducing againe of that province G vnder his obcifance. Whereupon the Vayuod forthwith returning into Valachia, and affembling about ren thousand of his friends, all good and expert soldiers, went to seek for Basta, as he had with the Emperor agreed, whom he found ready in the field with about twenty thoufand foot, and eight thousand horse, but newly departed from Veradinum: Where mustering their army, they with their vnited forces entred into Transylvania, there to put in execution what the Emperor had commanded. Where the Vayuod in disdain of the people that loud him nor, with fire and sword wasted all the Country before him as he went; not without the ereat discontment of Basta, to whom it seemed not good to make desolat that country, which he was in good hope should in short time be his Lord and Master the Emperors. But Sigif. mund vinderstanding both of the comming of his enemies, and the harm they did in his coup. try tife from Solnock where he lay incamped with his army, and so to hinder their further proceeding went to meet them: howbeit being come so neer vnto them as that he might well discouer them, he would not come to the trial of a battell with them, as was by them offered: but fortified himself in his trenches, so seeking but to delay the time vntill the comming of the Tartars, which were to have come vnto him from the Chancellor of Polonia, as also of fix thousand Turks to have bin sent him from the Bassa of Belgrade. Where having afterwards understood. That the passage of the Tartars to have been sent him, was stayed by Don Ferent Gonzaga the Emperors Lieutenant in the vpper Hungary; and that the Turks staying at Giula, would come no farther, except they had their pay before hand; finding himselfe too weake with his owne power to incounter with his enemies, he rife with his Army, with a purpose to 1 have retyred a little back, and to have taken certain ftreight passages wherby the enemy most needs passe, so by the advantage of the place to have holpen his weak strength. But Bassand the Vayuod perceiuing his rifing (whereunto they were fill attentiue) followed him with fuch speed, that they overtooke him before he could get thither, and so hardly pressed him. that needs he must turn his face and join battel or else suffer his people altogether like beass to be flaine. In which doing albeit that neither he nor his failed to doe what was by men to Sigifmund obe done for the obtaining of a notable victory; yet such was the valour of the souldiers of B4fla and the Vayuod that in a great battel having disordered his footmen, they put them to flight, and so cut them all in pieces. Which the prince beholding, and not able to preuent, betime fled with his horimen from the fury of the enemy, and fo retyred to the vimon confines K of Transylvania, having in this conflict lost ten thousand of his faithfull soldiers. Wherupon Claudiopolis, with divers other cities and towns of that country, returned again vnto the Emperors obeisance.

In the profecuting of this victory, the Vayuod to fatisfie the hatred he had of long borne against the Transylvanians, did what spoil he could, veterly wasting all the places wherby hee passed. Which Basta not liking, requested him to vie his victory with more modesty, and to have more respect to what he did, especially vnto such places or persons as of themselves returned vnto the Emperors obeisance. Wherunto he proudly answered, That hee would doe what he thought good, without his appointment or the Emperours either, especially in that country which he had now with his own fword twice conquered: & that therfore Bafta might command them that were by him to be commanded as for himselfe, he acknowledged no soucraignty that either Bafta or the Emperour had over him. Vnto which fo presumptuous a speech Bafta replied not; but yet much discontented therewith, began to enter into a great suspition, from what ground those his hauty conceits (easily by his words to be gathred) might grow, and so from that time better observing his proceedings, perceived him to have intelligence with the Turks, with purpose to join hands with them, that so by their helpe chacing the Imperials out of Transylvania, he might hold it to himselse as tributary vnto the Othemas Emperour, of all others best able to defend him. Which to bee true (besides divers other strong presumptions) he certainely understood by certaine letters of his written to that purpose, intercepted by his soldiers and brought vnto him. Wherupon he became very pensue M and heavy, for the great power the Vayuod was of in those Countries, as also for the great strength he had even then present about him, and wher with he was as it were then garded. So confulting with certain of his Colonels and chief commanders of his army, what were beft to be don in that so dangerous a case whereof so much depended? A Wallon Captaine offered

A himselfe to go into the Vayuod his campe, and there in his owne tent to kill him as a traitor. Which his offerwell liked of, and he as ready to performe as he was to promife, going into the Vayuods camp accompanied with some threescore men, and finding him in his tent, boldly stepping to him, willed him to yeeld himselfe the Emperours prisoner: whereat he being about to lay his hand upon his scimitar, the Wallon captaine with an halbert thrust him into Michael the the breast, at which very instant another with a sword at one blow claue his head down to the shoulders. An unworthy death for so worthy a captain, had not ambition (the torment of great spirits) caried him too high with the wings of immoderat desire, beyond the bounds of Jovaltv and reason. But there he lyeth now dead among his friends, whom the great Turke sometime more feared euen in his palace at Constantinople, than he did all the rest of the Emperours R commanders. Presently upon his death a great tumult and hurly burly was raised by the soldiers in his camp: but Bafta forthwith shewing himselfe with all his soldiers in arms, and withall producing the letters declaring the treason by the Vayuod contrided with the Basia of Temesware against the Emperour, all was againe appealed: but especially for that his fouldiers now faw themselues without an head, and too weake also for the Imperials there present and already in armes. In the Vayuods tent were also other letters found, to plainely declaring his fecret collusion with the Turke, and treason against the Emperor, that the Valachians who at the first were wonderfully moued with his death, and hearing the same read, rested not now only contented, but faid moreouer, that he was worthily flaine, and that if they had knowne him to have any fuch traiterous purpose, they would of themselves long before have taken of C him deserved punished. Now unto his souldiers Basta offered, at their choice, either to departwhither they would without danger; or elfe taking the oath of obedience vnto the Emperour, to enter into his pay; which most part of them did. The tumult appealed, the dead body of the Vayuod was laied out a whole day for the fouldiers to gaze vpon, and fo afterward buried. So lieth he, that but of lare, and many times before, had fo fortunatly ouerthrowne his enemies; vnhappy man himselse now ouerthrowne by his owne ambition and vncon-

But he being brought to so low an ebbe, and almost all the country of Transylvania possessed by Basta; who would not have thought but that now after fo long trauell it would have remained wholly at the Emperors denotion ? and fo many, that thought themselues to see much, said afforcedly it would. But see the change, and what E small affurance even the greatest have of the constancy of the vain multitude:never more like themselves, than in disliking to morrow what they best liked to day, soolish, sencelesse, improuident, rath, headstrong, violent, and aboue all things mutable, and vnconstant. The Easta of Agriconer thrown by Ferrant Ganzaga

But whilest the state thus turneth vpside downe in Transylvania, the Bassa of Agriagoing out with ten thousand Turks in hope to have surprised Toccaie (a strong hold of the Christians in the vpper Hungary) was encountered by Ferrat Gonzaga the Emperoura Lieutenant there, and by him onerthrowne, and with great slaughter of his Turks chassed to the gates of Agria.

Now was Mahomet the Turkish Emperor this yeare also no lesse troubled with the procee. H dings of the Scriuano in Caramania and Natolia, than with the cuill successe of his affaires in Transvluania and Hungary. For the Sertuano by his last yeares victory growne into great credit with the common people, and fill by them more and more followed; to maintaine the reputation of his credit, came now again this yere with a great power into the field, to meet with Mahomes the great Bassa and Generall of the Turks army; who with fifty thousand good fouldiers (a power thought sufficient to have repressed him) was ready to encounter him. With whom the Scrivano joyning battell, in a great fight cut in funder a great part of the Baffaes are my and to become mafter of the field, forraged all the countries adjoyning almost as farre as Aleppo, fill calling the people vnto liberty, and caufing himfelfe to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mahometane Faith, and of the liberty of those countries with him combined: I in such fort, as that it now stood the great Turke vpon to send another great army to the aid of Mahomet the discomfitted Bassa, With whom also the Seriuano (presuming of his former for. tune) comming to a day of battell, and ouercharged with the multitude of his enemies, was at the first encounter with his people put to the worse: but forthwith by his good direction has uing repaired his disordered battell, and thereby given as it were new courage to his fainting fouldiers, he with a great flaughter disordered also the Bassacs army. Yet having not any other firme state or stay to rest your, more than the fauour and reputation he held with these his rebellious followers, of whom he had now loft a great many, he thought it not best to aduenture too far (not knowing how presently to repaire his losses) but contenting himselfe with what he had already done retired with his army into the strength of the mountains, there that K Winter to line vpon the spoile of the countries adjoyning, and the next yeare to do more harme than cuer he had done before.

The Ianizaries in mutiny at Constantinople.

Beside all which former troubles, the plague also this yeare fore raged both in Constantinople and many other places of the Turkish Empire. At which time also the Ianizaries in Constantinople having received some disgrace by some of the Great Sultans savorits, and with great infolency requiring to have their heads, caused their Aga well accompanied prefumptuoufly to enter into the Scraglio to prefer this their request: whom Mahomes to the terror of the rest, caused for his presumption to be taken into the midst of the Spahi, and so by them to be cut in pieces; which was not done without the great flaughter of the Spahi themsclues also, slaine by the Ianizaries. Whereupon the other Ianizaries arising up in arms also, L and even now ready to have revenged the death of their captaine, were yet by the wiledome of Cicala Baffa, bestowing among it them a great fum of money, againe appealed without further harmedoing. Which their fo great infolency Mahomet imputing vnto their excessive drinking of Wine, contrary to the law of their great Propher; by the persuasion of the Musti, commanded all such as had any Wine in their houses in the city of Constantinople and Pers, vpon paine of death to bring it out and to staue it, except the Embassadors of the Queenes Majesty of England, the French King, and of the State of Venice: fo that as some report, Wine for a space ran downe the channels of the streets in Constantinople, as if it had bin water after a great shower of raine.

Sigismund the Transyluanian Prince now of late againe possessed of Transyluania (asisbe M fore declared) could not yet well assure himselse of the keeping thereof: for that he with the Transyluanians of his saction alone, was not able to with stand the force of Baska; who sill strengthened with new supplies both of men and all things else necessary for the wars from the

A the Emperour, was now with a great power already entred into Transylvania: the Polonians busied in the warres of Sueuia, and the Turks with their other greater affaires, neither of them fending him their promised aid, the greatest hope and stay of himselfe in that newnesse of his estate. Wherefore seeing himselfe euery day to lose one place or other, and fearing also lest his foldiers for want of pay should in short time quite for sake him and goe ouer to Basia; he thought it best betimes and whilest he had yet something left, and was not yet altogether become desperat, otherwise to prouide for his estate, especially having small trust in the Turks. to whom he had been before fo great an enemy. Wherfore he dealt with Baffa for a truce or cessation from arms, vntill Embassadors might be sent vnto the Emperor, to entreat with him for some good attonement. Wherefore Basta being content, and the Embassadors sent; the n matter was so handled with the Emperor, that Siessmund to make an end of all these troubles. was contented to the behoofe of his Imperial Majesty, to tesigne unto Basta his Lieutenant all such places as he yet held in Transyluania, vpon much like conditions he had about three veates before made with him : and fo in all, and for all, to fubmit himfelfe voto his Majefly. Which intended furrender of the Princes being bruted in Transylvania, Zachel Moyles his Lieutenant (& now in field with the Princes forces) not able to endure or to heare, that noble Province should again fall into the hands of the Germans; encouraging his soldiers, went vpon the sudden to affaile Basta, in hope to have found him unprovided, & so discomfitting his army, to have driven the Imperials quite out of Transylvania: but he an old and expert Commander, perceiving even the first moving of the Transylvanians, with great celerity put his c army in good order, and fo joyned battell with them : wherein he with the loffe of fome five zactet moyles hundred men querthrew Moyfes, with his army of Transylvanians, Turks, and Tartars having surribrows w flaine about three thousand of them, and put the rest to flight : Moyfer himselie with some few others being now glad to take their refuge into the frontiers of the Turks territories towards Temeswar. But when Sigismund understood what his Lieutenant had without his knowledge done, he in token of his owne innocency went himfelfevnto the Imperiall camp, accompanied onely with certain of his gentlemen, and there vnto Bafta excused himselfe of that which was by his Lieutenant against his will, and without his privity done's frankly offering to performe whatfoeuer was on his part to be performed, according to the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and him. And so presently calling his garrisons out of all such strong places as were D yet for him holden, he furrendred them to Balla; and so forthwith honorably accompanied, put himselse vpon his way towards the Emperor. After whose departure out of Transylvania, all that Province voluntarily and without more adoe yeelded to Basta as to the Emperors Lieutenant: who prefently called an affembly of all the Nobility of the country, taking of them an oath for their obedience and loyalty vnto the Bmp ror. After which victory, Radoll recoursed agains the Sourceignty of Valachia, for which hee was beholden to Baffa: and shortly after with the same aid cut in pieces a great power of the Tartars, that were comming to have aided the Moldavian.

Troubles in Hungary.

Now in the meane time in Hungary also passed many an hot skirmish betwirt the Christian ans and the Turks, whose garrisons at Buda and in other places in the lower Hungary, attemp. ting to have surprised Alba-Regalis, and discouered by the Christians, were with great slaugh. ter enforced to retire. At which time also, County Serinus understanding by his espials, that the Turks with two hundred waggons with munition and victuals were going to Canifia, vp. on the fudden fet vpon them, and having flaine and put to flight the convoy that garded them, H carried the waggons with all that was in them away with him. And shortly after the free Hai. ducks of Comara in a great party going our towards Buda to feek after booty, & having taken threescore Turks prisoners, and so with them about to have returned home; vnderslanding by the way, that Ali sometime the Bassa of Buda, and now Gouernour of Pesth, was with a fmall retinue about to come downe the river Danubius from Buda towards Belgrade, there to meet the Visier Bassa, but then comming into Hungary; they slew all the prisoners, and hauing got two small boats, about fisteene miles beneath Buda lay in wait for the Bassa who according to their expectation comming downe the river, was by these adventurers fiercely assailed, and of his thirty followers having foureteene slaine, being himselfe also that in two places of his body, was there with a great booty taken, and so brought to Comara, and short. I ly after presented vnto Mathias the Archduke at Vienna: who amongst other things, certainely enformed, that Haffan Baffa was with a great army by the commandement of the great Sultan Mahomet comming to besiege Alba-Regalis, and that hee was now upon his way as farre as Belgrade, presently sent thither the County Yolan Gouernour thereof, who with much adoe got into the city, the Turks having already taken all the paffages, to have hindered the Christians from putting in either men or munition, more than was therein already. Howbeit the County now got in there, and being no leffe good enginier than a valiant Commander, caused all them in the city to labour vpon the rampiers: so that beside the naturall scituation thereof, which was very strong, he had in short time so fortified it, as that in most mens judgment it seemed a place almost impregnable. This Ali Bassawas sometime the great K Turks butler, but after the taking of Agriamade Baffa of Buda; which great place he held but three moneths, being by the enuy and ambition of some, but especially of Amerat Bassa, remooued thence and made Gouernor of Pesth: from whence now going downe the river to Belgrade, it was his fortune to be thus taken by the Haiduckes, vnto whom he offered for his ransome three hundred thousand Sultanines; and had with him when he was taken seuenty thousand duckats.

Mahomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the losse of Alba Regalis (taken from him by the Christians the last yeare) and now resolved for the recovery of the same, to ingage if need should be a great part of his forces . had caused an army of 1,0000 strong, to meetat Hadrianople for that purpose, under the leading of Hassan Bassa one of the chiefe Visiers, to be]. fent into Hungary. Who by the way of Belgrade comming to Buda, and from thence to Alba-Regalis, there the twelfth of August incamped (as hee had oftentimes before threatned) with the multitude of his tents covering all the country round about, as if it had been a white fnow:where having well intrenched himfelf, and planted his artillery, he began a most terrible and furious battery, in such fort as if he had not meant to have made a breach only, but to have beaten the city even from the face of the earth, which feemed now to tremble under his feet, and the clouds to rend with the thundring of the great ordnance : and for that the marish and deep ditches were a great let vnto his men for to come vnto the affault, he caused them with the number of his pioners to be filled up (a worke thought almost impossible) and so brought on his men to affault the counterscarfe, which the Gouernor had caused to be made before the M city for the better defence thereof: which affault cost him much bloud, by reason of the wonderfull valor of the desendants : yet in the end the great number of the Turks prevailing, the Christians were inforced to for sake it & retire into the city: but shortly after fallying out again

In this massacre were slaine 3000 Cristian souldiers, beside others of the citisens, in number not few. The captains that were spared, were led prisoners to Constantinople, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation: and with them the County Y folan, for his valor and noble courage vnworthy of so hard a fortune. And so the Bassa having in eighteene daies taken Alba Regalis, (now being cleuen moneths possessed by the Christians) caused the breaches he had made, to be againe repaired, and the city well promided for both of victuals and municion, leaning therein a firong garrifon of fix thousand foldiers ; and with his people having onerun all the country as far as Strigonium, B rolewith his army and retired again to Buda: whereas he was making a bridge of boats ouer the Danubius betwirt Bulls and Pelih, for the more casic transporting of victuall, and better seliening of the one the other as need should require; and himing brought that worke to passe, and about to have gone to the flege of Strigonium; commandement came from the Great Sultan, That he should with all speed returne to Constantinople, for that Mahomet accounting of him as of a most valiant man, was now minded to imploy him in his wars against his Rebels in Natolia, where things now went not well, as that libe hereafter declated. This bridge the Imperials thought necessary fir a to break, the more easily to besiege either the one or the other city; and for that purpose had by a strange device built a ship, which by the force of the streame carried downe the river, and resting upon the bridge, should by a wonderfull power breake the same. The Water city thus woon, and the bridge broken, the next was for the Imperials to be fiege either the one or the other gity. But for that they of Pelth might with their great One nance much anov them in the belieging of the castle and the upper pier as Buda, they thought the best to beg in with it first which they did in much like fore as they had before don at the loss. er city of Buda, the lame deutecagaing wall profipering in their band. For the Lord Raffairs with the fleet voon the river making a great hew as if he would even prefently on that lide have entered had with the fairge by him raifed, drawne downe most pare of the garrison foul. diers vnto that fide of the towne, where most them of danger was : whilest in the meane this County Sultze with the Gouernor of Althem (before undifcovered) your the fudden by land feeled the other fide of the city, and gained the wals, the Turks yet dreaming of no fuch men ter. But hereupon began a terrible outerysche Turks flanding as men aftonied especially now feeling the Christians weapons in their bodies, before they know they were got intertie city. In this fo great an amalement fuch of them as could fled into the ftronges meles ite rest hid themselves in gellars and other themost secret corners they could finde our of which they were afterwards by the Christians drawne and flaine. They which were retired also into the towers and other fronger places of the city, feeing the great ordnance bent men them see now out of all hope of reliefe, offered to yeeld a requesting onely, that they might with their wives and children with life depart, promiting for that favour to thewed them to perfunde them of Buda also in like manner to yeeld. Ypon which promise, that their poore request was granted, and the Lord Nadalli with certaine other Captaines fent with some of thesecitisens to Pesth, with their wives and children to Buda: who comming thither, according to their promise most earnestly requested them of Buda to yeeld, for that they were not now to expect any further helpe, and that by their foolish obstinacy they should be the name of the K death of them, their friends, their wives and children. Vnto whom also, to mooue them the more, the Lord Nadalti promised in the name of the Generall, That they should all excepting some of their chiese commanders in safety depart. Howbeit they of Buda would not hearken thereunto, but flood fill voon their gard. In this city of Pefth, well inhabited with Turkish Merchants, the Christians found great store of wealth, which all became a preyumothe soldiers, with a thousand horses for seruice, many great pieces of artillery, and much other warlike prouision.

I efth taken by the Chriftians.

Pesth thus woon, and a strong garrison lest therein, they returned againe ouer the river to besiege the castle and upper city of Buda, which they attempted by undermining the same, as also by battery, having placed some of their great ordnance so high, that they could at their L pleasure shoot into the middest of the streets of the city; wherewith they much troubled the Turks, not a little before discouraged with the losse of Pesth , thundering also at the same time with their other batteries in diuers places of the walls both of the cattle and of thecity. Where understanding that the Turks garrisons of the frontier Townes and Castles therebouts (hearing of the fiege) were comming to the reliefe of their diffressed friends, they foot out their horsemen with some part of their footmen against them; who meeting with them, gaue them a great ouerthrow, and fo with victory returned againe unto the reft of the Army lying at the fiege, being still in hope either by force or composition to become Masters of the city.

But whilest they lay in this hope, and having the twelfth of October brought their approches neerer vnto the walls, had there planted certaine notable pieces of battery, with purpose the next day with all their power to haue affaulted the City, behold, the Visier Bassa hearing the blanch ring (by the way as he was going to Belgrade, and so to Constantinople) that the city of Pests

A was won, and Buda besieged; changing his mind, returned in haste with such forces as he had yet left, and fo vnlooked for came and fet downe before Pefth, being not then above five and twenty thousand strong, but those all for the most part old and expert souldiers. But whilest the Bassa thus lay at the siege of Pessh on the one side of the viver, and the Imperials at the fiege of Budaon the other, divers brave attempts were in both places given both on the one fide and the other. The Christians in Pesth besieged by the Turks, having amongst them diuers braue captains, and desirous of honor, one day under their conduct fallied out of the city A notable skirto skirmish with the Turks; and comming with them to the sword, by plaine valor disordered the christians them, and enforced them to fly, & so allured with the sweetnesse of the victory, pursued them and the Tarte, euen to the trenches r from whence a great squadron of the Turks horsemen and harquebusi-

ers at the same instant issuing out, and with their multitude ouercharging the Imperials, confrained them of force to retire: in which retreat, County Maximilian Martinengo (one of the fe aduenturers) doing what he might both with his valour and direction to have staied the difordered retreat of the Christians, was with many others slaine: wherewith the rest discouraged, tooke their refuge towards the city. Which they of the garrison beholding, sent out certaine companies to relieue them; by whose comming out, the sury of the Turks was not only repressed, but they also even unto their trenches againe repulsed. Shortly after which hot skirmishes, the Lord Russivorm with the other Christian Captaines on the other side of the riuer, having with continual battery made fuch a breach into the castle, as that the same seemed to be now faultable, in good order came on with certaine companies of their footmen ap-C pointed for that service, and so couragiously affailed the breach; where the Turks, who before had expected this affault, having in best fort they could repaired the breach, and on both sides thereof placed divers murthering pieces, with great flore of dangerous fire-workes; at fuch time as the first companies of the Christians fought couragiously to have entred the breach, ouerwhelmed them with that deadly fire, and forent them with their murthering flot, that they no faster entered, but that they were forthwith cut off and flaine: with the fight whereof, they which were appointed to second them, nothing discouraged, but seeking desperally to haue entered, and with the taking of the castle, and slaughter of the Turks, to haue requited the death of their fellowes, were themselues in like fort welcommed. So that now a thousand of them being loft, the Captaines confidering how much the loffe of fo many brane fouldiers D concerned the whole enterprise taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the losse of the greatest part of them, they caused a retreat to be sounded, and so the assault for that time to be given over.

But long is was not that the Visier Bassa(thus retired as aforesaid) had lien before Pesth, but that by reason of his sudden returne, great wants began to arise in his camp; his souldiers for want of food being glad to eat their dead horses, a pound of bread being sold for two Hungarian Duckats, and a bushel of oates for fine, and yet hardly so to be gotten: which wants in that fowafted a country still more and more encreasing, and many of his foldiers secretly stealing away from him, hee had much adoe by all the meanes he could vie, to perfuade them there to stay eight daies longer. Which time expired, and nothing more done, than some few weake The Viger Bas.

E attempts giuen, and some light skirmishes made, rather for fashions sake than for any hope of sa rayith bis prevailing; and the want of all things still encreasing: he with the rest of the Commanders fice. fearing some sudden mischiese to be done them by the hungry and discontented souldiers, the second of November, causing his baggage to be trussed up in the dead time of the darke and filent night, rise with his army, and so in haste retired directly to Belgrade, leaving behind him in his camp three hundred dead horses, not yet eaten by his hunger starued souldiers. Immediatly after whose departure, the Lord Nadassi and some other of the commanders in the army, with fine thousand souldiers and certaine great pieces of artillery, some by land, some by water, went downe alongst the riner to Adom, a faire well built towne upon the banke of Danubius, about foure Hungarian miles from Buda, and ferning as it were for a florehouse for the garrison there: Which towne Nadasti summoned by his Hussars sent before, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him. Which they of the towne at first refused to do: but afterwards seeing a far greater power come, prouided of great ordnance and all things else requisite for a siege, they with the sight thereof discouraged, without more adoe offered to yould the towne, so that they might with bag and baggage in safety depart: which they did, c the Christians conducting them as far as Feldwar, which castle was also at the first summone by the persuasion of them of, A dom delivered vnto them: for they of the castle, by them en formed of the great frength of the Christians, and of the store of great ordnance they had brought with them, and that they staied therewith but fall by, were easily persuaded to hear. ken to their friends, and so yeelded. Which done, the free Haiducks the same night surrised also the castle of Pax: from whence the Christians kill marching on alongst the river, tooks in also the city of Tolna.

But whileft Nadafti with the rest were thus busied in taking these castles and towns along the South fide of Danubius, they in the camp at Buda were aduettifed of the new defignes of the Turks Lieutenants and Captaines thereabout, for the reliefe of the besieged as that the H Bassa of Bossa, with the Gouernours of Canisia, Sigeth, and others, had assembled an army of thirty thousand for the raising of the siege, Wherefore the Christians doubting as they lav at the fiege disperied, to be by them oppressed; leaving their tents in their trenches, gathered themselves together into the Water city:which the Turks out of the upper city quickly perceiuing, as feeling themselues now at some more liberty, presently fallying out, took both the trenches and the tents fo left, with no finall flaughter of fuch as were left for the keeping of them : and so possessed of the trenches and the tents, held them by the space of two hours. untill they were by ftrong hand by the Christians beaten out, and so with some losse inforced againe to retire into the city. The Lord Nadasti also, with the rest that had taken the aforesaid castles and towns upon the side of Danubius, making a rode towards Alba Regalis, in their re- I turn within a mile of Buda light upon a thousand Turks there gathered together, most part of whom they flew, and having put the rest to flight, took some fifty of them prisoners. At which time also another of the Imperial Colonels meeting with certaine other companies of the Turks comming to the reliefe of the besieged, not far from Buda, slew most part of them, took an hundred and three core of them prisoners, with a number of horses and much other rich booty, all which he brought into the campe. Neither were they at the fiege in the meane time idle, their great artillery still thundering against the walls both of the castle and thecity: so that by the fury of the cannon having beaten downe a firong tower next vnto the Danubius, not far from the kings stable, they were a little before night about to have there entered, when fuddenly such a tempest of winde and rainearise, as that they could not possibly vietheir pie- K ces, or well any other weapon: so that the heavens as it were then fighting for the enemy, they were enforced for that time to giue ouer the affault begun. Which storme was no soonerended, but that two thousand of the Turks both horse and foot, to keepe the Christians otherwise busied, suddenly issuing out of the city, charged upon the Stirian horsemen; who present ly relieued by the men at armes, so welcommed them, that having lost an hundred and three. score of their men, they were glad with more speed to retire, than they came out. But seeing some of the Christians that so hardly pursued them, some slaine, and some hurt from the wals, taking heart againe, the next day (being the eleventh of November) they fallied out againe; where albeit that a great number of them were flaine, yet fell they out againe the third day alfo, and were againe by the County Thurne with great losse of their men beaten backe into 1 the city : where in pursuing of them, the Christians were by certaine lanizaries (laid close for that purpose) suddenly assailed and dangerously gauled, the County himselfe being hutin his left arme, and some other Captaines slaine. In all which sallies, although the Turkswere still put to the worse, yet thereby they gained time in some good fort to repaire againe their breaches.

Shortly after, the Imperials thus lying at the fiege, certainly enformed that aworld of the fierce and rude Tartars by the incitement of the Turke (having made themselves way through Valachia) were comming as far as Temeswar to relieue Buda, thought it not best (especially now that Winter was come) to abide the comming of that so great a Northerne tempes, but The Rege of Bar betimes whilest they had yet space, to raise their siege and be gone: Which they did the six M at for feare of teenth of Nouember, leaving the Water city, with all that they had got about Buda, agains the Tarrange. the largeright vito the enemy; onely Pesth they surnished with victuals and all things else necessary, leauing therinalmost ten thousand soldiers in garrison, for the desence therof against the bathaA rous enemy. As for Adom it was strengthened with a garrison of Hungarians only, with their wages offred to be paid, before hand, which for all that, they refused to accept; alledging that for the great danger this place was exposed vnto aboue others, they could not fafely take their oath for the defence thereof: yet offering withall to vndertake the charge, and to do what befeemed valiant foldiers, in such fore as that all men should well understand, that nothing enill should happen thereunto through their default or negligence.

The fiege of Buda for feare of the Tartars thus given over, and the Imperials departed and gone, the Turks forthwith came downe out of the higher city into the lower, declaring their joy for the recouery thereof, by the often thundring of their great ordnance, with divers other fignes of triumph. But whileft in their jolity they spared not by the mouth of the cannon to fend commendation to them of Pefth, they from them againe received the like; but in fuch rude manner, that the Turks wearied with fuch greetings, requested them to spare their shot and pouder, and quietly to line by them as became neighbors for that Winter, untill the next Spring at which time it was to be thought that this strife should be ended by their Emperors, the weaker yeelding vnto the stronger either the one or the other city. Yet for all this their great joy, their cheere in Buda was not great, victuals by this flege being become to fearet, that it was by the Turks feared, That if the Christians had there longer lien, they should for very want haue been enforced to haue yeelded the city. Of which their need their friends not ignorant, and having made what provision they were able for their reliefe, were with a great conuoy bringing the fame towards Buda: whereof the garrifons of Comara and Strigonium C having intelligence, went presently out, and meeting with the Turks in the mid way betwixt Alba Regalis and Buda, ouerthrew the convoy, and carried away all that provision of victuals; like vabidden guests making themselues merry with that which was never provided for

These doubtfull wars of Hungary, with the general revolt of Transylvania much troubled Mahamet Mahomet the great Sultan; but nothing like vnto the wars he had in Afia against the Scriuano much nonbled and the rebels his followers; the cuill successe whereof (as most dangerous to his State) to with the Serimuch tormented his haughty minde as that it would fearce fuffer him to thinke of any thing els. For the Rebel encouraged with the successe of the last yeares wars, and stil growing stronger and stronger, (by reason of the great number which, allured with the sweet name of liber-D ty, hope of prey, or the good entertainment by him given, dayly more and more reforted vnto his campe) had this yeare ouerrun a great part of the Turks dominions in Afia, putting all to fire and fword that frood in his way, ranfacking also divers walled and fenced cities by the way as he went. Which he might the more easily do, for that the Ianizaries of Aleppo and Damasco, with many other their partakers and fauorits, which might greatly have hindred his proceedings, were at the same time also vp in arms, and together by the cars among st themselves, to the great benefit of the Serinano: who in the midft of the course of these his desired fortunes fell ficke of a natural disease, and so died. By whose death the rebellion was no whit appeared, The death of (as commonly in like case it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in short time the Serinano. grew to be both far greater and more dangerous than before : for the Serinano was no fooner The Serinano E dead, but that a yonger brother of his, no leffe warlike & couragious than himfelf (to the great ha pager brocontentment of the rebellious) stept vp in his place, siercely prosecuting the wars his brother the rate ophad before him taken in hand. Against whom Hassan Bassa by commandement from the grand ding of the Re-

Seignior with a great army fetting forward, with hope in that newnesse of his command to bit in hautone have opened at the state of the haue oppressed him, and so to haue quenched that so spreading a fire; at length met with him, that was case enough to be found, and joyning battell with him, was by him in a great and Hispan Biga bloudy fightouerthrowne and staine together with his whole army, except such as by speedy first, and bit flight faued themselves from the sury of their fierce enemies. So that Mahomet the great Sultan now enforced to employ his best commanders and soldiers into those parts for the subdu-Ribetta. ing of him, for that cause called Mahomes the Visier Bassa out of Hungary to serue against this new Rebell: who in the meane time following the course of his victory, made hauocke of all as he went, taking unto his ownever all such tribute as was in those Countries and others also farther off, due vnto the great Sultan, having of late exacted onely of the city o. Ancyra and the country thereabout, three hundred thousand duckats: so by exacting of great summer G of mony from the country people (fuch as be his enemies) heaping of great treasures for the maintenance of his wars.

Diners incurfi-

Now that Mahomet the Turkish Emperor had called home Mahomet the Visier Baffa our out of the Tay of Hungary, to go against the Rebels in Asia, (as is aforesaid) yet had he before provided that fontiers of the for the better assurance of his townes and territories in Hungary, the Tartar Hanwitha great power of his Crim Tartars should even against that time come downe into that country with items by Which rough and needy people dwelling neere ento the fennes of Moetis, for pay or prev them there done alwaies ready to do the Othoman Emperors service, setting forward vnder the leading of their great Han himselfe, and of his two sonnes, and by plaine force breaking through Valachia though not without great losse of their men (being fought with by the Valachians and free H Haiducks a whole day) were now in the later end of December with their huge companies come into Hungary; the Han himselfe with forty thousand to Quinque Ecclesia, and his sone with twenty thousand moe into Possega (a fertile Country lying betweene the great rivers Savus and Dravus) where they spoiled all as well the Turks as the other poore Christians, oretending all that frontier country with the whole command thereof to be given vnto them by Mahomet the Turkish Emperor in reward of their good service. But long they lay not there quiet, but that to shew for what they came, they enforced the Christians thereabout to vidual Canifia for the Turks : and fo breaking into Stiria, not far from Caramant (the neerest Fortreffe of the Christians towards Canisia) carried away aboue two thousand Christians cantines: and shortly after surprising Keschemet a great and populous towne, slew most part of 1 the inhabitants, and carried away the rest prisoners. Other some of them also at the same time making an inrode to Sharuar, and having burnt twenty villages downe to the ground, carried away thence about a thousand soules into most miserably captivity and thraldome. They al. to at their first comming relieved them of Buda, the Lord Nadali with his Hustars, who before kept them from vi Quals, not being able for the great number of them, now longer to to do, By them also the Turks encouraged, tooke and burnt certaine places possessed by the Christians necre vnto Buda, putting them all to the fword that they found therin. So that the poore country of Hungary (neuer to be fufficiently pittied) with the rest of the countries and provinces belonging vnto the house of Austria, and confining upon the Turke, were not somuchessed by the calling home of the Visier Bassa with his army, as they were now annoyed by the com- K ming of these roguish Tartars, a people wholly even from their infancy given to the spoyle. Against whom for all that, the Christians beside their ordinary garrisons, began now even in the depth of Winter to oppose some other of their forces also: the Palatine of Rhinesending ten companies of horsemen to Possonium, from thence to be fent to Sharuar for the defencos Stiria: and Collonitz (but lately knighted by the Emperour) for his part raising four hundred horse, a thousand Hussars, and three thousand of the free Hiaducks for the repressing of those Tartars: the Duke of Brunsewicke also at that time for the same service fending thither a thousand horse with two thousand foot, against those sworne Enemies of the Chri-

Rian Religion.

He troubles of this year thus ouerpast, Alba Regalis being by the Christians lost, Pesth 1 6 0 3. with some other places won, Transylvania recoursed, Buda besieged, the Visier Bassa returned, and the Tartars come into Hungary, I anuary with a tharp frost began to open the next yeare, by force wherof the rivers in many places, but especially in those more Easterly countries, were not only frozen ouer, but seemed rather even wholly turned into Ice : Danubins that great river, for all his swift course, being then also, as it is often, so hard frozen, that men and cares might fafely passe to and fro thereupon. Which so hard a season for all that, did no whitefreese but rather increase the hor desires of the greedy Turks, still breathing after the vtter spoil and ruin of the Christians dwelling neer vnto them. For which purpose they arms against B euen in this dead time of the year, and extremity of weather (which commonly affordeth vir. ibe christians. to most mortal enemiesta cessation from arms) due of their garrisons of Sigeth, Budd; Canifia, Alba-Regalis, Babotz, and fuch other places, raifed an army of eighteen thousand strong. to have forraged and outer-runne the Christians, with their territories confining upon them; Ouermanie with the Countrey therabout being the places by them affigned to have felt the first force of their sudden rage and furv.

Of these their designes Colloniz Gouernor for the Emperor in those parts understanding, Colonia parto preuent the fame, & to meet with their forces, with al speed put into the suburbs of Quer- parets against manica thousand Reisters, and two thousand Lansqueners; and in the burroughs thereabouts the Turki. laded the regiment of the County Reingrane with fix companies of Coffacks, four thousand C Haiducks, four hundred Carabins, French, and Wallons, two hundred horse of the Regiment of Collonitz; with whom was Collonitz himfelf, commanding ouer all thefe troups: a man for his worth enery way answerable vnto his charge. Who for the more assurance of this Countrey, ouer which the enemy now houered, commanded all the inhabitants therabout to take vparms; and withall, with good and strong barricado's to strengthen the waies, and to stop vp the passages into their country : which they right cheerfully performed, with their weapons in the one hand, and their spades and shouels in the other. Of which their so great resolution the Turkes understanding, changed their purpose. For they considering the assured danger they were to vindergo in forcing of these troups, standing upon the walls of their desence, and firing in their refolution, changed their former defigne for the inuading of Quermany, where D they by the space of fine weeks together had bin by the Christians expected; and vpon a new resolution marched along by Roquesbourg, with purpose to have loded themselves with the fpoil of the country therabout:

This their new defigne caused Collonia to gather his forces together, to crosse and frustrat them therin. Which he did by fattor of the river, which both strengthned him against their incursions, and was wel to be descaded. But the Furkes, whose purpose was not to sight, but to have robbed and spoiled the country at their pleasure; finding now contrary to their expechation such strong resistance, and their designes disturbed, in fine gave over their enterprise and fo again retyred; contenting themselves to have gathered a convoy of victuals to put into Canifia, which then lay in great extremity for want therof. Which victuals they drew out E of the villages therabout, and focame to Baborz to march to Canifia, a town most commodious for such an assembly, and for the relieuing of Canisia. Of this their purpose Colloniz (who spared for no cost) by his espials aduertised, euenhee which before was appointed as a prey vnto his enemies, began now to plot with himselfe, that they should become a prey vnto him: their cowardife, by many precedent effects declared, had given him the mean to admenture vpon them, and the hope to ouerthrow them. A necessary consideration in martiall affairs, for Commanders to put in execution their designes, at what price soeuer: for that it is better to lose in the performance of them, with preservation of their reputation, than otherwise to gain with the losse therof; for that it preserved, stil striketh a sear of their valour into the minds of their memies, oftentimes ouercome euen with this their apprehension thereof: F whereas otherwise they might haply ouercome, in the assurance by them conceined of their enemies cowardise.

Vpon which resolution this braue Colonell the sour and twentieth day of March with his Troupes marched towards the little Comara, being about two leagues from Canisia, and lay with them close in ambush in the woods neer vnto two marishes, ouer which the Turkes had G made two bridges to passe the great artillery and Waggons vpon; the Turks being well acer 20000 ftrong, and our men but 2200 horfmen, & 6000 foot, a fmal number in comparison of their enemies. But whilst that these men lie thus close in ambush, with a purpose to do some notable exploit, let vs for a while return to Pefth, to fee what things there paffed in the mean time.

The Turks after the loffe of Pefth, much grieued to have this impostume so neer vnto their hearts, fought to break it to our hurt, imploying all their treachery to gain our garifon foul. diers, and with their forces to distresse them of victuals. And the Christian Army was no fooner rifen from before Buda, but that the Turkes came downe again into their bafe towne. which they found much ruinated and in euill estate : but the joy of their conquest buried in H it all the obie a of their forrow, and the feeling of their grief, the leffer passions alwaies giving place vnto the greater, and forrow finding no place at all in the midft of their immoderat joy. Wherof they gaue a number of testimonies, by the thundering of their great ordnance, be fires of joy, and vollies of small shot; all which in their fury they discharged vpon them of Petth: who with the like curtefic requited them, fending them back again bullets for bullets. Which now became a common exercife among the canoniers, passing the time in these action ons, more vpon a brauery than to any purpose, small harm being don therby either on the one fide or on the other: in fuch fort, that in the end the Turks better aduifed, requested our men to cease from such shooting, as they on their part would do likewise, and to expect the end of the negotiation of peace, of a certain begun (as they faid) betwirt their two princes. But pur- 1 poling indeed by this means to spare their pouder, shot, & pains, and to referue them to their better vies.

And yet for all this triumphant joy, the Turks in Buda were in great want of victuals, the late fiege having devoured all their provisions, and no new supply thereof as yet come vnto them: infomuch that their greatest care was now how to come by victuals, without which they must needs for sake the city. Of which their so great necessities the other garrisons in the places therabout advertised, assembled themselves to take order therfore; and having prouided 200 wagons loden with all maner of necessary prouisions at Alba-Regalis, with a conuoy of fix thousand soldiers put themselves upon the way toward Buda. Of all which their proceedings the garrison of Strigonium bauing got understanding, and joining unto them K the garrifon of Comara, met with them upon the way betwixt Alba Regalis, and charged them; and so with great confidence came on both sides to handy blowes, the Turkes beeing in number stronger, and our men in valour and resolution; the Waggons in the meane time standing still as the motive of the charge, and appointed for a prey vnto the Victors. But out horsmen being for most part Hussars, wel acquainted with such charges, with their divers The Turksocourses greatly troubled the enemy; our footmen in the mean time charging them allowith a number of harquebusiers. Against whom the Turkes with the same arms and like courage defending themselves, but many of them being slaine, and their Wagons gained from them, they were forced to give place, and so were almost all cut in pieces. The Waggons thus surprised, were divided as a rich booty among the Victors; forty wherof were sent to the garison L at Pefth, who were wel content that the enemies travell and wealth had bin gathered for their good, and without any pains of their own, to folace themselues with the fruit of their enemies labours.

uertbrown by the Christians.

> But what should we say? the most sure resolutions are somtimes by chances crossed, and tempests otherwhiles ouertake vs euen in the very entrance of the desired port. The Turks of Buda understanding of the brute of this medley, and that it was for their bread, posted in all haste to have succoured their Troupes, and arrived at the same time that our menvictoriously led along ft by the river of Danubius the Waggons which they had before gained. At the fight of which obje a they animated with hunger after the vi auals, and with defire to be reuenged vpon them, fiercely charged them. So that our men, who thought of nothing more, M but that they were victorious and possessed of their enemies booty, seeing these new come Enemies fo furiously to charge them, daunted with the present peril, and with the consideration thereof only possessed, bethought themselves of nothing else but how to saue themselves,

A and to leave their honour, booty, and the field, all as spoiles vnto their enemies. The furious countenance of the Turkes, and their number furmounting ours by 1500, so bereft them of their resolution for to fight for their lives and waggons, as that they without more adoc quite for look them, accounting themselues happy enough if they might but saue themselues. And the Turks without farther pursuing of them, contented to have recovered their victuals, left them, and so returned homeward, driving their waggons along the banke of Danubius. But fee, the winde which by and by changed, and having as it were with a fudden tempest vnderta. ken cuen at the entrance of the port to swallow up both the one and the other, fent the garrifon of Petth vpon them of Buda to stay them. Great changes of fortune in one moment of time, which mocketh men with thewes, bringing forth effects quite contrary to their ex-B pectation. These Turks staid upon their retreat by the comming of these new come adversa. ries, did even stours had done before. For not willing to prefer their goods before their life, and more greedy of wichuall than of battel, they quitted their prize, and retyred. For our men in number two thousand, were seized of a forrest about the midst of the way whereby the Turks were to passe, & which they could by no means shun, and divided into two companies; kent themselves close there in ambush, resolutely attending for the comming of their encmics. Of which the inpurpose the Turks not aware, and still pressing on forward, found themfelues hardly charged, before they could fee them by whom they were fo charged, one of our companies charging them afront, and the other behind. So that the Turks inclosed betwixt them. and in fo great and fudden a fear not knowing against whom to defend themselves with-C out any great telistance betooke themselves to flight, leaving their wagons, and casting away their armes yet for that a number of them were left dead voor the place, force others of them taken priliquers, and the reflechafed euen voto the gates of the City. But our men being vi-Gors, with the grangons, and a number of prisoners returned home, and by the mouth of their great artilleric gaue à chousand restimonies of thoir victory unto the solven full cowards; who them felnes alforcamend the heavy newes thereof vato the reft of their fellowes thut vp within the Cityof Bada. well rittle a contraction.

But ise againethe change of Fortune, conftant only in viconftantilitative fequel flortly after thewad. Danubusschat growt river was then also (as it is often) to hard frozen, that men and cares might now lastely passe too and fro thereupon. In which forbird season, the Turks D in garrison at Buda having once voon the frozen river braved the Christians in Pesth, and the two and two miests of lanuary in like brauery comming out the fecond time, were by the garrison soldiers of Pesth put to flight and by two hundred of the most forward and valiant soldiers hardly pursued vpon whom, mot only they which fled, but other of the Turks also out of Buda in greater numben teturning, chased them likewise back again entire the bridge, wherby they were to have passed into the City i which now drawne vy for feare of greater harme The garrison from such a number of Turks as were now come out, and were ready to have entred at the outstrowie. beeles of the flying foldiers, the poore foules fo flut out, and too weake for fuch a multitude as then had them in chafe, were there even in their friends fight every man flaine, the Turks'

Neither long lasted the joy of this victory : for within a few days after, one Lethner a Cap. taine of the Christian garrison in Pesth, more grieued than the rest with the losse of so many valiant ment and fome of them his friends and companions also certaintly understanding that certaine of the chiefe of the Turks of Buda, with two of their greatest Commandess, and a great traine of gallant Gentlewomen, were for their pleasure the next day about 19 goe vite the hor Bachs neere vitto Buda; and taking with him threefcore musketiers, thonight before feeterly voon the yee passed over the River, and sodier fatte from the Bashes lay close in amouth; expecting the comming of their defined prey. fuch danger, and flew all the men, sparing none but one boy and the Gentlewomen, who in the G time of the conflict, naked as they were, ran as fast as they could into the city; fear having in there our come as then the modesty of their fex. Which exploye done, the Captain leaving the Turks flain in the bath (now become red with their blond) returned with his fooldiers in ded with the rich booty, and merrily sporting at the naked gentlewomen. With whole feet full cry they of Buda faired vp, fent out certaine, of their garrifon after them, but to no prepole, for why, they were in fafety before got home. By continuace of this from (by reside where f victuals could not be fent down the river) the garrifon fouldiers of Peffi were driven to fuch wants, as that dogs and cats were accounted good meat among them; the Turks their enemies still roaming about the fields, to keep the safrom victuals, and to increase their ne. ceffitie.

Of these necessities the Turks of Buda were partakers also, hunger, started like the other. but vet euery day in the field to feck relief. They knew right wel that hunger was hard to be deceived, being ftil in action and vigilant, and therfore they fought foute means how to deceiue our men stil attending vpon them, & so to assure themselues of victuals. To which end they gaue it out, and made shew as if they would have be sieged the fort of Adom, distance. bout two leagues from Buda : under colour wherof they received into their city a Conner of fifey wagons laded with victuals and munition, which our men hindred not; as having no foition of any fuch purpose of theirs. With which reliefe the Turks incouraged the low ledge therof vnto their querthwart neighbors in Pefth by a thousand great flor, which they in thundering manner feat over the river voto them, as men of courage, and devote feet Howbeit that this action was more vain than profitable voto the Turks, who for the difference of their thot and pouder gained not to much as the life of one fouldier, not one foregree the walls of Posth. Vpon this jolitic these same gerrison souldiers of Buda streetly after thought voon the fudden to have furprifed Palotta, a small castle of the Christians by night. But being in good time discourred, they were deceived of their hope, and with the lefte of an hundred and twenty of their men inforced to retyre wnto whom Galpar Harmad captained the castle, by a country peasant before sworn to do the errand, sent a little pot ful of sale above. tle of wine, willing them in decision, with that falt to feason the Venison they had recening their late hunting, and with that bottle to quench their thirst, and to cheer them vo after their late conquest.

This jeast did more prouoke these Enemies, galled so to heare of their shame and loser in fuch fort, that in revenge thereof they discharged a thundring shoure of great floor and small bullers you the garrison of Penth, which in great aboundance fell out of the cloud of their rage. But all to small purpose, for that their Cannons being cuill levelled, outsition the Towne, carrying with their thundering bullets more feare than they did hurtiyes that which worse was, the ruine made by their great battery fell voon their owne City. Formalled they were thus thundering, fire by the negligence of the Cannoniers fell into one of their barrels of pouder, which taking hold of another, and forunning along as if it had been by strains made of purpole, burst out with such force, that it ouerthrew a long piece in the walls of Bu da, which in the fall thereof ouerwhelmed a great number of the fouldiers that were noted I vnto it. The noise of this thunder clap was great, and the force thereof terrible so that it reuiued them of Pelth with some good hope, by this breach to force the place, the Turkes besing from thence retyred. Vpon which occasion the Gouernour of Petth resolned to give the affault vnto the place, and to make vie of the mean that Fortune, without his pulped the had put into his hands. Wherupon taking with him a thouland Addisoner and three him Hungarians, he forthwith in hope of good fucceffe marched toward the breach; and hope had prevailed, but that by the way they by chance men with a company of Turker, who an alarm vnto them of the vpper torus, who vpon that kinis of their approach, mained site walls, and with great spend topained the breach! About this time Radul Vayuod of Valachia, advertised that the Turks in garrison at Sillfiria were gon abroad into the country to feek after booty and victuals, with his foldiers pasfed forthwith ouer the river Danubius vpon the ice, to furprife the town bared of the garifon: whose men for the desire of the riches of the place, & for fear lest the garrison soldiers should return before they had gained the place, with redoubled force & courage fo affailed the town. that the Turks dismaied, and deeming the number of the Christians that so furiously affailed them to be greater than indeed it was, by reason of the greatnes of the enterprise by them taken in hand after some small resistance, left the way open for them to enter: Who forthwith ouer the dead bodies of their enemies thrust into the town, took the whole spoil therof, which silifing faile was both great & rich, as being a town well peopled; and so fee fire on it, to the intent it should and sarm. no mote serue as a place for the enemy to retyre vnto. The Vayuod thus victorious and rich. returned with his foldiers laded with spoiles of their enemies, before the Turks could gather themselues together to hinder their retreit. And vnto George Basta (who was then in Transylvania in arms against the Turks) for his part of the booty he fent him thirteen of the enemies

But our troupes are now too long in their ambush, where the valiant Collonitz holds them close, attending the comming of the Turkes and of their Conuoy to Canisia: now we must draw them out of their Sentinels, and fee what effects their defignes shall bring forth. These braue fouldiers had now lien three daies in their ambushes without discouering of any Enemy a wheill that the fixth day of March three Spies fel into their hands, whom the Turks had fent forth before, to discouer what enemies were then abroad in the field. But these faithful Infidels to taken, would not by any meanes discouer any thing hurtfull vnto their friends, or profitable for ours. So that in fine, the General mooued with their obstinacy, commaunded ong of their heads to be strook off, to terrific the other two, and by force to draw from them what hy faire intreaty and persuasion they could not. The other two that were yet alive, difmayed with this spectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at last constrained to confesse. That they were the enemies Spies, sent forth to view the Countrey, so see if the Christians had any forces there, able to hinder their Cannons and Wagons for entring into Canifia. Which not appearing, and they reporting vnto their Companies that the Country was clear, that then within two daies after, the Conuoy was to passe even by the same place where D they then lay, to be put into Canifia, fetting forth from Babotz two houres before day, Our menthus resolued of the enemics designer, forced their hope to deseat them, and again retired themselves into their ambuscado's attending for their hoped prey, in such fort, that our men in their conceits held the victory now as good as already gained, howbelt that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter, was, that within two hours after the taking of these spies, the Haiducks, layd without the principal ambuscado, and hidden within the thickers and bushes, discovered a Corner of horsemen, with fine ensignes of the Turks come out of Canisia, marching to meet with the Conuoy, in fasety to conduct the same into the towne. At which ouerture the Hungarians awaked, gaue knowledge vnto their Generall of the arrivall of the enemy, to the end he might resolve what was best in that E case to be done. Which opportunity Coloniez embracing, and making much of time, put his horsmen in good order, to inclose the Turks betwixt the marish & the wood, and to ear them fo inclosed, in pieces. The Turks having discovered nothing but the matishes & the woods, held on their way, and so as men having their hands and feet bound, fell into the power of their enemies. For being come into the danger, the Christian Carabins charged them in the head of their companies as they marched, & diffordered then i the Hungarians fel vpon their flanks, which they opened ; and the horimen pressed them at their backs. These poor mifera- The Turkstan ble men fo inclosed, not knowing against whom first to defend themselves, and seeing death writerows by spon every fide of them, became as bealts to bee facrifided unto the fury of the Christians. The fmall refistance that they made descrued not the name of a fight, being all staine, and hauing themisiues not flain one man's layd by heapes one voon another, not having overthrown somuch as the of their enemies. In such fore; that of six hundred menthat were there together, there were not foure of them faued. Their horsemen which followed them, seeing they themselves while that their companions were in massacring, preferred their lives before their G honoux; for if it be a shame for foldiers in fight to fly with the safety of their friends, it must needs be an irrepairable dishonour to fly away and leaue them vnto the slaughter. But on Carabins taking the occasion for their advantage, no more spared their horses in the pursuit of these Infidels, than they had don their hands in defeating their fellows: but hadily purse: ing these fugitiues, flew a number of such of them as were worst mounted, and followed the rest cuen to the gates of Canisia, Those of the town at this tumultraised an alarm, shot of their great artillery, and discharged many vollies of small shot against our men, as wel to flav their pursuit & to faue their own, as to give them warning that were to bring the coupon that our men were ready in the field to furprise them. But during this fight, three of the Turkes fout horimen passing well mounted, aduentured to passe by our troups, and vpon the spur to H meet with them that were bringing the conuoy, and to give them warning of the overthem. that fo they might again return to Baborz. Which their fo braue an attempt fortune fange red as not willing to frustrat the desert of so worthy valour. Wherfore vpon this advertise. ment they returned, and retyred themselues againe into the Castle of Babotz from whence they came.

But our men aduertised of this their retreit, and as it were deceived of their hope for intercenting of the convoy, vndertook an exploit much more haughty, brave and dangerous; for forthwith they made head toward Babotz, with a resolution to carry the place; and although they were almost fixteen miles from it, yet they resolved to goe thither, and to make themfelues masters therof. And so marching cheerfully on, therin vied such diligence that should nine a clock at night they arrived at the place; whithen they were no fooner come, but that they did what they might to daunt their enemies, to make their conquest the more safe, The greatnes of the attempt it felf ferued well to that purpole, but yet the beleef more, if they could drive into the enemies mind the fufficiencie of their forces, for the performance of to great an exploit, which caused them to found their trumpets, to strike up their drummer, to remove their artillery to ruftle with their arms, to keep a fir with their foldiers and to make the noise not of a small, but of a puissant and great army. But the Turks in number twice so many as were our men, and within a good and strong place, were not with such a bruit to bee carried away, but standing fast upon their gard and resolution, prepared themselves for fight; and how to receive our men if they should attempt to assail them. Now whilest the alarmer K thus founded our companies advanced, repeating oftentimes the name of Icim, and making themselves ready for to fight. This skirmish began with a thousand cannon thot, which the Turks out of the castle delivered youn the troups of the Christians, and their muskets still playing from the curtain of their walls, fo that the castle feemed as if it had his a mountain of fire. All which terrors no whic flaied the hope of our resolute footmen, who thwatting these flaming shows, marched along the counterscarpe of the ditch towards the gate of the towne, to have broken open and forced the same. The Turkes at the same time were come forth out of the towne, making thew as if they would have fallied forth vpon out men and have fought with them. But at the same instant that they charged the front of our sootmen, they mere by them for encountred and beaten backe, that having loft fome of their men, they I were gladagain to tetyre into the town. Where they indeauored to defend themselves, not daring afterwards to fight without the favor of their walls within which it stood them von to have both courage and power, being fill furiously assailed by our men, who planted we the town ditch with their muskets and harquebules for bied the Furkes upon their walls and in their holds, as that they durk not them themselves or looke out; for the showers of lead which they thundred upon them. And affiredly, if our men had then had infirmments which with to have opened the gates or the wals, as well as their muskers and harquebuserhad make a breach into the resolution of the Turks, the town had vadoubtedly binours. But this defen being not before fore feen, neither intended, wanted the means to put it is execution to for want of petardgand scaling ladders the place remained fail the Turkes, and farents fells M out of our hands. In fine, our man having hean four houres in fight before it, both doings receiuing harm, and finding no means to enter the place, were inforced to found are used. to leaue it.

In this retreat the Christians burnt certain villages of the enemies, rather to shew they had bin there, than for any other valor therin; feeing that things infencible, which follow the order of their nature, are without offence, and they which hurt them, without reason. This done. they of purpose returned to little Comara, for the long time that they had kept the field, the divers exploits of them don against the enemies, and the common report of the Vanquished, had stirred up the enemies, so that they began now on enery side by heaps to flock together, to fwallow them vp, and even now preffed vp their retreit. So Collonic in despight of the enemy, in fafety brought back his foldiers; and being entred into Comara, caused the heads of the chief of the slain Turkes to be fet vpon the pikes of the palifado's, and vpon a great Pine tree standing before the gate, which for this purpose had almost all the branches lopped off. An action learned from the cruelty of the Turkes, and now don by the Christians, more to a. stonish and deter them from this their cruel custom, than for any glory or profit insuing therby feeing that to tyrannife vpon a dead body, is but a figne of cowardife, and an action alto-

This done, our men departed from this Caftle, as men worne and almost spent with travel and wearineffe, but yet more with famine. For why, they thinking to have executed but that defigne which had put them in armes, and that in fo short a time also, had taken no provision of victuals with them; fo that they were all pined with hunger, ouercome with watching, and halfe dead with labour. Their horses also in like fort languished the Countrey beeing alike cruell both so the one and to the other. For besides that it was vnfruitfull vnto such as kept c the field (all the fruits therof being gathered together and carried into the towns by the men of War) it was not possible for our men to forrage, or to seeke for victuals there, and to come to an happy end of their designe; for that they had raised an alarm abroad in the Countrey. and fo perhaps might themselves have become a prey vnto them whom they thought to prey vpon. Which was the cause that our fouldiers had for the space of three days eaten nothing but Crabbes and Acornes which they found in the Woods which couered their ambushes so that being now come into this Castle, they denoured a world of victuals, and requested euery one of them to seturne vnto their owne garrisons; their bodies weakened with hunger, being squeeable to beare their Armes. But that was not all; for departing from little Comara, they were aductifed, That the Turkes had shur up all the wayes whereby they were to D make their retreit home; in hope casily to ouercome men already with hunger brought low. and to kill the bodies which trauell had already spent. Howbeit the great courage of our men frustrated this the enemies designe, and saued themselves. And so farre off was it that this advertisement dismayed Collowitz, that even to the contrary it the more increased his courage, as appointed for his glory; being glad to have such an occasion offered vnto him for the flewing of his valour, although it were thorow the middest of danger, death, and slaughter. So shar in flead of flunning the combat, whereas it was reported, That the Turks with great affurance marched neere vnto a Castle of the Christians, to make head upon a passage whereby our men were to retyre; he fuddenly turned head toward the same place, with a firm The great conresolution; with true valour vnexpectedly to encounter the enemy, which had thought to rest of College E have surprised him by cowardise. And the souldiers weakened with hunger, although they  well apprehended the danger of this designe; yet resting upon the great resolution of their worthy Generall, and confidering the necessity they had to go farther for their safety, vpon a good courage were content to follow whither focuer their Generall would; who led them direcity to the aforefaid. Castle, where it was expected that the Turkes should have charged them. But being come thither there was no body to be feene, and yet our men, as hungry as they were, flayd there one day in ambush, expecting the comming of their enemies; who for all that, having no mind to meet them, appeared not, but gave them time and liberty in fafety to retyre themselves every man into his owne garrison, to refresh themselves, and to recover

But now whilest our men of Warre after these troubles in Transylvania and Hungary, repose themselves: let vs in the mean time take our journey to Constantinople, and goe to the marriage of Haffan Baffa one of the Vifiers of the grand Seignior, and the last year General of

A dangerous mutiny of the Janizaries & Spahi in Conftantinople.

At such time as he departed from this great city, to go vato the conquest of Alba Regalit, G Mahomet the Turkish Emperour, resolved to set all voon the regaining of this city, caused to be presented vnto him a Crowne and a Sword, the one in reward of his valour, if he returned with victory from this exploit; and the other in revenge of his cowardife if he failed in the performance of it: promiting him indeed his fifter in marriage, amongst other the glorious rewards and trophies of his victory, and threatning death as a punishment among the grief of his dishonour. But it came to passe, that by the cowardise of our men he came vino thees fects of his defire (as is aforefaid) and tooke the City which promifed vnto him the glorione triumph in Constantinople. And under the sweet influence of this planet he returned vnro Constantinople, where he found all things in readinesses the fatisfying of his expediation. and advancement of his glory. He is magnificently received of his Prince, curreoully falle H ted by all the Nobility, and with greatest reveronce possible honoured of the people; And se he had happily discharged his charge, he found in like manner all things prepared and in rea. dinesse for the performance of the promise of the grand Seignior his Lord and master: Who had caused them to be in most sumptuous manner provided for the solemnising of the miriage, and the contentment of the Baffa. But nothing now wanting that he could have defired or wished more than the very solemnising of the marriage it selfe, and that also every day of all men expected; the Ianizaries and Spahi, with the other foldiers of the Court; to the num. ber of about five and twenty thousand, even upon the sudden when as no such think was feared, came in armes, and so presented themselves before the Divano or high Triburall holden for the chiefe administration of justige in the great Turks palace, the first foure dayes incue. 1 ry weeke : and having fet guards at the Court gates, the more fafely to execute what they were refolued voon, proudly demanded to have audience for certaine of the Spahi and Infizaries. of whom they had made choice, in the names of them all to deliner voto the great Beffa's their grieuances, and the causes of that their assembly. Who as soone as they were entred into the Divano before the Ball's (of whom the most couragious of them was not without feare, as looking for nothing but present death) they at the first demanded to have Haffan Baffa deliuered ynto them. Who thinking that his bead (hould have ferred are facilfice to pacifie this their fury; as a man altogether dismayed, wan and pale, passed thorowths mutinous multitude, to have gondynto the great Sultan; protesting of his owne innocensis; and calling upon his Prophet Mahemet to discouer unto them the truth of all things. But K they, after a thousand injuries and reproches by them heaped upon him; rudely demanded of him, Whence it proceeded, that whilest he with a great part of the forces of the Emplie was builed in Hungary for recourry of the City of Alba-Regalis, there was in the mean time no order taken for the repressing of the dangerous rebellion in Asia which Rebells (an they faid) was now grown to proud, as with Enfigues displaied to come within three or the days journey of Constantinople, the Imperial City of the Othoman Emperours. Wheream her in no small feare answered, That hee for his part had done his duty, as well whilst had the charge of the Army in Afia, as now of late whilest he had the like charge against the Chill stians in Hungary, as even his very enemies, themselves could witnesse: But seeing himselfe in great danger of death, he instantly requested them, That his guiltlesse death mightheve ! to the State in generall profitable, and that in discharging of his conscience hes might declare vnto them the causes of this contempt and neglect for the suppressing of the Rebell in Alia, which they were to defirous to know all proceedeth (faith he) onely from the suill go uernment of the grand Sultans mother (who then all commaunded) and from the negligible carelefnesse of the Capi-Aga. Which his speech although they withmuch impatience and florming gaue care vnto; yet hearing him fo well to excuse himselfe, and to lay the blank there where they were well contented it should rest, they gave him teaue to goe to they Sultan, to request him that they might speake with him and surther no deale with him the they might have the heads of them who had been the cause of this dishonourable sember otherwise cowardly behaued themselves in the mannaging of the wars against the Robert in M Afia. Threatning him withall, That if he failed to performe this his Charge, het mould bell fail to feel the heavy effects of their iust fury. An heavy charge yet glad was the Basta to the dergo the same to be freed out their hands, where he saw himselfe in great danger ; among the

them, most of whom had somtime served under him, than among it so many his most mortall enemies. But what remedy ? he must now so do ordie therfore for which he was the more to be excused. So in great fear comming vnto the great Sultan, almost as searefull as himselfe. he shewed unto him the great danger like cuen presently to insue by the mutiny of his best foldiers, and garders of his person: persuading him betime to appeale their surv. before they had imbrued themselues in bloud, for fear of further danger like enough to infue, as well ynto his own person as varo the selt of his most faithfull and trusty Counsellors, from such furious headstrong men, vo in tumult with their armer in their hands. And although that a Prince ought not for the greatnesse of his state to doe any thing as thereunto forced by his subices, left in so doing he might breed in them a contempt of himselfe, and increase their insoleney, n that vet neuerthelesse in this action, being altogether extraordinary, hee was not to rest vpon that point, for that these mutinous souldiers turned not their weapons (as they pretended) against his Imperial power and soueraignty, but rather to the contrary, against the contemners therof. feeking to be reuenged voon them that had don him such euill service for the maintenance of his honor and majesty, and for the punishment of the insolent and disloyall. Wherfore the justice of the cause requiting and covering the malice of the fact, he was of opinion. that it were best for him to yeeld a little vnto the zeal of these his best soldiers, and to satisfie their iust desires, although they had by very cuit and valawful meanes sought the same. And therfore adulted his Majestie, in some fort to satisfie the just complaints of these men, armed for reuenge of his honor, and to chashife the chief commanders of his Asian forces, such as by whose treachery or cowardise his service being neglected, had armed these men against them: with the same hand punishing such as had wronged his Majesty in honor, and appealing the discontented for the good of his setuice. Mahomes thus by the Bassa persuaded, as also to show himself in majesty vnto these his discontented subjects (one part of their desire) the necessity of the cause so requiring in his Imperial seat presented himselfe vnto them, accompanied by the Musti (the great Mahometan priest) & some sew others of the reverend Doctors of their Melonnes fore Law; who by the Sukan commanded to fit down, and the Baffa's flending up (fo great the re- et binglife to spect is to men of that fort, even in a barbarous nation of so small respect) the chiefe of the the mutinom feditious stepping forth, demanded leave to speak both for himself and the rest. Which being granted, he boldly thus began.

Most happy and mighty Emperor, we the Spahies and Ianizaries thy obediens stanes, full of grief and Aprend pert discontentment to see a great part of thine Empire in danger so be lost desire to know of thee the cause why of a sedition the Great electron of the cause why of a sedition the Great electron of the cause why of a sedition the Great electron of the cause which God hath given thee. They suppose the solutions the God hath given thee. Rebels courfes in Asia are onto thee unknown, seeing they bane bin so hardy to come in arms so neer unto thy Imperial city, the place of thyme abode, and that without any let or resistance. They desire to know if all this hane bin made known unto thee and whether show wilt take upon thy felfe the care of the governement of thy great monarchy, or no which through the negligent carelefnes and cuil government of some by thee put intrust is like water a body with great & wel proportioned members but of listle or no strength or power. Or elfe, that thou woid of care can't be content that all should be dismembred, and so energy man to take worth himself what he can lay hand of , as the Rebels do in Asia.

Now let no man maruel at this prefumptuous rude speech of a proud Ianizary to his Soue raign; for why, they are she men which may most boldly speak in Turky , they are she stay of the Turkish Empire, the great Sultans children acknowledging no other father but them:nay rather the great Turke himselse is their Creature, for they raise him vp and confirme him in the Empire, they are his greatest strangth, and to them he is most beholden. If Makinet were with so insolent a speech much modued, he was not justly therfore to be blamed how beit bet ing befor with fuch; a ferious multitude with weapons in their hands, and having no meanes to with stand thoir fury he wifely diffembled his inward choler, and with a faire countenance and a majetty full of mildenesse, with the best and calmest words that he could denise sought to appeale them : imputing the great diforder and cuill successe of his affaires vnto the vnfaithfulnelle of his ministers, and the concealing of the truth therof from him. Saying more-

Mpon which speech, they siercely liber manded of Haffan Baffa, Why hee had non gipen an account unto his Maichie of the ke bels proceeding in Afia. Who answered, That he had never failed of his duty thetein builthai he had been alwaies hindred to to do by the Capt Agis faying : That it was not needfulled trouble him their Soueraigne thesewith, (having commissed the fematters to others) burn reform and amend them as well as they might otherwife, without gilling of him any fuch diff. tafte concerning these matters. And further, in hat the cardio of all these disorder proceeded from the Empresse his mother, the Capi. Aga, and some few of her; I vato whom he had com. H mended the mannaging of those his affairs. With which Hisanswer the mutiniers moremen ued furiously faid. That they were come thither to demand the heads of such offenders bee ing resolved to take another course if he should resuse to grant it them : [meaning therby to make a new Emperor. Wherunto for all that, the great Sultan answered, That it was no reas fon neither that he would for their humors put fuch as they demanded innocently to death. but willed them to reft themfolues contented, while might by order of juffice be tried whe ther they had deferued death or no and that then he would give them went his own for it he were found culpable. Mahomet another Bassa with these cruelties dismaied, and perceiving the like evill hap and danger to hang ouer his own head, that had ouerwhelmed Calil and his fon: refolued to have orouided for himself against this mischiese, by flying vnto the Rebels in Asia. But this his purpose discouered by certain spies (which serue as means to open a way vnto the Turks cruelty) and he with one of the chief followers of Capin Baffa taken by the Ianizaries, were both by them cut in pieces.

But whilest these things thus passed at Constantinople, the Rebels with all diligence profecuted their rebellion in Afia, and bent their forces against the great towns there. Their ar- the Robelin my was exceeding great, every man joining himselfe vnto the first forces which were in good Afa. estate, being not as yet with any greater power oppressed, and rich with the spoiles that they had taken. These men had besieged Angore a great and strong town in Asia, and seemed resolutely fet down for the carrying therof. Wherof the citisens being afraid, and out of hope of relief, came to parly, offering them a fum of money to redeem themselues and their city; and foin fine agreed to give them 200000 ducats, upon the ready payment wherof the rebels prefently departed.

Shortly after, the new Captaines of Sultan Mahamet arrived there also, whom he had pla-C ced in the places of them whom he had before executed for the appealing of the fouldiers of the Court, who would needs make it treason, and put to death the Citisens for having given fuch mony as is aforefaid, vnto the rebels, though it were done for the preservation of their liues: as if lawes were to be respected in the horrors of necessity, or that life were to become a flaue vnto riches, and riches not made for the vse of mans life. Well, needs they would for this inpposed treason, as they pretended, have put them to death, and sacked their City. But indeed all was in their greedy fury to have carried away that which the Rebels in their mercy had left them. These poor citisens with this so eruel a resolution dismaied, and out of all hope of finding fauour at such mercilesse mens hands, resolved now to hasard all, and so voon the sudden taking vp arms, stood vpon their own defence. Herupon arose a great and cruel fight betwixt these soldiers and the citisens, both the subjects of one Prince, and all of them of one and the felf same superstition ; but the one side armed with pride and couctousnesse. and the other with necessity and despair : howbeit at last the juster cause prevailing, the Citifens ouercame these new come souldiers, and having slaine a great number of them, chased the rest out of the City. This evil incounter of these few Captaines even at the first entrance into their Charges, given them by the subjects themselves, increased the Rebels courage, so that they being in number forty thousand, under the leading of one of the Tartar Han his brethren, befieged Butze a great and rich city, being the storehouse for the warlike provisions of Asia, and the place whereunto the Turkes Customes, Taxes, and Subsidies of Asia were brought, and there kept. These men after certaine dayes bestowed in the siege, and great re-E sistance made by the besieged, at length by force carried the place, slew the inhabitants, and facked the City. Which exploit gracing their fortune with honour and booty, increased also their power and reputation; so that redoubled on all sides, and increased with courage and spoiles, Mahomet dismaied, resolued by fair means to appease them, and to intreat with them of peace. This good fortune had drawne vnto their part the Gouernour of Babylon, either weary of the service of the Turke, or desirous by the ruine of the State in general to increase bis own power: whose revolt greatly increased the Rebels power, and diminished the Grand Seigniors. Besides these mishaps also, the great Shaugh of Persia (commonly called the Sophy) thrusting himself into these disorders, to make his gain, and to fish (as they say) in a troubled water, had now taken Corbery, a strong towne vpon the borders of the Turkes Empire, and was making himself ready for new conquests. All which tempests arising as it were in one together caused Mahomet to strike fail, and mauger his Imperial dignity and honor, to feek for peace: which indeed could not be great in such weaknesse of his nature, neither braue in such his great want of courage. For great dignities and honours without valour to maintaine them, are but like rich garments which couer bodies almost rotten, but heale them nor.

Mahomet his other Captaines and men of War feeing this dishonousable peace of their Prince, and preferment of the Robe is, rewarded with bondurs and dignities, in flead of paines it and punishments, which they fould of right have for their rebellion endured ; began to enter into great murmuring and discontentment against their great Sultan. They confidend his valuet dealing and base fear in advancing the rebels wanto such honors and preferments as of right belonged vato his moltfaithfull and loyall Officegs and feruants; by fuch wnworth dignities making them flaues unto his enemies, and vaffals onto the rebels : they to their difhonor and loffe, by their infolencie and treachery injoying the honours and preferments of right due vnto their faithfull and loyal feruices. Which dangerous persuasions transported them to far from their allegiance and duty, as to undertake a greater and more perillous mar. teragainst his crown and dignity than had the rebelibefore by taking up of arms in the field against him, whereunto the assured knowledge they had of his cowardise incomaged them alfo. So that their resolution, was to thrust him out of this Imperials state, and to set up his clieft fonce called allo Mahomes, in his place. Thefe are the inordinate effects of injustice and cowardife, the overthrow of frinces, their injustice through cruelty arming alforeating against them, and their cowardise through contempt dispensing with every man for his dety: fo that he must be suffithet will keepe his subjects in order, and valiant, that must hold minacic, and infufficiencie of Minhemet, vnfit to deal in matters of effate, and altogether vnable to manage wars. He was too copyardly (as they thought) to represse their valour by force, and too weak to croffe their designer by wisdoms which not a little incouraged them in that their K fo desperate and dangerous a resolution. They drew also into this their plot the Sultanesse Mahamets chief wife and the yong princes mother; who blinded with ambition (the bane of great (pirits) had not the hap to reject their persuasions, as dangerous vnto her and her son, but shutting her eies against the due consideration of loyaltie and duty, cast both her selfand

This project (of no lesse importance than of the deposing of one of the greatest monarchs of the world) refolued vpon forme of these men according to the maner of the Turks, joining superstition vnto their designes, consulted with an Astrologer concerning the successe of the actions of the young Prince, whom they were shout to install in his fathers Imperial throne. This man to be excused in his trumperies, seeing that to deceive is the chiefe point of his L Art, ere ched the figure of the Princes natinity confulted with his spirits, considered the celestial bodies, and in fing arrived at the point of his judgement, for the good and welfare of the Prince: And thereupon dispatched an, Eupunch towards the Sultannesse with these pleasing speeches, That the should be of good courage; and in affured hope that the yong Princeher fonne within a few daies should have the Imperiall Crown set woon his head, and the Royall Scepter put into his hand: his art (as he faid) promiting wnto him these honors, by the fauor of the coelectial bodies, of whom he had los med these news; and by the conference with spirits, from whom he had this affurance. But o the vaine and foolish knowledge of man against God! attributing vnto the second causes that which altogether belongeth vnto his owne power; robbing him of his owne providence; which extendeth ouerall, to give it vnto M Creatures, which neither have their owne beeing, neither are able of them lues tobring forth or to worke any effects at all without it! and that more is, to give certaine credit vito the enemy of all faith and beleefe, even to the father of leafing, who taketh as much glory in falthood as God himself doth in truth; as being the proper mark of his power. For it chanced that these letters sent by the Eunuch to the Sultanesse, were intercepted and brought vnto Mahemer the great Sultan, whom they most concerned : whereupon it to fell out, that he which tooke your him to foretell the long-life and Empire to befall to another man, could not foreige the end of his owne life, which followed him fast, even at the heeles, being himfelfe by the commandement of the great Sultan, with the youg Prince, the Bunuch, and fifty Mahomet case. others of the conspirators, and such as were consenting vinco the conspiracy, most cruelly feet bis elect strangled, and the Sultanesse her selfe drowned. R the croffes of our enemies, let vs againe returne vnto Hungary.

The last yeare caded with the great bruit of the comming of the Tartar Han, with a great The Polonies army into Hungary and now he had dispatched his Embassadors towards the King of Polo describe Tarhis, to demand of him tribute, and passage through his country. Great and proud demands through his to be, both at once required. But the King of Polonia required him againe with the like, county, isto to be, both at once required. But the King of Polonia required him againe with the like, county, isto to be, both at once required. But the King of Polonia required him againe with the like, county, isto denying him both the one and the other, roughly answering of his threats. Which so reso lute and blung a refulall, caused the proud tyrant to change his intended course, and for seare of being defeated by the Polonians in passing through their country (as the Tartars had often beene) before he could come into Hungary, tooke another way, and turned with his Army toward Valachia. Of whole comming Radul the Vayued understanding, and that beside. the forraging of his country, they had a purpose to displace him, and to set vp another Vaynod in his flead; with great diligence gathered together the greatest power that he could, and so marched vnto the borders of his country, there to attend the comming of these Tar-tars, and to skay them from entring. Which in effect fell out according to his desire, for the barbarous people being arrived, and attempting with all their force to have entred, were by this little army encountered; which commanding the country, tooke all the advantages of Diners bard the areit passages, and there notably repulsed the sierce enemy. Two of the first encounters continuents fell our fortunately vnto the Valachians, who therein flew about 3000 of the Tartars, whose The Valachites anauntgard for all that still came on, and at the third encounter so long maintained the fight, in their passage that their whole Army was now come in, and hardly charged the Valachians, whose for three that D tune furcharged, began then to change, the hardy being constrained to bow under the multitude, and valour forced to yeeld vnto number. Which was not done without a long and cruell fight, both armies encountering with great courage and fury, the one for the defence of their countrey, and the other for an entrance vnto their conquests. Howbeit the strong enemy at length preuailed, and entring into Valachia, brought in with it ruine, death, and de-

Aruction. The Tartars having by force thus opened themselves a way through Valachia, and grie- the tartars in uously spoyled the countrey, were come with their army to Quinque Ecclesia, a towne in Hungary. Hungary, to joyne their forces with Haffan Baffa, now after his marriage returned into this country with a great army to continue his charge : who caused the Tartars to be mustred in E his presence, and found them to be forty thousand arong. Men of great courage against the weake, but meere cowards before the couragious: who in flead of affaulting the walls of any strong towne, fell vpon the cottages of poore countrey villages, ranfacking and pilling the poore inhabitants, as well in the villages of the territories subject vinto the Turks, as in the territories of the Christians constraining the poore people, contrary to their conscience, and the prejudice of their faith, to sweare to setue the Turke : besides that, they enforced them to furnish them with all warlike prouision and munition, which they put into Canifia, but a while after that our men had defeated the Garrison there. Neither were they so Great Book contented, all the neighbours being thereabouts subject to this tempest : for they passed in made by the to Stiria with their families, and ouerrun a part of that Province, spoyling it of men, cattell, gary, Siria, o and goods, leaving in flead of them, destruction, misery, and death; and carried away with Shanaris. them two thousand poore Christians for slaves, whom they fold vnto the Turks, and made

selves with the bloud of the Christians, risling their Villages, and after that burning them, carrying away with them a thousand Christian captives into most miserable bondage and G flauery. Which cruell outrages afterward thrust the valiant Colonell Gollonis into the field. against these barbarous people; to stay their incursions; and to defeat them if he could

This worthy Commander had but a few dates before, beene much stroubled in appearing the French light horfemen in gartifon in the willages abpart Roquesburg, rifen up in muting for their pay : whole hot and moued spirits he by his wisedome so calmed las that they were content againe to be sworne to the Emperor, and so joyned themselves wito the stray of Gelle. nitz, which was then 10000 good men ftrong.

In the meane time, the Tartart greedy of prey, and fill feeking after booty, tanfackt and fooiled fine and twenty countrey villages about Veradin; all which they afterward burned alfo, carrying away with them a great booty both of memand cartetly no man relitting them, H At which time other companies of them also invading the County sein his thand as far as Rackenspurge, made in it great spoile, as had their fellower elsewhere, and beside other booty. carried away with them two thousand Christian captines. These outrages of the Tamers med the County on the one fide, and Collonits on the other, who couragiously oppoling them felues against these barbarians, for a time staied their incursions, they not daring to abide the force of this little Army, fufficient enough for the valour thereof to have ouerthouse that of their enemies, for number dreadful. This made them so turne their course another way into Sclauonia, being in number five and thirty thousand men, leaving nothing behind them there but death, and desolation, for the number of prisoners, and great booties which they carried from thence. Among & other their spoiles, it was their fortune by the way to meet. I with fix hundred of the Christian fouldiers, of whom not one escaped their hands, but were flaine every mothers fon. At length it so fortuned, that certaine of their troups in roaming abroad, fell into the danger of the County Serin, who with his followers still housered along off, for feare to be of their great multitude overwhelmed a part whereof now falling into his hands, were by his foldiers ouerthrowne and all cut in pieces, and a number of Christian captiues by them taken delivered out of chaines and fet at liberty. Which exploit was greater for the seare it brought upon the enemy, than for the slaughter there made. For the Tarter, still in doubt to meet againe with the Christian troups (who left not one of them aline that they could light on) were glad now to keepe themselves closer together, and so did a great deale the leffe harme than when they without feare roamed up and downe at their pleasure; ? fo that even by this little victory the Country received some comfort, and the Barle greater honour, Small belos being infinite treasures in time of necessity, which out of it would not be to be reckoned of.

The garrison souldiers of Canisia, of late deseated by Colloniez in going to meet the Conmoy comming towards them with victuals, (as is before declared) the rest of the garrison defirous to be reuenged, were confulting of the meanes how to bring the same to passe. It fortuned that at the same time there was a fugitive Christian fouldier in the towne, who made thew of a man male content, defirous to turne Turke: of whom the Turks made much reckoning, for that he feemed to know much of the defignes of the Christians, and the meaner how to crosse them. Whereof he so assured them, as if the matter had been now already 1 done spromifing to bring them even into the middest of the Christian campe, and to deliuer it into their hands and power. Howbeit his meaning was nothing leffe; for feeing the Turks much busied with carrying in of victuals into the Castle, brought into the Townesster the ouerthrow of their fellowes before sent forth for the bringing in thereof, and wholly intentiue to that businesse; knowing the place in the Castle where the pouder and munition lay, he at the same time by a traine layd fire thereunto, and afterward, amiddest the tumble and the stirre, by a loope hole in the wall, got himselfe out of the Towne, and came with CollonitZ, who with his troups lay neere there by in ambush, expecting the opportunity to performe some notable exploit vpon the successe of so dangerous an aduenture, whereand he had before beene made priny. Neither fayled the fire any thing of the accustomed violence thereof, but feemed rather to redouble the same, it had so suddenly consumed the Buildings, Munitions, and Persons. All the place felt the fury thereof, the Cannons, Cannoniers, Souldiers, and whatsoeuer-else, was subject vnto this dreadfull blast : all was shaken and surned volide downe, yea, the fire burft out of the castle and burnt the greatest part of the cowne alfo. There was a confusion of feare, mishap and misery together, the terror whereof caufed many of the Turks to cafe themfeloes ouer the walls, in hope fo to faue their lives : but whileft they thought fo to have escaped the danger of the fire elley presently fell vion the adge of the fword : for meeting with the foldiers of Goldwitz (wire lying in amouth necre thereby, awaited the opportunity in that to confused a rumult to have feifed upon the place likey were all bither taken mifoners or flaine. But fee the hand how one croffe chance of fortune overthrem this fo notable a defigue, as had it beene well followed, might in one moment have resourced that fisong place, which had before for the leave of many daics endured the greatest forces of the othoman Emperour, neither yet was then to lost, but through the infamous creachery of our men. You have heard before, how that colldning had by faire perfuafignis rather than by true Afaire opporeffects, appealed the French men and Wallons, vp in mutiny for their pay; fo that by him remarks of caperfuaded, they had againe given their oath of fidelity vnto the Emperous, and to follow nife our flipperfused, they had againe given their oath of nacity into the amperous, and to follow the his Army. But how when odeasion fetued, and held out as it were both her armes into the afterpair of the Christians, for the regaining and conquest of Canifia thefe Prench men and Wallons, the Freath or watgreatofapart of Gollaniz his Riength, injuriously refused her to faire an offer; and at such that zime an they should mather hade fought raked, than have falled in their duty, (it being to have gained a most great and rich conquest) for want ofpay (as they pretended) turned their backes, and beging by no entreaty or perfulations to be moound, to the discouragement of C the reft, who were better minded, and their owne eternall infamy, withdrew themselves from the Army. So that Collowitz rather by the wickethunfaithfulnesse of his owile disloyall foldiers, than by the valour of his enemies disappointed of his purpose, was to his great discontentment, contrary to that hee hoped; enforced to retyre without any thing more

While this exploye to well begun, but enill performed, was in hand the Turks and Tartars Theracture deaffirmbled together, made a cruell spoile in the country about Rab, even almost vnto the gates feated by the of the Towne, carrying away with them a great number both of men and beafts. In fine, it Lorditadall. chanced that the Huffars of the Lord Madafti came that way, who wide flanding what had happened, with all speed made ascerthese Robbers, ouertook them in their setreat neer unto Alba-Regalis, flew a great number of them, and inforced the rest to leave a great part of their prey b. hinde them: With which booty recoursed cuen out of the Lyons mouth, they returned to Rab s of whom the poore inhabitants and country people, with teares standing in their eies, requested to have againe their owne goods. But War, the enemy of Charity, and nurse of barbarous Cruelty, had so hardened the hearts of these men of Warias that they were not to be moved to restore them their cattell againe, but that they must redeeme them for present mony, which they did, and fo recoined them.

Now the noble Collenies feeing himfelfe fo fhamefully forfaken of his owne Souldiers. and disappointed of his purpose, and the Turks and Tarrars in great numbers comming to the reliefe and repairing of this fo fore staken towne; and out of hope to do any good there-E on, full of griefe and indignation returned towards Comara. And howbeit that euill hap had cruelly frustrated the glory of his enterprise, yet the Heavens, in despight of Portunes frowne, left not this noble and valiant Captaine altogether without honour, but as amorous 2000 Turkede. of his vertues and valour, presented unto him in this Winter of Fortunes displeasure, some seated by Collectrophies of glory. For vpon the way as he was returning home he met with 2000 Turkes, * whom after some small resistance lie cor all in pieces; miserable sacrifices, appointed vnto the fury of his wrath. In this fight their enfignes were all taken, and a number of prisoners, the chiefe of whom, together with the Ensignes, he sent to Prague, as a Present for the Emperor, and a token of his good feruice.

The report then was, That the Turks and Tartars with their vnited forces had forraged Sclauonia, taken diuers strong holds, burnt a number of villages, and carried away eight thousand Christians prisoners, beside a great number more slaine with the sword, or consumed with fire, and all the Cattell of the Country driven away : and that being with this

Voon which resolution he set forward with his small and valiant power, and the south w Loque brieged day arrived within the fight of Loque, a Cafflewell manued and furnified with dichings necessary for the desence thereof, The army lodged, Colleniz with a tium summore at be fieged to yeeld ve the place, with promifes of sourtefie if they should now accept of the fame whileft it was offered them and high they fourly refused to do five aring to the come. ry. Colleniz feeing them for while first caused a mill to be affaulted, which placed oner against the castle, and well forester a ued in stead of a bulwarke, and seemed hard to bee taken showbeits his men, lock as have their good fortune even in the beginning checked gave thereunto to brane un affailteber at. ter the enemy had done what he could for the defence thereof, they become miffer of the place, carried it, and therein lodged abut finding it dangerous to be keps; and to find them I in small flead, they set it on fire and afterward planted foure Culuerint in battery before the Caftle, But as they were thus bused, the Turks course outly falled one spor them not doubting so adventure themselves, for the hope that some in store time by their great Army relieved. In this army they met afront with the Haiducks, whom they fiercely char. ged, and, to gauled them, that having flaine thirty of them, they retired without any loffe, forthwith discharging so many thundring shot and arrowed upon our men, as that they well knew not how to says themselves from the danger of themain such fort, that all the waies to approach the place being fromed, they began to deutic how to fet the caftle on fire: Which they by certain fire workes attempted but to I deal purpofethe fire being no fooner kindled. but that it was forthwith by the Funks quenched. This done and our men disappointed of & their hope, they decided to fer fire upon the timber which joyned the palifado to the Caffle firetching toward the port. Which their attempt forted but to small effect also, the fire but ning but flowly to do the enemies any great harme. A lkwhich deuises failing, they resolved by plaine force to affault the Caffle, and to foale the fame which enterprise refolded poil, the Haiduckes carrying before them certaine strong and thicke plankes of wood, in flead of targuets, to defend them from the small shot and arrowes of their enemies; by this device gained the palifado placed upon the ditch and being there in some fafety, with their mulkets and harquebulies so applied the belieged that they draue them from their curtaines, and made that they durft no more thew them felues your the walls. And immediately after, two companies of the Haiduckes placed ten ladders against one of the towers of the Caste and 1 fo with their Enfigues in their hands couragiously mounted the ladders, in hope to have gall ned the place: but the Turks as men refolued to live and die in their Caftle, valiantly repulfed those Halduckes, and by force drew in vnto them from off the ladders, the two Enfigue bearers of the Halducks, whole heads they cut off, and cast them downevnto their fellows, which were yet comming up the ladders; and the two Enlignes to gained upon the walls they placed in the middelt of their owne, as the trophies of the spoyles of them who would have spoyled them. With which so great courage of the enemies, and death of their fellowes, our men not a little dismaied, kept themselues close at the foot of the wall, as afraid any further to force the place, which to their loffe they faw flored with fuch valiant men to defend it.

Collonita perceiving this discomfiture of these men, and well affured that the castle was not but by valour to be won, immediatly drew out of euery company of the County' Ringrant, certaine of the best and most resolute Souldiers to renew the assault: Which so honourable a charge they cheerefully undertooke, and as men of courage, began forthwith to mount the ladders. Which the Haiduckes beholding, againg tooke courage, and partly ashamed of themselves, and parrly to bee pertakers of the spoile and prey, if they should prevaile, did what they might for the winning of the place, friuing now who should do best. Which affault was with such fury and presse of men maintained, that the Turkes not able longer to The caste of withfland fo great forces, were conftrained to yeeld both themselues and their Castle vnto Loque by the the fury of their angry enemies. Which castle indeed cost much Christian bloud, but yet tea and justed. more of the Turks: for the Haiduckes armed with rage and reuenge, flew almost all in the cafile, as well Rascians as Turkes, and tooke the rest prisoners. Amongst others there was an Hungarian renegate there taken, whom for haste they beheaded, beeing not at leisure to empaile him, the ordinary punishment of such faithlesse miscreants. But during this spoile made by men chafed with fury, the winde and firewere on their part exercifing of their rage alfo. For the fire which they had cast upon the palisado, and which they had before negleded, as of little or no force, now increased with the wind, by little and little getting hold of one thing after another, having burnt the palifado, got hold of the castle also; whereunto the Souldiers (loaded with prey and booty, the things they most desired) had no regard at all: fo that the fire veterly confumed the Castle, with whatsoeuer else had escaped their greedy

The Turks in garrison at Boulouuenar (a fortressebut a league distant from this burnt Ca. file) feeing these flames of fire, and doubting what might betide themselves, began to confult what course were best for them to take, as either to attend the comming of the enemy, and fo to abide the chance of warre, or elfe betimes to provide for themselves by flight; the confideration of their honour and duty persuaded them to stay, but the ruine of their neighbours as strong and valiant as themselves, persuaded them otherwise. In fine, the care of the preservation of their lines prevailed, and the resolution was, That they should fly. And so putting all their houshold stuffe and goods into certaine boats there ready vpon the Lake, they by the middest thereof sled: foolishly persuading themselues, That our men comming thither, and finding nothing more, would not long there stay, but be gone; after whose departure they might as they thought returne againe vnto their old dwellings, and in the meane D time hide themselves in the marish, vntill that the enemy were past. But our men comming thither, and finding no man in the Castle, neither yet any thing else that could well be carried away, wondered to fee that there were any men so cowardly; as for feare to abandon such a The Investor place, as for the strength thereof might have beene an example for others to stand upon their the casts of guard and desence, they sought out every corner thereabout, to finde out whither the Turks Boalousener. were fled. At last after much diligent search, they found certaine boats which the Turks had funke in the channell neere unto the Castle gate, which caused them to thinke that they were fled by water, and happely were in some place not far off. These boats were forthwith drawne vp out of the water, and found furnished with oares and such other things as belonged unto them. Which done, Collonitz chose out certaine of the most valiant and resolute of the Hai-E duckes, whom he commanded in those boats to follow after the Turks in the Lake. Who accustomed to such exploits, and not ignorant of the places and secrets of their Countrey, went aboord, and did as they were commanded. Neither had they gone past two leagues vp. on the Lake, but that they discoucted a party of these sugitives hid in a little Island, awaiting the end of this tempest, to recouer agains that which they had for saken. The Turks dismaied with the fight of these men, and forced by necessity to stand upon their guard, welcommed them with certaine little faulcon shot which they brought with them in their boats, thinking to have hindered them from landing. But they were too well acquainted with such musicke, to be moued therewith : besides that, the desire of the booty, which was by the Turks brought out of the Castle into the Isle, exceedingly animated them for the gaining thereof; so that F all feare of danger fet apart, they landed in the Isle. Whom so landing, the Turks with great courage received; forthat betwire them was fought a greater fight than is for fo small a number on both fides to bee beleeved, onely valour and not number holding the ballance of the The Turks And

The prifohers were brought a backe againe vino the Caffle, vitilithe next day, that our men having pura good and income garrifon of foure hundred Haiduckes, and two hundred Harlars into Bouloweilar, with the prisoners, and their booty, returned toward Comata: where they, notwithflanding diversity ports of the affembly of the Turkes garrifons for the imporeffing of them voon the way the fafety arrived, with a rich booty, and a number of waggons loaded with the fpoiles of their en mies. The Emperor had for his part thirteene enfignes, beside the places won, which bear nigh vnto Canisia, much bridled the spoilings and incursions of that gattison.

But leaving these endlesse troubles of Hungary for a while, let ve now againe looke me Transylvania, to fee what they there do. Moyes the Rebell by Bafta the Binperors Lieutenand (as we have before faid) overthrowne, and disappointed of his hope, betooke himselfe with firong castle of his owne, called Solomole, there in feare attending the finall successe of his affaires. Baffa in the meane time being as wife to make vie of his victory, as he was valianted obtaine the same, subdued the rest of the country, repressed the Rebels, stopped the wav of see dition, and put Morfes in dispaire of all fafety: Who feeing himselfe brought unto such tremity offered to yeeld his Castle unto the Turks, and so without fathler acquainting of any man with his purpole, thrust himselfe with his wife and family, and all the rest of his fithstance into Temesware, a firong City of the Turks not far off : whom the Baffa in thew most courteoully received, and the rather, for that he was in good hope to make a prey of the great wealth of this new come fugitive i who had not there long flated, but that he had perfeded the captaine of Givalger, a ftrong frontier Castle there by, to deliver the same to the Turks. I and that without the prinity of the garrifon fouldiers, for that hee doubted that they would hardly be thereunto drawne: who yet getting knowledge thereof, put their captain in remembrance of his duty, befeeching him not to draw fuch an inflamy both voon himfelfe and them. by committing fo foule a fact. But afterward finding him resolutely set downe forthebetraying of the Castle, they suddenly laid hands upon him, and strucke off his head; and so with the bloud of their traiterous captaine, having averted the eminent danger, with great honour held the place.

Meyfes now as he thought in safety at Temeswar, was yet still plotting how to trouble the flate of Transylvania, and raise new ftirs therein and to that end sent a number of spieswith letters of credence vnto the principall men of that country, affuring them of great and fuffici. K ent aid from the great Turke, if they would but take vp armes for their liberty (as he termed it) and thew himfelfe in field against the Imperials. Neither was Buffa in the meant time carelesse of him, or negligent in his so weighty affaires, but knowing that he as anotorious Rebell had yeelded his caltle vnto the Turks, and was himselfe retired vnto Temesware, forthwith made choice of fix thousand of the best souldiers in his whole army, and so setting sotward to befrege it: whom at his arrivall the Turks there in garrison derided, in hope to fitstrate his designes. For why? They thought that rheir Castle seared upon a steepe high hill, fortified with good and strong wals, enuironed with a broad and deepe ditch, and not subject vnto battery, could not but with much labor, great danger, and long time, be gained out of their hands, it being impossible (as they supposed) for their enemies to make a breach, or l finde an entrance thereinto. And indeed our men feeing the strength of the place, and the difficulty to force it, stood at the first as men dismaied at the foot of the hill where the Cafile flood; yet more discouraged with the impregnablenesse of the place, than with the valour of the defendants. But what cannot industry and valor do? in feeking about to find fome meanes to make thew of their courage and valour, they discouered a little sharpe steepe bill ouer against the castle, from the top wherof the castle was to be battered, and the besieged difireffed but to bring the cannon thither & especially with horses, was impossible, by reasonof the steep roughnesse of the afcent therunto, with broken and hanging rocks, ouergrowne with trees and bushes, as if it had bin another Alps, not but with fire and vineger to be opened; yet in fine, our men resoluing to gaine the place, did themselves that which their horses should be have done but could not, and by force of hand drew their cannon up to the top of the hill, and having planted it over against the midst of their enemies great ordnance, began to batter the castle: which done, they day and night made their approches, fortified their forts and mentals because their approaches, fortified their forts and mentals because their approaches. ches, brought on their warlike munition, and put all things in such order, as if they would cuen by plattie force have carried the place. But the Turks more admiring the valorous refolucion of our men, than refolung the infelues upon their refigance, being not many in number within the place, and feeing themselvies to halle toido with men of inuincible courage, laying The table of afide both their hope and weapons, traued to come to parley. Which granted, it was at length dedicable. agreed, That they floifid deliver up the Caftle, leating behinde them their great ordnance, their municion and enfighes, and so with their arms and lives onely saved; to depart. A great and glorious conquest got with small charge; only by resolution gained by our men without perills those being indeed the true victories, which neither draw bloud out of the ceines, nor tearesourof the eies." Donnard and the to district

This strong place so gained, contrary to the common opinion conceined thereof, led the Bistabia admisn whole providing as it were by the hand onto the obestance of the Emperour; in fuch fort, that of transfusation Balla haufing called together all the principall men of Transylvania, declared voto them the justice of his cause, the right of the Buperout, with the malice and trechery of the Turks and rebels: how they might line in affirance with the one, and become miretable with the others: That the Emperon was alwaies armed for their defence and health, defiring nothing but their welfare and prof thistion; whereas their enciries to the contrary fought altogether their ruine and decay . That as they were not to expect light flames of fire out of the fea, no more they we let booke for aid from those their mortall enemies; whom they knew to have before decreed whate put them all to death, and to have ginen their country voto the Tartars their enemies That this difaster had not now beene to fall voon them, either ever have beene by them perceived, without the aid of the Emperour; who oppolling himselfe against this fire. had quenched it and put it out; prescruing them with his great ellarge, and fauing them even in the middest of their greatest perils and dangers. That they should therefore remember thefe his lo great benefits, to the intent to make him recompence according to the publique faith, which bindeth vs to the reward of good deferts : and that all the recompence that the Emperour defired, was the welfare of the efface, as concerning their owne good: infomuch, that hee defired nothing of them but their obeyfance, for being bound to defend them and preserve them to his power: whereby it should come to passe, that he should be satisfied for his trauels, and they preserved from their enemies, the Prince and the subjects together jointly working their mutuall health and welfare, each of them according vnto their proportion, D for that this mutuall performance of duty preferred the feepter for the good government of for that this mutuall performance or outry preserved the receptor for the good good interest of the animer of their estate. Whereunto their answer was, That they befought him that their country might the transfers. be relieved from the croud and cruelty of the men of war, and delivered from the intollerable mans unionte burthen of tributes, which to heavily opprefied it: that these objects and inconveniences administration of could not been a them constant in their obedience freing that they both full them, and requicould not keepe them constant in their obedience, seeing that they both selt them, and receiued them from the hand of them towhom they had yeelded their obedience, in hope to have beene by them relieued: That the new feeling of the wound did continually renew in them the hatred, and the object of their armes fill kept both their eies and their minds occupied vpon them who were the causes thereof; so that they could not well either looke vpon them or make reckoning of them : That therefore it would please him to case them of their grieuances, in recompence whereof they would pay him 15000 Hungarian duckats yearely for to pay his men of war, and would farther furnish them with all provisions necessary: it being a thing more honourable and profitable also vnto a Prince, moderately to vse his subjects meanes to keepe his state in perpetuity, than through conetousuesse to denoure them in one day, in their loffe to vadoe himselfe for ever. This their offer was by Basta accepted, and the minds of these people by this contentment given them, kept in their dutifull allegiance and loyalty ento the Emperour.

But whilest Basta thus travelled for the quieting of Transylvania, Moyses the rebell in the New enterpremeane time was for his part no lesse busied for the disturbing thereof againe; insomuch, that fibritaribis having by the appointment of the Visier Bassareceived ten thousand Tartars in his aid, and fylusnia, F affisted with a great number of Turks, he with ensignes displaied, entred into Transyluania, Hemith essigns protesting there to die or to be reuenged of Basta, who had before chased him out thence. And displaid many the better to effect this troublesome designe, he now had made choice of a most fit time for nic. the performance thereof. Basta vpon the trust hee had of the publique faith which he came to take of the Transylvanians, for their allegiance voto the Boneror, which affixed him from G all fire and tumules in that prouince, being with a mall power course from Claudiopolism Hungary, and then lying at Wifechourg, spon the confine of Hungary, Which his journey, and the necessity of his presence in Hungary for the defence thereof, had caused the Trans fyluanians to beleeue, that her should for that years stay in Hungar and General of the Bus perours army there. Vpon which persuasion of his absence many of them, begin agains to hold up their heads, and to entertaine high conceits of new fire, whereunto Meyfeby his efficient als had prepared them, and now by his prefence not a little discouraged, infomuch that me nv as well of the nobility as others, joyned themselves to him, and increased his army against Morfes with his power being come into the Province, fire forced a Caffe, about three H leagues distant from Wiscebourg, and sew all the garrison therein, Which exploiteneous raged him farther, full of hope in the absence of Ballan and seeing himselfgnow the absolute master of the field, which hee at his pleasure without relistance forraged, robbed, and fooiled, with his men looded with booty, belieged Vilcebourg, a little towne of wponthe confine of Hungary and Transylvania, neigher by are nor by nature frong, but exposed as a prey who mifcebourg be. firgen by May him that is in the field ftrongest, if succours be not at hand to relieve it. Howbeit weeke as it was, it held out three weekes flege, and having a breach made in the walls endured two afnifectoures e faults against all the forces of the Rebell. After which the besieged thinking themselves to have sufficiently discharged their duty, in holding out so long, and induring of someh and out of hope to be relieved by the weake forces of Baffa, came to parkey with the enemy; I and their lives and goods faued, yeelded vnto him the towne, and so departed themselves to Varadin.

Now albeit that there were no great forces of the Emperours on foot in Transylvanial yet the hungry Haiduckes for all that failed not to follow these warres, even amidst the great clouds of their enemies, and were ever taking of some prey or booty from the enemy, the chiefest and almost the only meanes whereby they line. In which doing, as they benefited them. felues (the chiefe Motiues of their adventures) fo they not a little eafed the country, by repreffing the excursions and pillages of the Turks, whereof the countrey had endured the sury. Where, among it other prisoners by them taken, it was their fortune to light vpon a Chiaus of the Turkes come from Constantinople, going toward the Rebell Moffes from the great K Majofes in great Sultan Mahomet. Who by them examined, confessed, That Moffes was a man in great grace and reputation with his Lord and Master the Grand Seignior: And that he was fent to assure him thereof; as also of all the needfull affishance of his Prince, if hee should faithfully and effectually serue him in Transyluania, and bring it under his subjection and power, as he had promifed and fworne. In which doing, he should not onely gaine the credit of a noble and faithfull servant towards him, but should farther obtaine thereby the honour to bee the Licutenant Generall of his army in this Prouince; the Great Sultan (as hee faid) having meanes as easie as words to aduance his faithfull servitours, who might draw more good fortunes in one houre out of this infinite source of felicity and greatnesse, than they could in a thousand yeares out of the pouerty of the Princes of Europe. He said also, That the Great 1 Sultan had on foot an army of a hundred and fifty thousand men strong, for the conquest of Pefth, and Strigonium, furnished with all things necessary, which had now already turned head towards Hungary, had it not beene for the rebellion of some of his disloyall subjects, whom for all that hee would in short time chastise, and so turne his whole forces upon the Emperor.

Moyses proud of his late conquest, and having found a great deale of great Ordnance in Wiscebourg, resolued to prosecute his victory, and to besiege Basta in Somosinnar, wherein to he had thrust himselfe, with the rest of his small forces; But Basta better acquainted with martiall affaires than he, and knowing that a Generall departed from his charge, and brought to the mercy of a Wall for his chiefe desence, hath lost his credit and reputation with his M friends, and they also in hope of safety from him thought it best first to take order for the strengthening of the place, so to put Moyses out of hope of the winning thereof, and afterward as he might to prouide for the safety of himselfe and his. Wherefore he in good time advertised the Governous of Cassous (who was nessest vinto him) of Mostes his designes. and of the necessity wherewish he was himselfecuclosed. Who forthwith conceining the consequence of so great an exploit, as concerned both the losse of the place, and of so great a commander as was Balta, loffe irreparable; prefently commanded fix companies of horsemen to thrust themselves into the place, for the better defence thereof. Their horsemen cither afraid of the Rebels army, or elfe fauouring his proceedings, without respect of that they had in charge, or of their honour (things deerer vato men of worth then their lives) without any attemptat all given returned againe to Cassous, having with their pilicing and outrages by the way much offended and provoked the minds of the country people by them spoyled. But being now better admifed, and repenting themselves of their faults, and craving pardon of their governor, whow as about with the rest of his power to have cut them in pieces, they officed him for farisfaction, fix of the principal authors of their difloyalty; who were all forthwith executed, and their quarters (to the terrour of others) hanged vo voon Gibbets by the high way fide. But Baffa by their reachery lay in the meane time without fuccour, for laken by his friends, and the place wherein he lay, in danger to be taken : when the Transylvanians dwelling neere thereby resolved to relieve him, as well for feare of the Turks bondages as for the tytanny of Moyles; one of whose secretaries with letters of credence then threatned all the country with fire and fword, and all kinde of miferies, if the inhabitants helped not with all their power to force the place and to win ir. Which threats by Merics published before he had any absolute hower, dismaied enery man: for why, they could C not hope for any moderation or kindenesse in the prosperity of him, who in the time of his advertity game litch apparant testimonies of his cruelty. So that the people, doubting this angry man resoluted to previent his so greenous threats by relieving of Baffa, who only was able to Rop him. Among It others, Radul Vayuod of Valachia, mindefull of the aid that Baffa The Vayuod of had given him against the Tartars, and willing now as a friend to reach his hand in time of Valathia frahis so hard distresse, immediately raised a power of eight thousand Valachians, which he pre-reliefe of Baya. fently sent to the reliefe of Basta. Moyses advertised of their comming, and farther understanding that Bafta having well fortified the place, was departed thence, having before his departure affuredly promifed his men there left to relieve them, and that he was now in the midst of the field gathering together his army, changing both his refolution and purpose, of himself suggestable

D raised his fiege, and so departed. After which, mishaps began to fall upon him by heaps, busings, The Turks forthwith forfooke him taking their way to Temeswar, whither they were by the Baffa called backe, to represe the Haiduckes, who were now every day even at the gates of The Baffa of the city. The sactive and couragious men for their profit attending upon all occasions, lich bone big knowing that the better part of the garrison of Temesivar was gone to aid Morfet, upon the Turks out of fudden haddesperatly affailed the suburbs of that strong city, staine all they found there, ri. Transferance, fled them and burnt them : and fo loaded with a great and rich prey both of cattell and other for the telthings, returned to Veradin, no man pursuing of them: And not fo contented, were every day district abroad feeking after new booty which was the caufe that the Baffa now called backe the Turks from Morfes againe into their garrisons. Moy/es notwithstanding this departure of the garrison Turks of Temeswar, was yet mather of the field, Basta with his small forces not daring to oppose himselfe against him, yet by far too frong for him, the succours from the Vayuod of Valachia being not yet come, which he dayly expected, howbeit that many hot skirmishes passed betweene the stragling fouldiers on both fides, as they by chance met together roaming abroad in the country feeking after booty. Moyfer feeing therefore not any sufficient enemy to appeare in field able to stay him, laid siege to Claudinople, a great, but weake city, and not very well manned, for claudinople to that it was thought a place fitter by the weakenesse thereof to weaken and destroy such as seged by stoyles should undertake the desence thereof, than sufficient to be maintained by their valour. Neuerthelesse, the garrison souldiers and the inhabitants (more to make a shew of their sidelity

F and allegiance toward the Emperor, than for any hope they had to mantaine the place) standing upon their gard and defence, Moyfes was constrained to plant his great ordnance against it, and to batter it: which he did and in a very short time with the sury of the cannon had beaten downe the bulwarkes and flankers thereof, and made a faire breach in the wall, ready now to have given the reunto an affault, and to have entred. The Turks and Tarrara thir fting after the formmodities, and allored with the firm of riches, repaired, thisher on every fide in fuelt fort; that the army of Moffel increased in number, his mind with hope, and his fortune with power. Adepler aftoried at this are fwer, was much moved against the great Sultan, complained in his foule, that having mine ted his faith, his hopour, and the welfare of his country, to affure him of his faith new towards him, he yet doubted of his constancy, as if all these crimes did not binde him to serie him with his person for eues, were it even but for feare of punishment from them whom he had to gricuoully offended. peros si P. dobb

In the meane time the faceours fent from the Vayuod of Valachia were upon the bottlers of Transylvania under the sonduct of Marsa the Vayuod his Lieutenant, and Basta was 22. thering together his forces to recover agains his former effate a expecting every hours the comming of two thousand horsamen out of Silesia, with which whited power he was in r good hope to discomfit the rebell, and to recover his former losses. All which Mosses his cipials right well knew, and for the remedy thereof resolved to march with thirty thou fand men to meet with the Valachians, and to cut them off, before they could come far into Transyluania, or joyne their forces with Basta. For the furthering of which his purpose he had learned the place whereby they were to enter, their number, and the way they were to hold, the better to conduct his army against them; and being in number more than three to one, already affured himselfe of the victory. All which fell out according to his defire for the Valachians comming on being in number but eight thousand, sell as it were a prey into his mouth. For needs fight they must, or die therefore, although the number were vnequall; for that to fly was more dangerous vnto the Valachians (hauing the Turks and Tartarian) horsemen at their backes) than manfully to fight it out. Necessity gave courage vito the weaker fide, and feare caused them to performe more than they would have done, had they had liberty to haue fled : yet for all that, the greater number at length preuailed against the leffe, so that after a great and mortall fight, wherein a great number of the Turks and Tartars were slaine, the Valachians in the end were enforced to leave their dead companions, The Valachians their honour, and their tents, with all their baggage in the field, and to betake themselves to by overfer put flight; but not all in rout as fresh-water souldiers, but with often making stands, as mendifdaining by true valour, but only with number oppressed, to be ouercome. The rebels proud of their victory, and now fearing no more harme, forthwith gaue themselves to the rilling of the enemies campe, dividing the spoyle, and filling the heavens with the noise of their trumpers, publishing thereby the trophies of their victory. Which diforder the Valachims perceiuing, and thereof conceiuing hope of some good to be done, turned head, and sented close together, couragiously thrust themselves into the middest of these proud and triansphant victors. Which vnexpected thunderclap so dismaied them and troubled their wits, that furptifed in diforder, with their hands full of spoils in stead of weapons; they could neither recouer their courage, nor put themselves againe in order. Such confusion maketh men oftentimes to feele the blowes of death, before they be aware of the arme that giveth the same: so, of these men so confounded, some stood as men amazed, othersome ran away to Menseumlibbia faue themselues, and othersome stood vpon their desence, but all were alike slaine : so that in tachian sacce. fine, this great army was for the most part cut in pieces, and the rest put to flight. Mayfes him - throwne, and false was there among the rest slaine, worthy for his truston salary beans released to a more kingless slaine. felfe was there among the rest slaine, worthy for his treason to have beene reserved to a more thamefull death.

Of this victory the Vayuod by letters certified Basta, to whom he sent flue and twenty of the enemies enfignes for an honourable present, with this joyfull news of the death and overthrow of the rebell; whose body as the Vayuod writ, was found dead among it the middelt of the dead, flaine euen at the first charge, wherein his guard was ouerthrowne. And for that it was commonly beleeved, that he was not yet dead, neither present at that battell, as some had given it out; to manifest the contrary vnto the World, and by his example to terrific others. his head was upon a lance fet up at Carolstad for all men to behold: a preferment well befee. Moyfethis head ming such an ambitious head, as had made so great troubles, and beene the death of so many 2008 as 'anet let Christians.

This rebell suppressed, another by and by start vp, called Albert Nage, who gathering toge- New rebests ther the rebels of Transylvania, mingled with certaine Turks, Tartars, Coffackes, and Mol. Vising Vania danians, all together amounting to the number of fix thousand, made head towards Lippa. Against whom, Basta with all speed sent forth three thousand Haiducks well acquainted with the countrey, which sometimes serued them to better purpose than their armes, for that the rebels fought not fo much to come to a fet battell, and to try the matter by true valour, as by taking the advantages of places, to delay the time and purchase gaine, the chiefe end of their rebellion. These rebels the Haiducks surprised neere vnto a Castle called Ferre, where they meant to have lodged, and charged them. Who so voon the sudden overtaken, and ignorant of their enemies power, supposing them to have beene more in number than indeed they were, made fmall refistance, but as a many of rascals, gathered by villany, and without trusting of one another, by flight prouided euery man for himfelfe as he might. In which flight, the greatest number of them were slaine, and their chiefetaine with much ado faued, to be at another time for his euill deferts justly executed.

Basta by these good haps, and the aid of the Vayuod of Valachia, being again become ma- da hanour t fler of the field, in very short time after had reduced all Transylvania under the Emperours & floring obeyfance, vnto whom, he together with the Vayuod, for an honourable prefent and a testi. the Empters: mony of their good feruice, fent to Vienna, and from thence to Prague, an hundred enfignes gained from the rebels. All which with fome other rich spoles, the master of the Ceremonies in great pompe and triumph led, together with Moyles the late rebels horse, exceeding richly furnished with furniture of pure gold, and was for his paines by the Emperour rewarded with a chaine of gold, fent vnto him by the County Fustenberg.

The troubles of Transylvania thus once againe quieted, Basta resolving againe to besiege E Temeswar, with his power marched towards Lippa, there to meet with the forces of the Vay uod of Valachia, the better to vindertake and performe the intended exploit. His army confifted of twenty thousand men strong, carrying with them fine and twenty pieces of great ordnance, furnished with all things necessary. And of the enterprise it selfe every man had good hope, as well for the sufficiency of him the Generall that had undertaken it, as for the want of reliefe that was not like any way to be brought unto the belieged. But while he fo lay at the siege thereof, his souldiers too greedily and excessively feeding upon fruit (where of there was that yeare great store) fell so into the bloudy flix, and thereof in such number died (although he had given most freit command, That none should be caten, or voon great penalties be brought into the camp) that he was glad to rife with his army and be gone.

Whilest this was in doing, the County Solmes lying in garrison at Carolstat, tooke upon County solmes him to surprise Wiscenbourg; and setting forth but with foure hundred souldiers of his surprises, with garrison, with wonderfull diligence surprised the place, and without any great resistance be- jette taken procame masters thereof. But the citisens over-grieved with the insolent outrages of these fears.

men of war, opened the gates of their towns into the rebels of Transylvania, even then fied G from the late ouerthrow; who full of rewenge, tooke the place, and being too front forth County and his foldiers, made such flaughter of them in the fireers (they of the towns out of their windowes, and from the tops of their houses helping them) that of all those which the County brought with him, chere were but dixty left alive, who all taken, were were but dixty left alive, who all taken, were were the County thrust into a strong and loathsome prison.

Now the bruit of the comming of the Turksigness army into Hungary had waked the Christian forces to affemble themselves together, and to do their endeauor to within and the fame : fo that a number of companies were raifed in Germany, who came into Hungary marching towards Strigonium, where the army was to be affembled. The good fueceste of things past, the opinion men had of the Turks troubles with his rebels, and the great profit. les of the Emperourdrew many into thefe lifts of honor; in fuch fore, that there were come A great army together an army of five and twenty thouland foot, and ten thouland horse; all good and if bechristians braue companies, well appointed and well conducted. Of this braue and gallant army the Lord Rullwarme was for this yeare appointed Generall; who therewith marched within the fight of Strigonium, to affure the inhabitants of reliefe, if the enemy should chance tobe fiege them, as the newes then went. About three weekes this army lay thereby encamped. actending the comming of the rest of the forces, which were to strengthen and make up the fame ; during which time the Generall disposed of all things necessary for the keeping of Strigonium, and put into the fort of S. Andrew neere vnto it three thousand Lahforteners for reliefe of the city : which done, hee remoould with his army toward Pests, and encamped 1 within a league thereof toward the West, resoluing so to crosse the designer of the enemy if he should attempt to be siege this place (as it was doubted he would) and in hope that the preferuation thereof might in time be a cause for the winning of Buda, and a memeto impeach the enemies forces.

The Turks army within a few daies after upon a contrary defigne conducted for the winning of Peth (and resolued to raise the Christians campe) in number an hundred thousand mon, came, and face to face incamped within the fight of the Christian army on the other fide of the river Danubius. In the meane time whilest they so lay, certaine cowardly soldiers of Pefih, more in long with their bellies than with their honour, by ftealth fled out of their The Banefull garrifon in Pellb, to the Turks ouer against them in Buda, shamefully crauing of them vidu k fight of serials als, whom the Turks being themselves almost in as great want, yet bounteously relieved. of the garrion Belides that, the Baffa of Buda to corrupt the rest of their fellowes, caused these renegate fuvite the Thirt gittues to be entertained with double pay : who therefore gaue the Bassa a thousand thanks, extolling his bounty vnto the heavens, and from the wals inuiting their companions todous they had done, and so to become partakers of such bounty and pleasure as they were. Howbeit these fugitiues nothing profited the Bassa, either by their persuasion or example: for albeit that they from the mouth of the Bassa promised unto their companions plenty of victuals, good entertainment, and foure months pay more, yet was there not any of them which hearkened or gaue eare vnto their allurements ; but rather the more to affure their commanders of their fidelity, of themselves offered to be sworne againe vnto their allegiance vnto the Emperour, and to die in the place rather than to for lake it. Yet was the want of victuals then in Pefth great, and the garrifon therwith extreamely pinched, fed almost as much with hope, Pegbuillualed as with that little which was left them. Neither was it long after, but that according to their desires the 15 of May a great ship arrived there, laded with wine and victuals sufficient for the reliefe of their present necessities. Of the comming of which ship, the Turks having heard, attended the passage thereof in the Isle, to have intercepted it. Of which their purpose the garrison souldiers of Pesth having knowledge, and armed with necessity, sallied out vpon them, and killing a number of them, inforced the rest to quit the place. This ship was but the forerunner of greater succors; for shortly after followed a number of other ships: which arriving at Pelith, laded with victuals and other necessaries, filled the place with as great plenty, as there had beene before want. Which supply was conducted vinto Pethby 500 harquebusiers of Strigonium, the Turks from Buda looking on, but not daring or not. able to stay the same. It

It fortuned at the selfe same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to The same time, the same time time time time time time. Rab, shewed the Christians there the way and mean how they might come to the suburbs of flacks of packs of pack Alba-Regalis, and take the spoil of the same; yea and haply as things might (al out, finde oc. by the shrift). casion to surprise the town it self also, offering himself to be their guid in the action. And al. and beit that this Turk might iustly be feared and suspected, yet the Christian foldiers, as men defirous both of honour and prey, and induced also by the probability of the attempt, gaue credit vnto him and embraced the same. Neither failed he of his promise, nor the Christians of their deuoir in performance of the exploit; For the two garrifons of Rab and Strigonium affembled together, by this Turks conduct furprifed the fuburbs of Alba Regalis, flew al them that made relistance, rifled them on all hands, fet them on fire, and so laden with rich spoil returned home again in safety.

At the same time also the Christians on the other side Danubius gathered an head to ge. Peth again vither to conduct another Conuoy of victuals into Pesth, with a resolution to march with the strategy fame through the plain field at noone day, even in the eie of the enemy, fo to brave him. To which purpose the Lord Nadasti was there present with a good number of Hungarians, Colo. nel Meuberg with a regiment of Almaines, and the County Thurn with a number of Hustars, all good foldiers and men of courage, defirous to proue the same vpon their enemies. This convoy, with the Trumpets gallantly founding, brauely marched over the plaine at mid day, the Turkes from the walls of Buda beholding the fame, but not daring to aduenture you it. And so Pesth, for want of victuals before distressed, was now plentifully relieued both by wa-

The Christians the last yeare having left the siege of Buda for the reasons before written. in their return tooke the castle of Adom, seated vpon the banke of Danubius, about 2 leagues from Buda; and for the keeping therof left therin a garifon of Haiducks. This castle was conuenient for the annoying of the Turks in Buda, and for the relief of the Christians in Pesth: for that it impeached the bringing of victuals vnto the one, and fauoured the victualling of the other. The good and faithful defence of this place these Haiduckes undertooke to their vtmost power, vpon their honour and credit, as they would be accounted valiant and couragious men; but yet refused to be bound by oath to render an account for the place, what socuer might befall a thing (as they truly faid) about their forces, and more than they were able to perform. These men now vpon the bruit of the comming of the Turks great Army, asraid of their shadowes, having before trusted up their baggage, fet fire on the castle and so departed, retyring themselues to Strigonium : where examined by the gouernor Althem, of the cause of their flight, and what enemies had chased them thence; and being not able therfore to make any excuse, nor to yeeld any reason therof, more than their imaginary sear, were by his commandement imprisoned, there to remain vntil order were taken by the Generall of the Army for their further punishment.

Sultan Mahomet now wallowing in the midft of his fenfual delights in Conftantinople, yet found not therin fo full contentment, but that his pleasures had also their griefs fully mixed with them. In Constantinople, the strong feat of his mighty empire, he was amidst the infolent mutinies of the proud Baffa's and tumultuous Ianizaries; and abroad hee was in warres both against his rebellious subiects in Asia, and the Christians in Europe. Vnto all which troubles he faw not how to give remedy at once, and therfore refolued, if it were possible first to appeale the troubles abroad with his rebellious fubic ets in A fia; as more defirous to be at peacewith his owne subjects, than with strangers; howbeit that the punishing of rebellion is more necessary in a Prince for the maintenance of his state, than is war against a stranger for the conquering of a new country or kingdom; the one prenenting the danger hanging oner his head, the other feruing but his vaine and ambitious defire. So hee preferring peace with the Rebels his subjects, before peace with the Christians his enemies, resoluted (18 I said) to pacific the first, the more easily to ruinat the other. But whether he vpon good faith or policy Mabourtin entred into this resolution, and whether indeed he dealt plainly with these rebels, or but only vain offered to deceive them, is hard to say. Howbeit, as the sequell of the matter shewed, salshood and sing practions the sa treachery was the ground of all this businesse, both on the one side & on the other. For these men respecting only the safety and assurance of their estate, held all other actions as indifferent, whether they were good or bad, fo that they ferued to that effect; and nourished with G the same milke of infidelitie that their Prince was, trained up in the same schoole, and softred with the same air, seared in him against them, that which they felt in themselues against him. An hard matter it is to assure minds fraight with like crast, subtiltie, and deceit, and possessed with like distrust one of another. Howbeit Mahomet spared no kinde of cunning to deceive these crasty and subtil men; offering vnto them, together with his gracious pardon, greatore, ferments dignities, and honors, fo that they would but yeeld to him their due obedience lav down their arms, and no more take vp the same but in his service. But thesewily soxes knew right wel that the promises of faithlesse princes cost them nothing but words, the honor and credit therof they regarded not, so that therby they might attain vnto the height of theirdefires, which they esteemed about all other things: fo that for them to trust vnto a thing of so H finall value with him that was fo prodigal therof, and for the same so easily to yeeld up their liues and fortunes, which they effected as their chiefest treasures, they thought right wor. thilv to descrue all shame and mishap that might betide them. So that they not only resuled to lav down arms, and to yeeld their obedience vnto him, as he defired, but even to have peace with him upon any conditions what foeuer, feeing them dangerous unto themselues, and good only for him their enemy.

Mahomet finding the rebels forefolutely fet down, as not by any means but by force to be appealed, thought it now best to turn his purpose vnto the Christians, and to offer them that which the others had refused; in hope that peace made with the one, should be the vtter ruin of the other. V pon which point he being in himself resolved, sought now some honest means 1 not unbesceming his greatnes, to effect this his purpose. For the easing him of which care, the French Embaffador then Lieger at Constantinople, was very fitly then intreating with the Visier Bassa's for the deliverance of the County Y solan, taken at Alba-Regalis the last years, and against all law of arms detained prisoner at Constantinople. This noble gentleman Mehomet thought fit, as wel for the sufficiencie of himself, as with instructions to deale with the Emperour concerning an intreaty of peace to be had. Wherupon he commanded him to bee fet at liberty, with charge, That he should both discreetly and faithfully deal with the Empefor concerning this matter of peace; which if he should by his industry effect, to his good liking and content, then he should remain free, otherwise to return againe into his former captiuity and bondage: for whom the French Embassadour gaue his word and became pledge. K Vpon which barbarous conditions the Earle was forthwith deligered, who by the law of arms should not at all have bin detained.

Besides this plot laid for the negotiation of peace, Achmet Bassa to this purpose writto Colonitz, then commander of the Emperors army in Hungary; the copy of which letters was as followeth:

To thee our friend Collonitz health and greeting. I suppose you yet remember the propositions concorning peace, which our Soueraign and most mighty Monarch not long ago caused to bee opened and proerrains peace. pounded unto you by certaine of his Bassa's neere unto Strigonium: which as then remained not resoluted. But if now it shall seem unto you good, that we should assemble our selves together into some place of asserance both to the one side and the other we may again confer about that busines, as having on my part full power and commandment from my Prince fo to do : yet with charge, That before all other things Strigen.um should be again delinered onto vs. Which being don, wee may easily afterward determintheother defficulties, and conclude a good and wholfome peace. God which onely reigneth in the heavens above, is witnes of our faithfull and iust desire to assume a quiet and sirm peace betwirt us, and that to auest these flouds of war from the poor people, and to give them some repose and rest after so great troubles. This is on intent and purpole, which God knoweth to be void of all fraud and guile; which we now declare unto gen, in ope to vader stand yours also. But if you be not resolved to render to vs Strigonium, before me beginte intreat of other matters, it is not needfull for you to trouble your felf to give any answer to these our letters. But if you findly efolue to the contrary, to deliner the same, with as much speed as you can, in few words let \1 ve under fland the fame with the time & place fit for our affembly & meeting to the intent fully to dutemin of these affairs. You know also that you have bin of long time accussomed to pay tribute to our Prints which if you that continually pay for the time to come, and discharge the arrerages for time past, it fall be commodione for vs, and honourable for you, scoing that it is an honour unto you to be tributaries unto the Grand Seigniour, it having alwaics in times past bin for your good and profit. Besides that peace shall likewise be intreated of with the great Cham of Tartarie, who is commanded by our most mighty and grations Emperor upon suft and reasonable conditions to entertain the same and neaer more but in peaceable manner to come into Hungarie. Now if that you shall neglets or reject this treaty for peace it is cersaine that you shall be the authour of the milery and ruine of the whole country, it being imposible that the towns and villages consumed with fire should ever recover their former beauty or felicity. God which reigneth in beauen is there witnesse unto me, and my dead Emperour upon earth that I speake franckely with you, and without dissimulation concerning this matter. Now on your part, let vs under stand if you bane a defire to attend unto this treaty of peace according to the purport of your Letters : for if you shall R refolue to the contrarie, we protest wato you to write no more concerning these affaires.

Collonita having received these letters, fent them forthwith vnto the Emperor, requesting his Majiestie to consider what answer he would have given vnto them. Whom the Emperor, defirous of a good peace, commanded to embrace the occasion, and by proofe to learne whe ther the Turks defire were indeed conformable to their words or not. Whereupon Collenitz taking vnto him certaine of the best commanders of the army, undertooke the businesse, and entred into the treaty of peace with the Turks wherein he found the vnrcasonablenesse of their demands to tend so much vnto the hurt and dishonor of the Emperor, as that they even at the first entrance that vo the way to al further or rensonable conference; it being altogether c impossible to bring to any conformitic, minds fet down upon resolutions so far different. For the Turks (as if the Emperour would have been glad of peace voon any condition) after their The Turke va the Turks (as if the Emperourwould naue ocen giad or peage vpon any condition) after tuely reasonable de-proud manner, voreasonably demanded to haue Transylvania, Strigonium, and Pesth restored manti-breake vnto them , for which they offered to deliuer vnto the Emperour Agria and Canifia, pebles of all the treefor pearles. So that vpon propositions so far different, being able to conclude nothing, they safe peace. departed on both fides as they came, to try by armes that which by talke and conference they could not agree voon. But as all the Turks treaties of peace with the Christians are indeed but false shewes to abuse the facilitie of the Christians by, even so now also it was knowne, that they in the meane time, whileft this treaty of peace was in hand, gathered together great store both of men and munition at Belgrade, wherewith to arme a great con-D uoy of victuals, which they had thought during this interparley for peace to have put into Buda. But Collonitz vnderstanding thereof, ceased further to intreat of peace, which with the false shew thereof did but hurt and deceive the Christians, and betooke himselse againe to his arms (his and their fafest and surest resuge) resoluing with the other Captains & Commanders of the army to do what they might for the croffing and hindring of the Turkes in their purpose for the putting of victuals into Buda: whereof there was now such want, that the Turks in garrison there having alreadic eaten all their horses, and for victuals rifled the Gouernours house, were resoluted to abandon the city, if they should not be within some sew

Now vpon this refolution for the keeping of the Turks from the vi aualling of Buda, the Christians for the more affurance of their purpose, prepared therefore both by water and by land, embarking their footmen upon the river, under the conduct of Colonell Altmeine and Sultze, the one the Gouernour of Strigonium, and the other of Pesth; whilest that Colloniz with the horsemen scouring along it the banks of the river of Danubius, took the charge by land. And so it fortuned, that vpon the 22 day of August he with his horsemen neere vnto the village of Mohatsch (samous for the death of King Lewis) sell upon the head of the Turks army, led by the Bassa Murat, consisting of six thousand Turkes, two thousand of them being Ianizaries: who altogether lay encamped upon an euen plaine, very commodious for our horsemen, who let slip neither the time nor the opportunitie of so great an advantage offered them, but forthwith charged them where after a number of notable charges both gi-F uen and received, which still abated both the number and courage of the Turks, they at last Anotable in retired toward the body of their army, and that in such hast, as that their retreat little differed louis upon from a speedy flight. the spoil, in stead of pursuing their enemies, the Turks perceiving the small number that pur. G fued them, turned upon them, and so began again not only to make strong refissance, but cuen right hardly to charge them. Who so by them pressed with no lesse courage than power, were now glad themselves to retyre, in stead of pursuing the victory; but yet so, as that the retret was made without any great losse therin received. Howbeit, the Turkes not a little income. ged with this change of fortune, and perceiuing themselues too strong for their enemies that charged them, came on fo fast and so couragiously, as that in sine they had defeated the Christians, had not the Haiducks out of their boats from the river in good time come refer lutely to their relief. Which cloud the Turks perceiuing, ready to pour forth a great tempest vpon their heads, and not daring to abide the same, againe retyred, leaving the Christians Vi Cors both in the first and last charge: who not content with the retreit of the Turks, suriously H charged and purfued them even vnto their great campe, and fo returned, carrying backewith them both the glory of the field, and the spoil of their enemies.

In this conflict, the red cornet of Murat Baffa, the cognifance of his great commaund, was taken, with two field pieces; seuen hundred Turks were left dead upon the place, and fix score more taken prisoners: amongst whom was Saxar Beg, who being a man of vnderstanding & by The Turker of the Christians examined, confessed, That Hassan Bassa the day before this confil came into to the Christian the Campe, and there honourably dined with the great Cham, with whom after their great cheer, he entring into discourse of many great matters, and among the rest, concerning his return into his country was much against the same, vntill such time as they had new victualled Buda, wherunto he was (as he faid) both in bonour and duty bound to give his affiftance, the losse of this place being of so great importance vnto the grand Seignior. That otherwise his aid had been to him rather hurtfull than profitable, his people having devoured formetive Quals and performed nothing, if he should now at this time faile to doe his Prince service! who could neuer thinke either valour or credit to be in him, if he should fail in such actions as wherin his valour and fidelitie hould appear; all things having no other credit and reput tation but according unto their effects. And that therefore hee should resolut to see the end of this exploit, which required every mans helping hand for the performance therof, confide ring the forces of the enemy in readinesse to hinder the same. Moreover hee assured them That the Baffa's purpose was to new fortifie Halwar, Pax, and Kaletsch, frontier Castles, and necessarie for this action, and so to goe to the siege of Pesth: and that done, to besiege Strigonium, which for all that, he doubted to win this year, as well by reason of the approach of winter, as for that a great part of his forces were far off, and not eafily in a little time to be all sembled together. That the Tartars were yet a great way from the camp, where the Bassa's of Asia and Caramania were within a few daies expected, the one of them leading with him the reconciled rebels of Asia, and the other fix thousand Ianizaries. Which his confession although it were not altogether true, yet caried it shew of some probabilitie, as time by proofe afterward declared.

Some of our men were in this charge flaine also, but few in comparison of the Turks, who there lost some of their best men. It was noted, that to this conflict the soldiers of Colonell Sultze had euil behaued themselues, refusing to pursue the enemy being in slight, whether it I were for that they feared some ambush layd for them, or for that they disdained to follow Generall Collonitz: the reasons perhaps for which their Colonell staied them from the purfuit of the enemy. But to cuill purpole: for being out of order at fuch time as the Turkes turning back renewed the fight, they had beene all stain and cut in pieces, had nor the Haiduckes in good time (as we faid) come on to their refeue. As for Collonitz, hee most brauely base himself in this conslict, so much as in him was vrging his good fortune for the obtaining of a ful victory; sometime performing the part of a good Captaine, and sometime of a most valiant souldier; sometime forcing the charge, and again staying his men in the retteit info much that oftentimes loft amongst his enemies, and again returning by the grace of God, he escaped death as it were by miracle, and from being taken prisoner, by chance. Into neither M of which dangers hee could have fallen without the great danger of the whole Army, which next vnto God, was for the fafety; thereof chiefely beholding vnto the valour of him their fo braue a Leader. But God in his wisedome createth not such worthy men, but by his pro-uidence also to preserue them: Wonder it were otherwise, that ever such worthy men should return from among the midft of formany desperat dangers, Death as it were entrying at their liues, and their enemies for their glory chusing them out to triumph of their spoils and outrthrow. And without doubt, had the rest of the Christians after his example prosecuted their good fortune, and don what good foldiers should of duty have done, their enemies had been quite ouerthrown, and they themselves had bin both victorious and richwhere now for lacke of good resolution, the victory was almost equall; for besides the spoils by them gotten, they might have carried away with them a whole years pay due to the garrison of Buda, which the Turks, put into a fear, and only carefull of their lives, had left in their camp, which they afterward again recouered, youn recouery of their force and courage. This mony, with much more, was all appointed as a prey vnto the good fortune of our men, had they bin fo valorous as to fetch it but failing of their indeauor in fo glorious an action, Portune failed them also of herbounty.

Now at length the Christian army was met together, about the fourth of September, wherin the lord Rullworm commanded as General; who defirous to understand of the Turks affairs and designes, sent forth two of his most trusty and expert, souldiers to performe that piece of feruice: who in Turks apparel being got into the Turks army, were there eight daies vndifco. The Lord Suffuered or suspected of any. Where after that they roaming vp and down had taken a full view worm inforof the Turks army, and in what they might discoursed their designes, they returned back, de. Turks designes. claring unto their General what they had both there heard and feen as, That the Turks army was very great, but yet not fuch as that which the last year besieged Pessh: That the Turks lav incamped at large, and not all together, which caused their Army to seem the greater, taking vp half a league for the lodging therof, being wel prouided of cannon and other field pieces. That Haffan Baffa commanded therin as Generall, having brought with him twelve thousand lanizaries, beside his horsmen and the reconciled rebels of Asia, which were daily lookt for the leader of whom was not known fome thinking it to be him who had alwaies commanded them, being a most valiant captain and expert commander, but others deemed him to be but one of his Captains that had forfaken him (as indeed he was) a right valiant man also, but nor of fogreat experience as he. That the great Tartar Han, come to aid the Turks in their wars in Hungary, was to the great discontentment of Hassan Bassa, now already returned toward his own country (with fuch booty and prifoners as he had got from the poor Christians) to appeafea rebellion there raifed by a yong Tartar prince his nephew, who by his vncle the great Han given in hostage to Mahomet, and kept at Constantinople as in prison, having got means to make an escape and to return into Tartary, was about to trouble his vneles affaires, in hope now in his absence to mount vnto the throne of his estate; and that the Tartar being come to the banke of the river Danubius, and by the Turks denied boats to passe ouer in, and with many railing and opprobrious speeches by them charged for his departure, as a Coward, had found meanes to make a floting bridge of great faggots, whereby he passed his footmen ouer the river, his horsemen swimming over the same; and so was by great journies returning toward his owne territory, boasting by the way as he went. That hee had rejected and trodden E vnder foot all the prayers and requests of Haffan Baffa, entrosting him yet to stay a while in Hungary for the service of the great Sultan his master. Besides that, That they had seene six great Vessels upon the river of Danubius, with ten lesser Vessels following after them, garded with three thouland fouldiers well armed, and men of good fort, three hundred of them being Ianizaries, appointed to fafe conduct the munition to be brought up the river, and to ferue as a convoy to the other Vessels that went to follow them with victuals, if haply the Christians should attempt any thing against them. And in fine, That the Turks army could not possibly be great this year, by reason of many great lets wherevith the great Sultan was this year troubled: which much abated the courage and hope of his Captaines, who hanging their heads, came vnwillingly to these Wars, accounting then felues happy if they might in this expedition but take Pefth, that they might not returne fo much dishonoured as they came dannted and discouraged. With which newes the Christians were so much encouraged to incounter with the Turkes, as if they had beene affured to fight with men already discouraged and out made a most braue and gallant fight, every one of them wishing, That their private succession might be the beginning of their general victory. But the Hussars being both more skilfullin that manner of skirmithing and fudden incounter, and alfo of greater courage, at length brake the Turks rankes, of whom fix score lay dead upon the ground, most of the rest being taken prisoners, with an hundred and thirty good and seruiceable horses, wherewith both the glory and the profit of their victory was increased. Colonel Sultze also with 300 men marching our from the Campe, chanced to discouer an hundred of those braue horsemen which but newly came out of Asia with Zellaly the Rebell; who having neuer seen the army of the Christians nor yet felt their forces, were with three hundred Ianizaries vpon a brauery come ouer the Ri- H uer Danubius, to take a view of the Christian Camp: for the drawing on of whom, the warv Colonel had fent forth fifty of his hor smen a great way from the rest of his troup, as it were to discouer the country therabouts. These fore-runners failed not to meet with the Turkes, as if it had been by chance, and were by them forthwith charged, as thinking to have had a great hand ouer that fo small a number, when vpon the sudden Colonell Sulize with the rest of his company comming on, and hotly charging them, encouraged his owne men, and discouraged the Turks: who surprised with feare, thinking the Christians to be more in number than indeed they were having left some fifty of their men dead you the place, as men diffusied and vovd of vnderstanding fled : in which their flight, such as were not by the Christians slaine, were in the river of Danubius drowned, whereinto they for feare all headlong plunged them. I

All these little conflicts served but as sparkes, to kindle the great fire by the Bassa intended his first purpose being to put a Conuoy of victuals into Buda, which the Christians purposed by all means to hinder; which so contrary intentions were not but by force and por licie to be decided. The Christian General wisely doubting lest the Bassa should come and lodge his Army betwixt Vicegrade and Buda, and fo victual the city at his pleasure, raised a firong fort of an old church, betwixt the faid two places, and therein lodged a Regiment of Lanfquenets. Beside which fort, called the fort of Saint Andrew, hee built another at the head therof in the Isle of Vicegrade, in such order and proportion, that these two forts might one of them defend the other, and annoy them that should attempt to force either of them. K Together with this commodiousnes, the fort in the Isle kept the passage vpon Danubius free and open for the bringing of victuals and other necessaries to the Campe of the Christians; and was but a league and an half from Buda. Into which fort was put a Regiment of foure thousand Italians, being all very wel armed. Which don, he made a bridge of boats vponthe River, which began in the camp and ended at the Isle, for the releiving of the fort; & fo from thence passed quite ouer the river to Vacia, a little town, which it was needfull for the Christians to keep.

These Forts finished according to the necessity of the time, it was not long after, but that the Bassa sent ten thousand Turkes both horse and soot to take the first of them, which they supposed to have beene but weakely fortified. Who comming thither, were with such conrage received by the Lanfquenets with their harquebuses, as that the whole Fort seemed to haue beene on fire. Wherewith the Turkes dismayed, as men in their expectation deceived, and in approching of the same having some of their men slain and moe hurt, they some after founded a retreit, and having done nothing but loft a number of their men, returned to their Campe from whence they came. In which enterprise failing, they resolved vpon another, and began to make a bridge ouer the Danubius, in hope thereby to passe ouer, and to annoy the Christians on the other side of the River. Wherof the General of the Christians understanding, suffered them without any interruption to spend the time in performing of the same. But certainly informed by his espials, both of the day and houre wherein they were about to paffeouer, he layd an ambush of foure thousand Lansquenets and two thousand Reisters for M them, in such place as from whence they might without danger do great harm vnto the Enemy, and affure the body of the Christian Army. The river of Danubius had growing vpon the bankes thereof, and especially in the desolate and unfrequented places, great store of flags them in pieces, not aware of the ambush laid for them, nor of their enemies counter designes, The footmen in the mean time lying stil close in the reeds in ambush, beholding how and in what order they passed, and expecting but the time when they were to begin their charge. But having perceived ten thousand Turks to be now come over, and making head toward them; the Wallons vpon the banke of the river (as was before appointed) first discharged their pieces vpon them, and flew fome of them. Neuertheleffe the Turkes fill patting on by them, flew of them also about foure and twenty, and so keeping their way, marched directly toward the Christians. But this their forwardnesse was quickly stayed, and their courage abated; for in passing by, they were voon the sudden assailed by the Lansquenets and Reisters, now risen out of ambush, and by them hardly layed vnto on enery side; as also by the horsemen, C who now come in, had put them into some diforder before they were wel aware of them. The Wallons also at the first by the Turks scattered, but now again rallied, & desirous to reuenge the death of their friends and sellows, played their parts, and on another side right suriously among take charged their enemies. During al which fight, the Culuerins ceased not to open the flanks of for ibem by 160 the Turks battell, with the loffe of a number of their men, by the fury therof rent in pieces. crime a noisbu Neither did the valiant Collonitz foreslow so fair an opportunitie, but afront charging this dif- outribrene. maied company, by plaine force caused them to give ground: the Carabins in the mean time charging them upon their flanks, and the Wallons behinde. Who thus on every fide before and hardly layd vnto, as men discouraged, and out of hope to be relieued, turned their backes and fled amaine, to have recovered the bridge whereby they came over. In which fight and D flight two thousand of them being flaine, and the rest not able to recouer the bridge, driven headlong into the river, were therein drowned and flaine to the number of flue thousand of them, those which remained aline beeing all taken prisoners. Amongst the rest one of the Bassa's, a man of great account among st rhe Turkes, was slain, with many other Captains and commanders of great note, and fifteen hundred Ianizaries. There were also foure field pieces taken, with thirty enfignes and two Cornets, beside a very rich prey of braue and couragious horses, with much fair armor, rich apparell, and good scimiters, weapons of no small account and price amongst the Turks. This ouerthrow much abated the courage and hope of the rest of the Turkes for comming to the effect of their designes, and increased the courage and hope of the Christians, reasonably wel hereby assured of the good succes of their affaires for E this year in Hungary.

About this time Sultan Mahomet having put a ficet of Gallies to fea, to have gone against the king of Fez, was certainly informed, how that the same with tempest fore bearen, to avoid shipwrecke, was againe returned vnto the same port from whence it loosed, bringing backe with it nothing for all his great charges, but sicknesse and great losses at sea received. The like euil hap or worse having at the same time also betided another Fleet by him set out into the Euxine or blacke sea, to desend those sea coasts from being risled and spoyled by the Rebels in Asia, who with their daily incursions did there still great harme. So that so far from was it, that the rebellion was extinguished in Asia, and the rebels suppressed, as that they were now up in greater num. ber than euer, and so did also more harm. Wherunto they were also the more incouraged by the example of Hassan Bassa (not him the Generall in Hungary, but another Bassa of the same name) who by the great Sultan fent against these rebels, had for a time kept them vnder, and formwhat repressed their insolencie; but now by Mahomet displaced, and another being sente fucceed him the therwith discontented, so animated and insenced his soldiers against him, as that comming to haue taken upon him his charge, he found most part of the soldiers ready to turn their weapons vpon him: fo that at length they fel together by the ears about the matter. In which tumultuous quare a number of foldiers were flain, all they of the richer fort spoiled, and the Sultans service and authority neglected. But the new General armed with his princes authority, and some of the old foldiers also taking his part, at last prevailing, Haffan the old Generall with his partakers were glad to flie and shift for themselues, who for all that, having afterward gathered together the dispersed soldiers, and joining with the rest of the rebels, held stil the body of a good army on foot by his example firring vp the people to rebellion, croffing the feruice of his Soucraign, and doing what harm he could so to feem vnto his followers the more valiant,

Tauris vecouse. red by the ler-Gant

The Persian king on the other side taking advantage of these the Turks troubles at home. as alfo of his wars with the Christians, at the same time with a great army besieged the great 1 city of Tauris, as then kept by the Turks with a most strong garison. In which siege hee for battery wied the help of the cannon, an engin of long time by the Persians skorned, as not befeeming valiant men with that by the irown harms raught, he was now content to vie it, beeing with the fame, as allowith skilful canoniers furnished by the Portugals. By which means he in thort time after again recoursed this great City from the Turkes, being before by Sultan Amurath taken from Mahomet the Persian King, but now againe restored vnto the Persian Kingdom.

Sultan Mahomet thus on every fide befet with troubles, and not wel knowing which way to turn himself for remedy, being much perplexed in mind, began to enter into consideration of the vanity of these cartbly things, and of the frailty of his estate, and so struck as it were with K remorfe of conscience, and a firm beleefe that God did thus chastise and punish him for his offences, confidering that his ancestors had never bin troubled with any such attaints or disgraces; he converted all his thoughts vnto prayers towards God, and therefore commaunded publique prayers to be continually faid in all the Moschies or churches thorowout his dominions; giving himfelf wholly also vnto such douout exercises and works of charity : & withal fent two of his most reuerend priests bare headed and bare footed on pilgrimage to Mecha (where the chief temple of their great Prophet is, and where they vainly beleeue their superfittious prayers are of him most speedily heard) there to pray vnto him for the health & pro-

At the same time Amurat Rais an old pyrat the Turkes Admirall for the West part of the L Mediterranian, roaming there vp and down, and doing what harme he could, chanced to light vpon a great Flemish thip, which he with his gallies forthwith inclosed, the calmnesse of the weather then fauoring him, & hindring the Flomings, their (hip being able to make noway. Who so beset, and having made a great fight against the whole fleet, and slaine a number of the Turks, and fore rent divers of their gallies, though nor without loffe of many of their own men also, being not able longer to fight, and now seeing themselves borded by as many Turks as could wel stand upon the hatches of the ship, & their gallies hanging round about her; 45 men of inuincible courage resolued to die, and yet to sel their lives as dear as they could, laid all the pouder they had left in the ship, on an heape together, and thereunto vpon the sudden put fire, by force whereof the Turkes with the hatches were all blown vp, the Flemings with M their ship rent in pieces, together with divers of the Gallies that were fastened vnto her, and an incredible harme done vnto fuch other of the Gallies as were neere vnto her. Men worthy alwaies to vanquish, seeing that they feared nothing more than to be themselues vanquished and more worthy to have lived for the glory of men, than by their crueltie to have perished to the dishonor of men. The old pyrat astonied at so great and desperat a resolution, having in this exploit lost much, and gained nothing, hasted to the shore to repaire his rent gallies, and so to put to sea againe: Where he had not long been, but that he by chance (and that full fore against his will) met with the great Duke of Florence his gallies, accounted the best gallies in the world, and such as now at this present most troubled the Turks defignes. At which meeting, after many a thundering connon shot on both sides discharged, not without the apparant losse on the Turks behalfe, when they should have come to have grapled together, and to have fought hand to hand, a thing which the Florentines most defired, as inhope to have made the famous pyrat the prize of their victory; he not willing fo to do, fuddenly turned about and fled afterwhom the Florentines followed amaine, and in the chafe n funke some of his gallies, and took othersome full of great riches; and so brake the credit of this old and renowned pyrat, as that for a great while after he was little by the Christians feared voon that coast. But leaving Mahomet to his devotions, and the old pyrat to bewaile his losses, let vs again returne to see what the great armies of the Turks and of the Christians did more in Hungarie.

While these armies lay encamped the one attending upon the other, many an hor skirmish "be Tarkes on passed betwirt them, most wherof forted vnto the hurr and losse of the Turks. Among others the Corficant it fortuned, that a troupe of aduentures going out of the Christian army to sceke after booty, fell vpona like troup of the Turks, come out for the like purpose: where after a sharp encounter on both sides given & received, the Turks at length put to the worse and defeated, betook themselues to flight, having left a number of their fellows dead vpon the place, and lost two of their ensignes, with an hundred and thirty horses of seruice. In which chase the Christians hardly pursuing them, draue a number moe of them into the Danubius, wherin they most miferably perished; and tooke a great many moe prisoners, among st whom were found about fourescore Italian renegates, who brought into the camp, were as enemies vnto God, in a martiall court all condemned to be hanged, and so accordingly executed, fauing the captain him. #ight, tiallan

Shortly after, the great Baffa arifing with his army, came in the beginning of O ctober, and incamped neere Buda both for the preservation of the place, and the safety of his army, now greatly diminished both in number and courage. For it was certainly knowne by dluers fugi-D tiues from the Turks, that in these many conflicts they had lost a number of their best souldiers, but especially of their Ianizaries. So that the Bassa for supplying of that descet, was glad to make choice of 600 of his best soldiers, whom armed with muskets and scimiters, the proper armes of the Ianizaries, he entertained into the rooms and pay of the Ianizaries that were dead and flaine: the rest of his army for the most part consisting of bare and seeble base raw fouldiers. Besides this that all the army was full of mourning and lamentation, the soldiers in all places bewailing the losse of their brethren, their friends, and companions: so that in stead of their wonted threats and brauery, nothing was to be heard but fighing & complaining and moreouer, that the generall opinion conceived of the greatnesse of the Christian army (imagined to bee much greater and stronger than indeed it was) had strucke such a feare into the E minds of the Turks, as that they were resoluted, Buda being once vi Qualled, to returne home, all their other proud designes for this yeare set apart : which was the cause that they had dislodged with their army, and drawne neere vnto the city, the better to attend to the new victualling thereof, and so to be gone; accounting themselves right happy, if they might but performe that good piece of service and save themselves.

The Christians before in doubt lest the Turks should have besieged Pesth, as they had before given it forth they would, and feeing them now to bee rifen with their army, and incamped necre vnto Buda, resolued to follow them, and in what they might to crosse their defignes: and thereupon leaving Pesth, as now out of danger, they rose also, and came and incamped before the Fort in the Isle of Vicegrade, betwixt the faid Fort and Vacia; where they stayed foure daies, and then by a bridge which they made vpon the Danubic, whereby to passe from the Isle where the Italians lay in garrison, unto the Fort of S. Andrew, kept by the Lanfquenets, they with the whole army passed the river, and so came and incamped before the Fort of S. Andrew, in the face of the enemy. Now the field betwirt the heads of the two armies was plaine and open without woods, bushes, or rivers, to hinder the joining of a ict battell. In which fo fit a place, the Christians encouraged with the seare of their ene. G. mies, and the diminishing of their number and courage (whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous rifing, as by other aduertifements) were defired in fo faugurable occasions, to have given them battell; and for the desire they had thereof, were comethither to feeke it: which the Turks on the other fide fought as much to thun, not daring to adden ture themselues voto the fortune of a generall battell, for all the bragges they had made. No uerthelesse very shame arming them with some resolution, they put forth into the field a bar. talion of five thousand men, five daies after that the Christians were incamped on that side of the River. This battell of the Turks came marching on, within halfe a quarter of a lea ue of the Christians, which they would not have done but vpon the confidence of a gree. ter number following of them, having behind them ten thousand men both horse and foot H layd as close as they possibly could a little out of the way: Now the Christians thinking of no other forces ready to fight, but those which appeared in their fight, sent forth twelve hundred men against these five thousand Turks, to skirmish with them, vntill the whole army were put into order, even for a generall battell that day to have been fought, if the Turks should accept thereof, whereunto the Generall, the Colonels, Captaines, and fouldiers ingenerall, were fully enclined, the whole army with great cheerfulneffe marching on foot, at this loud alarme of their common defire. Which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turks been likewife disposed for the producing of the same. Burtley be the extraordinarie fauours of Fortune, when fix occasions joyne themselves with brave refolutions and fuch resolutions with meanes to effect the same. This is the let of many most no. 1 ble trophies, which most commonly faile, either for lacke of fit occasion, or for lacke of good resolution for the performance of them. But as most meniudge of other mens conceits by their owne inclination, so the Christians themselves resolved to give battell, thought the Turks their enemies to have been of the same resolution: and those sue thousand men to have been the head of the augunt guard, followed with the whole army, comming to draw them out to skirmish untill the comming on of the rest of their forces. Howbeir their designe was quite contrary to this the Christians hope; for their purpose was onely to traine them out into their ambushes, so without danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpose they gave sufficient testimonie, and cause of suspect; for that the skirmish having continued three houres, with some losse on both sides, the Turks army appeared not; and these since K thousand Turks now in skirmish, by little and little retyring, sought so to have drawne the Christians into the danger of their ambush. Which their manner of fight caused the Chris stians to suspect the matter: for it was not like, that five thousand men should give ground to twelve hundred, if they had not had some secret meaning therein, which they fought to effect to their more advantage: which caused the Christian Carabins which followed them, not to be too earnest in pursuing of them, and more closely to serre themselves together, the better to endure the shocke of their enemies, if they should charge them. Neither were they in that their prouident seare deceived : for the Turks seeing their purpose discovered, and themselves now out of hope to effect the same, vpon the sudden made a stand, and so prefently comming on, hardly charged the foremost of our Carabins, : who as men halfe surprifed, to fee themselves so readily and resolutely charged, by men who but now made shew as if they would have fled, were not able fo valiantly to receive the charge (confidering the great number of them by whom they were charged) but that some few of them were overthrowne and flaine, with some of the Hungarians among ft them. Howbeit they made good resistance; and right valiantly repulsed their enemies of whom they slew a great number allo. The prease in this conflict was great, every one desiring to shew himselfe brave and courtgious in the head of his owne army. But new supplies still comming in, the Turks in fice shrunke backe and retired, having left three hundred of their fellowes dead upon the place, accompanied with an hundred of the Christians there flaine likewise. Now vpon the retrest on both fides, euery man in his conceit appointed the next day for the generall day of battell: M the bragging speeches of the Turks giving the Christians occasion so to thinke; for why, they seldome or neuer resuse battell being offered them by the Christians, as wel for the confidence they commonly have in their multitude, as for the foolish opinion they have of the ineuitable predestination of men to life or death:accounting it amongst them an eternall in-

A famy to refuse any combat against the Christians, which how socuer it fall out, should fort to their advantage, by vanquithing gaining the fruits of their victory, and by lofing their lives in battell, to gain the joyes of heaven; being vainly perfuaded, no mens fouls to go more readily to heaven, that the fouls of such as die in battell against the Christians. Such effects old funerstitious opinions are able to work in the minds of men, cuen to the desperat adventure and spending of their lines. Howbeit that this effect at this time witnesseth, that these men with all thele aduantages, as much feared the danger as any other poore faint hearted men. and that a strong apprehension of sear is able to preunil against all customes and persuasions, be they neuer foold, as also against all other accidents what society. For why, the Turks contenting themselves with their great brags and vain threats, came not forth according to their B promife, neither could by any means be drawn to aduenture themselves vnto the hazard of a generall battel. The losse of their great and choicest men discouraged & deterred them from aduenturing all to the hazard of fo great a peril: for (as I have faid) almost all the lanizaries and most valiant soldiers were dead or slain; and the rest, men of smal spirit or courage, referued that little which was in them, for the fafegard of themselues, and not for the gaining of any notable victory. They had also in these often conslicts lost all their Erasbles, which are a desperat kind of soldiers fighting on horseback without saddles, having onely a little piece of tapeffry vpon their horfes backs, and by the readinesse of their horses do for a long time in one fort maintain their fight. They carry light darts made of strait and faire Canes, excellently well made, and strongly armed; and their handy weapons are good sables, or broad and C. sharp curtle-axes. These men a great while fought most valiantly in the last combats, but in fine were all flaine, except some few which cast themselves into Danubius, and were there drowned. The loffe of which men much discouraged the Turks; for why, their service stood them in great stead in receiving the enemies charges, and with their bodies courting of the Turks squadrons in their greatest perils & combats. Howbeit the Turks received not these loffes without returning fome part therot to vs again. For Collonitz had but a little before fallen into great danger of his person, & lost some of his followers in an enterprise of great moment, had the effect answered vnto the project therof. While the Tarks yet lodged in the Isle of Vicegrade, he caused eight great field pieces to be so placed, as that therewith he so much annoyed the Turkes, that they were about to have for faken the place; and the more to force them foto doe, the second of O crober he imbarqued himselse with 600 Haiduckes upon the Danubius, and so by night with great filence landed neer vnto the enemies, thinking so your collapsize in the fudden to have furprifed them. Which for all that could not so secretly be don, by reason superifing the of the appearing of the day, but that the Turks were therof aware; who therupon with great turks him preife iffued out of their trenches, and with al their force and power charged him. Against whom he made head, rather upon a braue and conftant refolution, than any confidence he had in his own forces, not having men ynow to withstand the least part of his enemies. Which his fo great resolution so abated the Turks sury, as that they stood a good while in doubt to charge men fo resolued. The field pieces which he had brought ouer with him into the Isle then serued him to good purpose, beating them backe with their murthering bullets, who with their number thought to haue ouerwhelmed him. Which good help opposed against the number of the enemies for a time ballanced the victory, and wrought the death of many onboth fides. This maner of fight endured the space of two hours, maintained more by resolution than by strengh and power. At length for all that, the Turks with their number pregailing, the Christians therwith rather oppressed than vanquished, forfaking their field pieces, diforderly retyred towards their boats: but the Turks eagerly purfuing them, flew 400 of the Haiducks the rest recovering their boats, carryed with them their Generall, by them hardly defended from the fury of the enemy. Which loffe hapned not fo vnto the Christians, but that it was mingled with some losse of the Turkes also, of whom the most forward and couragious were in that fight flain as was afterwards knowne by certaine prifoners of theirs which were afterwards taken, who made report of the losses by them there received. The Turkes by this fodesperate and dangerous an attempt warned to preuent the like for the time to come. cast up great trenches in the Isle along st the bank of Danubius, therin placing certain Janiza. ries and other their best fouldiers, who there lay untill the Campe distodging went to lie before Buda. The

A conflict betwixt the Turks and the Christians.

The Turks had before built a bridge of boats at Lamascin, which gaue them passage into G Stiria, where they did great harm; for the strengthning wherof they had built at both ends a ftrong fort, well furnished both with men and munition. This bridge so commodious to the Turks, and hurtful to the Christians, Trantmestorf gouernor of Stiria, and a great commander in those parts, with his Stirian troupes, and some good aid brought vnto him by the County Serim, vndertook to break. Vpon which resolution he vpon the sudden approched one of the aforefaid forts, and so right furiously assailed the same before they were well aware of hie comming. In which doing, he caused the greatest noise and stir that was possible to be made with trumpets, drummes, and clattering of armour, as if it had bin fome great army imploied in that action, the more to terrific the defendants. Which so great and dreadful a noise joined vnto fo braue an attempt, with fo great courage begun, strook such a terror into the minds of H the Turks, that they without any great refistance quitted the place, and fled ouer the bridge to the other fort. Of which for saken fort the Christians became masters, and with all speed profecuting their good fortune, presently drew out theroftwo Cannons, and therewith battered the other fort : in which the Turks, having no other place of refuge to flie vnto, norhone of fafety but in their last valour, so wel behaued themselues, as that the Christians had much ado to force them; howbeit a breach being made by the fury of the cannon, and fealing lad. ders fet vo, the fort was on every fide affaulted; which the Turks fo valiantly endured by the foace of fine hours, as that it was hard to fay who should prevail or have the better. In this affault were many on both fides flain; the Turks not being to be ouercome but with the loffe both of their lines and honour; and the Christians not able to retyre, without the loss of 1 that fo great and rich an enterprise. So that the affault was with great resolution on both fides maintained, the Turks fighting for their liues, and the Christians for their honour, vntill that at last the Turks with much slaughter ouercome, the fort was by the Christians taken, and most of the Turks therein being slain, and the rest taken prisoners, both the fortswere forthwirh rased, and the bridge broken, which before had served for an ordinary passage for the Turks to forrage and spoil the Christian territory by. The boats wherof the bridge was made were all burnt, and fome great Ordnance therein found, broken in pieces and cast into the river.

Lugare aften;

At the same time Lugaze, a place of great importance for the service of the Emperour, and fo neer vnto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing theerabouts, but that it K might from thence be discourred and knowne, was by the Transylvanians deliuered to Basta, the Emperors Lieutenant in that countrey. From which place he fending outcertain fcours toward Belgrade, they brought in with them certain prisoners; who being examined, faid, that Haffan Baffa in Hungary, had writ to Giaffer Baffa the governor of Temeswar, That he should only attend to the preservation of his own, without attempting any thing further against the Christians, the present estate of their affairs so requiring. And that having re-victualled Buda, his purpose was for this year to return, in hope of some good peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor.

The two armies of the Turks and the Christians lay stil neer the one of them to the other, the Turkes carefull for the re-victualling of Buda, and the Christians still intentine to their L doings, and desirous in what they might to hinder and frustrate the same. Which because they could no way better do than by offering of them battell, they thereupon generally refolued, vpon a Friday being the scuenteenth of October, the day by them assigned for the battell (having by the shooting off of three great cannons given warning vnto the fouldiors thotowout the camp, for the preparing of themselves first towards God, and then to the service of their Prince) after they had wel refreshed themselues, in good order tooke the field, and so stood ready ranged there, either to give or accept of battell. Before whom the County Rhingraue was fent forth with his Regiment, about halfe the way betwist the two Armies, to difcouer the mouing of the Enemy, and to receive his first charge, if occasion should so require, Whose Scouts before sent forth, about noone discouered a troupe of horsemen come out of M the Turkes Camp, about some businesse they had to do, but to them vnknowne. Whom the Scouts supposing to have been the fore runners of the Turks Army, and by them almost forprised, hastily retyred back again, and by their hasty retreit put the whole army in an alarme; which came brauely marching on, in hope now to have come to try the matter by true vaA lour, and by the fortune of a generall battell to have made that day for ever famous by their victory and the ouerthrow of their proud enemies. And in the heat of their fo great courage like enough it was for them to have performed the same, had the Turks had but so much courage in them as to have met them in the field, as was well hoped they now would. But they with their former loffes discouraged, and resolved only vpon the safegard of themselves, and The Tarket rethe victualling of Buda, had no minde to enter into these honourable lists, but kept themse lues build listed be build listed close within the couert of their tents and the strength of their trenches. And so the Christians them by the with a falle alarme moved, and having for the most part of the day in vaine expected the comming forth of their enemies, returned into their campe deceived of their expectation.

The same day there was an espie taken, whom they which tooke him thought to have been a Turke, howbeit he was found to be one of their owne men; by whom they were better enformed of the cowardife of the Turks, of their purpose for the shunning of battell, and of their resolution for the keeping of themselves within the safegard of their trenches; and that they so did, as well for the loffes they had before received, as for divers other valueky accidents, which eaused them to misdoubt some cuil successe in the end and winding up of this their expedition, Neuerthelesse, the Christians not greatly trusting to these reports, still kept their army in readines, to give their enemies battell vpon the least occasion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cause of seare, the Turks having no desire at all to come to a generall battell: fo that in flead of great effects that were expected, the time passed by in light skirmithes and vaine alarmes betwixt the two armies; untill that at length the Turks having by the C river sufficiently stored the city of Buda with victuals, the great Bassa secretly by night rose The great Bassa with his army, and fo retired toward Belgrade. Which fo base a retreat differed not much heaving villafrom a cowardly flight, being with such silence made vnder the darke couert of the night, as cress by aged that the Christians had thereof no perceiving vntill that they were quite departed and gone. "He with but a single shade the control of the silence of the Turke in Hungary was all that the silence of This victualling of Buda and of some other few places of the Turks in Hungary, was all that recircibous of the great Baffa did this yeare with his great army; whereas at his first comming it was given Hungary.

out, that he would therewith take both Strigonium and Pesth from the Christians. The next day the hafty and fudden departure of the enemy being perceived, the Generall of the Christians called together the Colonels and other great Commanders of the army, to consult with them, what were best to be done in so vnexpected an occurrent? Of whom, some D were of opinion, That it was best forthwith in all haste to pursue their fearfull enemies othersome for many reasons diffuading the same, and othersome withall propounding some other notable exploits to be taken in hand. But in conclusion, the fafest point was resoluted upon, which was, not to hazard any their troups in purfuing of their flying enemies, who were hardly to be ouertaken; but now immediatly after their departure to attempt the taking in of some one of their strong holds: where, among stothers that were propounded, Hatwan was thought to be the most necessary place, being so seated, as that beside the great harme it did to the Christians thereabout, it much hindered both advertisements and victuals to be brought vnto Pelth. Which exploit refolued vpon, they forthwith rafed the Fort of S. Andrew, and the fort by them built in the Isle of Vicegrade, because they should not stand the Turks in any E stead after their departure, and sowith all their power set forward toward Hatwan. This town is seated beyond the river of Danubius toward the North, about eight leagues from Buda, crossing the way to Transyluania and Cossoua, vpon a faire and euen plaine, neere vnto a great and deepe marish, and was sometime desended with good and strong walls, with a castle, and three large and deepe ditches, for a long time in the power of the Turks, and which without losse a great while held out against the valiant Baron Teuffenbach, by whom it was most streitly in vaine besieged : untill that afterward it was againe besieged by Maximilian the Archduke, the Emperours brother, then Generall of his army in Hungary in the yeare 1594, vntowhom it was by composition surrendered, after it had for a certaine space beene by the Turks notably defended: who confidering the harme this place did unto the Emperours ter-F ritories, by reason of the scituation thereof, wherein a great and strong garrison of the Turks alwaies lying, forraged all the Christian territories as far as the river Vague, vea, and oftentimes tooke booties as far as Strigontum, and by spoiling of all that side of Hungary, caused the Countrey to pay contribution as farre as Ternauic, flauding within four leagues of the mountaines which seperat Hungary and Morauia: all irreparable losses to the Christians, and hardly to be avoided : for which reasons he caused it then to be dismantled, and to be made Q unferuiceable for the wars. After which time for all that, the Turks for the commodious works of the place, had with great labour againe new fortified the fame, with wats made with great piles of wood and faggots, with earth rammed in betwike them wa fixonger kind of fortifiers. on, and better able to withfland the fury of the cannon, than are wals of flone sid which for the Turks vie most commonly to fortific such places as they meane to defend, and which of tentimes cost much for the Christians to gaine the same from them.

Harman befie-Civillians.

This place thus fortified, and both with men and munition well furnished, and with all things needfull stored, was able to endure a great and long siege; whereunto the garrison therein was as resolutely set downe, as were the Christians to attempt it: where now, at their fift comming vnto it, a part of the Italian Regiment, affilted with 300 Lanfquenets, vndertheles. H ding of County Sultze, and Grafold Generall of the Italians, were appointed to go before the rest of the army, and to begin to make their approches : which they did by forcing of aware. mill driven by the water of the marish, not past a musket shot from the towne. Wherin while they were busied, the Turks fallying out of the towne, came to fight hand to handwith the Christians, and had with them a sharpe combat, the Turks fighting for the defending of the place and of their lines, and the Christians for the gaining of the same, and for their honour. Which so contrary are solution in that conflict cost the lives of many, and among others the life of Grafold, Generall of the Italians, there flaine with a harquebuse shot, vnto the great hun of the whole army, but especially of the Italians, now deprived of so great and expert a Commander. At last for all that, the Turks were enforced confusedly to retire again into the town. I having in this fally loft a number of their menalfo. The Christians neverthelesse having driuen the Turks backe into the towne, went forward with their businesse in making their approches, and placing their gabions to couer their cannon; wherein the Turks with their great and small that did them great harme, but especially with their murthering pieces, charged with nailes and other small pieces of yron. Howbeit, by the comming of the Lord Rullworm with the rest of the army, the approches were the next day brought on, and the battery planted so neere vnto the towne, as that the Turks could not without most manifest danger and losse, any more fally out to trouble the Christians in their workes. The first inconvenience the besiezed felt, was the want of Water, which through the diligence of our men was foone taken from them, the cannon right furioufly battering the wals in the mean space. Wherewith the Turks r discouraged, and now out of hope to be relieued, thought it not best for them to expect either whileft a breach were made, or an affault given, but by parly to prevent these dangers, in hope to come to some easier composition, while yet they stood in their whole strength. And so The Turket in Parley by the Turks demanded, and by the Christians granted, and hostages for the surety thereof on both fides given, they fent two of the chiefe men amongst them to entrest of the fame: who at the first demanded, That their lives and liberty faued, they might with bag and baggage depart. Whereunto answer was given them, That they should only with their lives and liberty be gone, with some few hundreds of their worst horses of courtesie given them, to carry them to fuch a place as they meant to retire themselues vnto, and to deliuer into the hands of the Christians all such renegats as were in the towne.

Now the besieged Turks carrying yet the markes of the cruelty by the Wallons exercised vpon them in the former fiege, when as the same town was by force taken, and filled with deal bodies of all ages & fex, and doubting now this fecond shipwreck, with like misery threatned unto them by the Christian Generall, if they should expect the dreadfull euent of a generall affault; accepted of these hard conditions, seeing no better could be obtained; and so couenanting, that they with their families, their lives and liberties faued, might with a fafe convoy be conducted vnto some place of surety within their owne territory, they promised to give up the town. Which agreement on both parts resolued vpon, they full of sorrow and heavinesse, with their families departing out of the towne the 29 of Nouember, were by Colonell Andaft with certain Hussars safely conducted to Solnoc. The Christians entring the town, found therein M great store of victuals & munition, the houses full of corne and other necessaries, and the shops ftored with weapons, fhot and pouder, with 24 pieces of great ordnance ready mounted, which might have well sufficed for the desence of the place. But all these things are but actessories vnto one principall, that is to fay, to resolution, without which they are but of small force, and

A with which they are able to do much. Beside that, the place it selfe thus furnished well considered, seemed almost impossible to have bin forced; but especially now that Winter was come on, which might have brought a thousand stormes and difficulties, by the Christians not to haue been endured: fo that euery man beholding the same, with his cies cast vp towards heauen, gaue God the praise, for taking away the Turks courages in their to great aduantages, and encreasing of the Christians in their no lesse difficulties:vnto whom the glory of this victory was wholly attributed feeing that contrary to all apparance and mans forces, he had given to the Christians the victory, no way able by their owne forces to have been gained. But God, which in his prouidence from heaven beholdeth all things vpon earth, disposeth of the same as he feeth best for his glory, and the welfare of his: so that in this action he was the only pilot R which brought this our ship into the hauen of health; for the haires of our head are of him numbred, and even the least creatures voon earth are of him regatded.

Into this new gained town the Christian Generall put a good and strong garrison of a thoufand Lanfquenets and fine hundred Hungarians, part horfemen, and part footmen, for the keeping of the place and of the country thereabout; which done, he retired with his army toward Pefth, which he relieued with victuals, and strengthened with the troups of the Colonels, Collonitz, Geiberg, and Roner, who were there bilited to passe that Winter, and to presente the place against the deurses and enterprises of the Turks at Buda, who were still deursing and practifing for the regaining thereof.

The time of the yeare for foldiers any longer to keep the field now past, and the great army the Lord Tillof the Turks rifen and gone, the Lord Raffworm breaking vp his army necre vnto Strigonium, worm breaking vp his army necre vnto Strigonium, wy his army, or caused all the Ensignes by him this yeare gained from the Turks, even 64 in number, to be ga- fendeth the Enthered together all very braue and gallant; all which he fent with great pomp and triumph to fine gained thered together all very braue and gallant; all which he fent with great pomp and triumph to fine gained from the Turks Vienna, for a Present to the Archduke Matthias 3 who received them with great thanks given for a present to both vnto the Generall that fent them, and the fouldiers that had gained them; and bountiful- the Archange ly rewarding them that had brought them. They of Vienna at the same time highly commending the Generall, and not a little rejoycing to see those same Ensignes now in their power within the city, which not long before had proudly braued them in the field.

Now after the breaking up of the Christian army, a great number of infolent and seditious fouldiers, especially of the Regiment of Colonell Alimein, roming up and downe the country, D to seeke for booty, most cruelly risled and spoiled the country villages, with the inhabitants therein, as well the Christians as the Turks, sparing no more the one than the other; whose outrage not otherwise to be staied, they were by commandement from the Emperor, by force charged at Widhof, and two hundred and thirty of them being brought in prisoners to Vienna, foure and thirty of them were there for example hanged, and the reft as men not worthy of entertainment cashiered. The time of the yeare having (as we faid) broken up the army of the Christians, the Regi- The falliers of ment of the County Reingraue was put in garrison into the villages of Chiante and Ternavie, the regiment of alwaies at hand with the enemies, as fittest to repulse them. These souldiers were alwaies kept ently billied, by in doings, still fighting while others were at peace, and mannaging their armes, whilst others extremine dri E hanged theirs by the wals. For beside the troubles they had with the Turks, their nigh, but bad for the infellus, neighbours, the very inhabitants of the countrey (who held all that might hurt them, for enemics, were they never fo much their friends) oftentimes, and that for little or no occasion at al, tookevp arms, and right furiously charged them as their mortall enemies. Of which combats there was no end, the country peafants still striving to rid themselves of such ghests. So that these valiant men still enforced to buy their bread with the price of their bloud, as men become desperat, vsed the Christians as they did the Turks, dividing all things with them by the fword. But in these small and often fights moomen were slain and lost than would haue bin in a generall battell, some good number either of the one side or the other being every day slain: which daily inconveniences caused these souldiers to resolve to go to seeke their living else-F where, rather than in the midft of the graues of their fellows. Whereunto they were the rather enduced, for that but a little before, the troupe of Captaine Clinchampe, the heft and brauest of the whole Regiment, was one night right furioufly affailed, and almost surprifed by the country peafants. VV herfore they departed out of Hungary into Austria without victuals, apparell, or money, their pay due vnto them for 17 months being kept from them. A cruelty full of couctousnesse, and a couetousnesse full of cruelty, by wrong and hard dealing to leave those of men to the desperat extremity of hunger, who for our safety had exposed themselves to all manner of danger. For if the Prince (as he may of right) demand the liues of his subjects in his. feruice, as bound vnto their loyalty; they may also of right require due provision for their maintenance: of which two offices where one faileth, the whole state must needs fall. For prouiding whereof, great was the wisedome of Augustus, who laid vp the publique reuenue apare by it felfe, to defray the publique charge; and that which was his owne prinat, to ferue his

Thefe poore fouldiers thus resolued, craued leave of the Bishop of Presburg to passe by the fuburbs of his towne, without doing therein any harme: which their request he courteoully granted; and so according to their word they indeed passed, not so much as once wish. H ing for that they durst not once touch. Which their so quiet passage caused the Bishop to surnish them with boats, whereby to passe ouer the river which divideth Hungary from Austria. The pefants of Which once knowne unto the peafants of Austria, they affembled themselves together, to the Auftria fickly number of 1500 men, and cast vp a fort vpon the banke of the river, with three faulconers in it, passes the resolutely set downe to keepe them from comming ouer into their country. Which their so Jondauers of the forward a refolution for awhile staied these men of war : who to avoid further trouble, courteously requested passage of these men promising all their good behaviour in passing quietly through their country; which the churles in most churlish maner refused to grant, with groud threats of the danger of their lives, if they should by force attempt the passage, and not with quietnesse returne. With which brauadoes of the country churles these troups of martial I men prouoked, refolued by force to remoue these lets, and by the sword to open themselues a way: fo turning the head of their baggages toward the fort, as if they would have there paffed. while the peafants stood gazing vpon them, Came aillard with his troupe of horsemen vaperceiued of them tooke the river a little higher vp, and by swimming gained the farther banke; after whom captaine Clinchamp with his troups immediatly followed also. In which passage they were much troubled with great flakes of yee, with the great deepenesse of the river, with the steepnesse of the bankes where they were to land, and many other difficulties: all which they regarded not to be reuenged of their enemics. These valiant men being got ouer, vponthe fudden furprifing these rude country churles, and furiously charging of them, quickely ouerthrew them, and cut them in pieces: of whom 200 were left dead vpon the place, as many x moe hurt, and the rest put to slight. Which was no sooner done, but that the rest of the troups of the Regiment without let passed the river, and so joyned themselves vnto their victorious companions. Scuen weekes this Regiment staied in Austria; and so longer had, but that you the complaint and request of the Nobility and of the people of the country, they having for 17 months pay due vnto them received nine months pay were licensed to depart. Which was a great ouer fight in them that had to doe therewith, at once to disband so many good men, as had not their like among stall therest of the Emperours garrisons, and who being staid with a little mony, might with their good feruice have flood the Emperour in great flead: as by proofe afterward appeared; when as the Emperour by necessity forced to call them together againe, could not of all that firong Regiment raise but three companies; the rest being some of L them returned into their own countries, other-fome of them gone to serue in other places, or else otherwise dispersed. Of which three companies, the first was given to Campaillard, the second to Baltazar Marades a Spaniard, and the last to John Paul an Italian: Which three captaines had before commanded in the Reingraues Regiment, and done the Emperour good fernice, as they did afterward also.

The rest of this yeare ended in Hungary, with divers other encounters and combats, Forconflictiof the tune therein still favouring the Christians. As 300 Haiducks, going forth to seeke for booty, to ruris and by good hap chanced to meet with a company of the Turkes being very rich, and divers of them men of good account; amongst whom, the Gouernour of Mohatz was one: all whom these Haiducks cut in pieces; to be borne withall, for shewing no fauor vnto them, who most M cruelly had before spoiled them of their parents, lands and goods. Besides that, they tooke the Gouernor of Copan, with his sonne, and 24 other very rich Turks, with 170 horses of sernice, and eight fat Oxen prepared for their prouision. Which fat booties drew forth other fouldiers also to seeke out for the like : of whom, certain troups of the Christians going forth toward Batiwar, a towne of the enemies; met the Gouernor of the towne and of the territory thereabout come out with his garrison against them; where betwixt them was made a right hot and sharpe fight : wherein at the first encounter the Turks seemed to have the better, but in the end the Christians taking courage, ouerthrew them and cut them in pieces. In this conflict diuers prisoners were taken, with three Ensignes, and many other rich spoiles. This happy exploit was seconded with newes agreeable thereunto out of Moldania, whereof the Vaynod by a Curror fent of purpose, gaue our men to vnder stand, which was, of the generall ouerthrow of the Tareats: who having with all manner of crucky watted the country, had in the end made the inhabitants fo desperats that reposing more comfort in a speedy death (the end of all miseries) than in a linguing life, turmoiled with so many intollerable calamities, they generally arming themselues, joyned themselues with their Vaynod, so to try their last fortune. With which resolution they in battell encountering with the Tattars, gaue them a great ouerthrow, a number of them being left dead voon the field, and the rest put to flight, and chased out of the country, the Moldanians notably reuenging their former losses, and in their owne territories burying their enemies.

Neither were the Turks in this cold and hard time of the yeare on their part idle, but flill Beged Baffa plotting of their great and notable defignes, even through the middeft of the frost and snow thinking to to have been performed. The Basis Receiving showing the half will be to have supposed to the state supposed to the to have beene performed. The Baffa Bezedhearing that the Lord Baffa lay with his troupes the Lord Eafla, dispersed in the country about Lippa, in great security by reason of the extremity of the time. " bim surgicle by altogether unfit for men to keepe the field : and therefore imagining it to be no great matter, do surribrowil now amidst the frost and the snow to surprise him; acquainted three other of the Turks Captains and Commanders thereabout with the matter: who liking well thereof, with 5000 men all together set sorward, in hope to have upon the sudden surprised him. But he an old expert Captaine, and not so carelesse as they supposed, had his secret spice still abroad among them: by whom he aduertised both of their purpose and of their comming, resoluted in both to preuent them; and to that end having called together his forces, fet forward to meet them in the mid way, and so before they were aware to intercept them; neither failed he of his purpose; for meeting with the Turks fearing no such matter in place of disaduantage, and vpon the fudden charging them round, they, deceived of their expectation for the cafineffe of the victory promsed them, as men dismaied, after some small resistance fled, aboue cleuen hundred D of them being in this conflict flaine, and the rest put in rout, and driven into the river Maruze, there perished; some few onely by speedy fight with the Bassa escaping. Twenty of the Turkes Captaines were here taken, with some few other prisoners, and a great and rich

Much about the same time George Barbell, one of the chiefe of the Rebels in Transylvania, acknowledging his fault, came to Claudionople, to take the oath for his allegiance viito the Emperor: by whose example a great number of others moved, came in and submitted themselues also: and happily he being a good and valiant Captaine, had done much more for the seruice of the Emperor, had he not bin by death preuented; for shortly after he suddenly died. The other Rebels moued neither by his example, nor by the comming in of some others of their companions, made choice of one Bethlin Haber (a most renowned Captaine, and of great Bublin Haber reputation amongst the fouldiers) for their Chieferaine: who proud of sixch a choice, imme chesen their chiefe of diatly after fent an Herauld vnto Basta, to will him forthwith to deliner vnto him all the coun- Transfinania. try of Transyluania, as to him that was of late chosen Prince thereof, or else to denounce vnto him most cruell war : and to tell him further, That if he refused so to do he was in good hope by his owne forces, without any aid from the Turke, to drive him out, being well affured of the faithfull denoire of the Transylvanians. of Hungary.

Mahomet the great Sultan had (as is before declared) by great promises made vnto his Robels, fought to appeale the rebellion in Asia, and by that meanes drew Zellaly, one of the chiefe Rebels, with twelve thousand good souldiers out of Asia into Europe, and so into his warres in Hungary, vpon an affured promife made vnto him of the government of Boing the hope whereof, as it had drawne him vnto thefe late warres, fo had it also encouraged him with his gallant troups of most brave horsemen to doe the best service he could, so to shew him. I felfe worthy of so honourable a preferment; which he right notably performed during all the time of the Baffaes abode in Hungary, to his owne great commendation, and the further ring of his Lord and Masters service. But the Bassa with his weake army retired out of Hund gary, and the Baffa himselfe returned toward Constantinople; Zellaly with three thousand horse withdrew himselfe into his promised gouernment of Bosna, to possesse himselfe thereof: and being come neere to Bagualue, the chiefe Towne of that Prouince, he thereencam ped in a faire large medow, within fight of the city. Now Zeffer Baffa, then Gouernour of the Prouince, and not as yet thereof discharged, seeing this Rebell thus to encroach you his charge, as if he would out n by force intrude himfelfe thereinto; with all freed called together his garrifons and men of war (euer ready at his becke) and fo went forth against Zellah, with g a purpose to have quickely, and without any great trouble, cut him with his so small a company all in pieces. But the old Rebell not ignorant either of his owne weakenesse, or of the Basfacs strength, having himselfe lost the best part of his forces before in Hungary, as hewas a man of no lesse wisedome than courage, resolved now to attempt by policy that which he well knew he could not by force effe &. Wherefore he as a great Prince, vpon some brave resolution, began to encampe himselfe as if he had meant there to have lien, when as immediatly after vpon a faire night having caused divers great fires to be made in his tents, as if it had been to beguile the enemy with, he suddenly rose and departed. Of whose flight (for so it was like) the Bassa understanding, and that he had for faken his campe, hasted thither with all speed with By policy outr. his fouldiers to take and pillage the same; not making any other account of him that was fo 1 thown 2 for fled and gone, but as of a base and faint hearted coward, who for feare and want of courage had left both his campe and honour as a prey vnto his enemies; the spoyle whereof the Bassa (being possessed of the campe) gauevnto his fouldiers; who glad of such a morfell, greedily fivallowed it vp, which by and by after became their bane and veter destruction: for whilest that they were charging themselves with booties, and every man was thinking of his prey, nothing carefull of their common safety, Zellaly with his three thousand horse, all valiant and refolute men, juddenly the same night returning, surprised the Turks being fast on sleepe, as buried in security, and cut them in pieces. Some of greater courage than the rest, begantomake head, and to give some shew of their valour, but overcome with the general! scare, out of order,

In this surprise there were of the Bassaes men six thousand found dead upon the place: avery great flaughter to be made by fo few men. But what cannot valiant resolution do against care lefnesse, fulled asleep in the lap of security? The Bassa himselfe escaped by slight, with sect

and not resolued what to do, they were quickly with the rest forced, ouerthrowne, and slaine, M

Now Zellaly well knowing how to vie his victory, marched in hafte to all the chiefe places of that Prouince, and with his forces, more feared for their victory than for their number. caused all the inhabitants of those places, with most part of the rest of the people of that country, to sweare vnto him their obedience and fidelity. In which doing he gathered together great store of wealth, with a great number of braue horsemen for service : all which he put into Balnaluc, a ftrong towne, whereinto he in triumphant manner entred, with a crowne of laurell voon his head, and his foldiers finging his praifes amiddeft the smoke of a thousand pice, s of great ordnance, which he caused incessantly to be shot off for the space of two daies together: gining it out withall (amongst all the joyfull feasts and triumphs, made for the magnifying and setting forth of his praise and glory) That his resolution was, to take part with the Chri-R flian Emperor, if the great Bassaes, or other his enemies in great place in court, should seeke to croffe his defires, or to formalize his actions or proceedings in this manner of the obtaining

Now Mahomet doubting what this man, fo well acquainted with rebellion, would do, had by Mahomet feeds diners messengers sent for him to Constantinople, after the breaking up of the army in Hun. for zettat; to gary, there of his Imperiall and infinite bounty, to receive the honourable rewards of his good Beautiople, feruice and valour, the greatnesse wherof he had (as he said) already understood by Hassan Bassa the Generall: which fo bound him to the reward thereof, as that his defire and pleasure was to grace him in Court with his owne hands for the greater testimony of the loue he bare him. and of the efteeme he had of him. But the crafty and mistrussfull Rebell, doubting that these faire words were all but baits to draw him into his power, and the endangering or affured loffe both of his life and liberty, thut his eares against these so sweet charmes, and as a man well aduised, and one which knew that the hand of a Prince justly offended, is alwaies open for to punish his rebellious subject, being once in his power, with as great justice in punishing him, as he with wrong and difloyalty offended him; would in no wife accept of the offer: but civilly answered. That he most humbly thanked the great Sultan, for his so great and honou- Hersfalls to rable offers) and that he was so mindefull of him: but that he for his part defired not any grea. 10mi. ter reward for the feruices by him done, more than the government which his Majesty had before promifed him, whereof (according to which promife, which he could not thinke, but to teagreeable to his good liking) hee was now possessed, with a resolution to hold and keep D the same for his Majesties service. Which was as much in effect, as for a distoyall subject to talke with his angry fourreigne, with his hand voon his fword: but with this fly answer, such as it was, Sultan Mahomes for all his greatnesse, must as yet content himselfe, for seare lest if he should have fought to have by force removed him, he might so have raised a more dangerous rebellion in Europe, than was already in Afia. Zellaly fo politique and resolute a man, and not to feeke what to doe in fuch matters, being possessed of so great a government, and the Christian Emperour at hand ready to have backed him, if he should vpon any discontentment

The troubles of this yeare 1603 thus ouerpast, the beginning of the next was like vnto a 1604 faire blooming tree, which promiting great flore of fruit, but afterward blafted with the ex-E tremity of the weather, proueth in effect as barren, as it before feemed in hope fruitfull. For beginning with the fweet Westerne winds of peace, it ended with the steine Northern blatts of warre. The Turkshad oftentimes the last yeare made motions of peace, but especially toward the end thereof, outwardly making shew of a great desire and forwardnesse in themselucs thereunto. Which businesse the last yeare begun, was even with the beginning of this yeare also effectually continued, and Commissioners were on both sides appointed to conferre and conclude vpon the same. Amongst these Commissioners, Colonell Althem was prace become one; who to performe his charge, having taken with him the other Commissioners deputed the charge and the large, with him for this purpose, with certaine other Captaines, embarqued himselfe with them in thirteene ships from Strigonium, and from thence failing downe the River, landed with his F traine in the Island betwixt Budy and Pesth. Of whose arrivall there, the Turks of Buda aduertifed, and on their part ready, came forthwith thither also, with all the outward showes that might be of their most earnest desire for the concluding of peace; whereas our men, who by a thousand effects were affured of the virial third neffe of the Turks, and that necessiry and not the defire of any quietnesse, had drawne them to seeke for peace, to the contrary showed themselves very backeward in this businesse. For why, they knew right well, that the Turks Q had not taken this matter in hand but to ouertake them, and by this time of peace to gaine time of war more commodious and fit for their ambitious and cruell defignes. They had the vere before made fufficient proofe of our forces, accompanied with good fortune, which can fed them to despaire by strong hand to vanquish and ouercome vs : besides that, they still cue. ry houre in one place or other received a thousand losses and crosses from our garrions, who diffressed and annoyed them both with their forces, and with driving of them vnto the catre. mity of wants. Our men knew moreouer also, that the troubles of Asia as well from the Re. bels as from the Persian which lay so heavy vpon the great Sultan, drew them to this necessit. ty, to fecke for a breathing time of peace, wherin to repaire that which was in their forces and frength by wars impaired. And even yet also the manner of the Turks demeaning of them. felues in this action, their delaies, their excuses, and deferring from day to day to conclude voon some point of their treaty, gaue our men good cause to suspect them of euill meaning, as men respecting their profit more than their faith: and more subtill and cruell in all their actions, than honourable and valorous. The fifth of Ianuary was the day by our men expeded for the treaty; for as then the Bassa of Buda had appointed with the rest of the Commissioners to come into the Isle to heare what our commissioners should demand, & to entreat of the peace. But hee was too true an Infidell to faile of his Infidelity, and fo came not at all, but deceived our men both of their hope & expectation. At length in stead of himself, letters were brought from him to Colonell Althem; wherby he excused himselfe for not comming, requesting him with the rest of the commissioners, to come ouer the river to Buda, the more commodously for them to confer together, and fo the better to conclude their negotiation. Now though al. them for the Majesty of his Prince, and the honor of the State, ought not at the request of these his enemies to have put himfelfe into their power, but to have flood fast vpon the tearmer of honor, yet to the end that the country of Hungary, so miserably spoiled with wars, should not take occasion to complaine of his negligence in this negotiation of peace, he refolued to go to Buda, as the Bassa had requested deeming every action tending to the hinderance of the common good, to be but in thew honourable, and in deed hurtfull. Vpon which refolution he fent before the Gentleman of his stable, and his Cooke, with a Gentleman of the Turks, sent but the day before from the Baffa: which men going aboord together, were affailed with fuch a cruell tempest upon the river, that neither the skill of the watermen, nor goodnesse of the g vessell was able to refist the force thereof, so that the boat was funke and the men drowned. An euill prefage of the peace to be made, the raging water as it were foreshewing the troubles to come. But this tempest by the facrifice of these poore drowned men appealed, Althem and Geiberg, two of the chiefe commissioners, embarked themselves, and so passed over theriuer to Buda. At whose arrivall the Turks gaue in shew a thousand testimonies of their joy for The Christian cemmiffinners their comming. Neither did the Germans refuse their kind offered courtesses, but largely sed converoufly CR of the good cheere, and filled themselues with the good wines, whereof the Turkshad given tertained at them plenty: and they againe ving them as kindly, as if they had bin their brethren, and conuerfing with them as with their owne countrymen. Amidst this carowfing and platters full of good cheere, the propositions of peace, which the Turks meant to demand, were ferued in L alfo, and a truce for twelve daies demanded to confider of the matter: during which time it should bee lawfull for every man without let freely to come and goe whither they would: which was forthwith on both sides agreed upon. And for better testimony of the Turks true meaning in this their negotiation of peace, the Bassa in the presence of our Commissioners dispatched a Curror toward the great Sultan, to aduertise him of this businesse, and of the proceeding therein, according to the cammandement by him before given. Which hedid, to cause our men to beleeue that the great Sultan himselse was desirous of peace, and that his Captaines well affected thereunto, were willing to further the same, Which done, the Balls Trefent by the prefented vnto Colonell Althem two cases full of Turks armes, of all manner of fashions, lurks cinen to very rich, and cunningly wrought; both carried by a mule, with furniture for an horse, em- M broydered with gold and pearle, very sumptuous and rich, as a Present from the Great Sultan his Lord and Master, to the Emperour. And for the Archduke Mathia, he presented vnto the Colonell, a robe of purple veluet, with fleeues cunningly enbroydered with gold and pearle, embossed with fine and curious figures cunningly wrought with the needle: for the

A rarenesse thereof as admirable to behold, as for the richnesse thereof to have beene defired: which was by enery man wondered at, when as shortly after it was by Althem presented ento the Archduke, together with other presents from the Turks. Besides that, the same Bassa in token of friendship, presented vnto Althem himselse another very faire and rich robe; all the rest of the Commissioners receiving also from the Bassa other robes of lesse value, but yet all very rich and fumotuous.

This businesse for this time thus ended, and the truce for twelve daies concluded, the Christian Commissioners loded with Presents tooke their leave of the Turks, with the shewes of their good wils, and fo returned backe againe to Pefih. How beit thefe the enemies faire Prefents itill fauoured but of enmity, being indeed but like to the Prefents of Heller and Ajax,

Now the death of the most valiant and renowned Lord Nadasti, which at this time happe- The true and ned, was another euill presage of the bad successe of this treaty of peace now at hand who ha. 14st comment uing of long beene a barre vuto the Turks rage in that part of Hungary where he dwelt, they tord Nadaffi. now after his death, with the violence of their forces, as with an heady streame, bare downe before them all our good fortune in that Province. This worthy man of great fame and defert, had spent both his yeares and fortune in the most honourable warres against the Turks: wherein he was so skilfull and expert, that he was of them feared as another Huniades, and of the Christians honoured as another Matthias. He had a thousand times most valiantly fought against these miscreants, and as many times soiled them, to the great benefit of the Christian C Common-weale, the advancement of the Emperours fervice, and the reliefe of his distressed Country. These his heroicall deeds of armes were engrauen vpon the gates of the Townes and Cities of Hungary, and within the rockes of Tranfyluania, having both in the one country and the other right happily defeated these Insidels. He had the honour to have received the first incursions and attempts of the Turks, at such time as Amurath the third having perfidiously broken the League made with Maximilian the Emperour, with his Forces inuaded Hungary; and was the first of all the Christian Chieferaines that made head against them; and being by their sudden comming in by them almost surprised, performed yet great and worthy exploits and feruice against these faithlessemen. It should seeme that good fortune fauoured the Country of Hungary, but only in respect of him: for he being dead, it died also, D burying it selfe as it were in his graue, and him in glory; not suffering him to grow old, and so to languish in the ruines of his native Country. He died of a natural I death, about fifty The death of and foure yeares old, most part whereof he lived in armes, still charged with the burthen of the lord tlahis armour, and even at the yeelding vp of the ghost yet breathing wars against these the enemies of the Christian Faith. His death was much lamented for of many faithfull Christians, but especially of his owne tenants and subjects, whom he had alwaies kept and preserved in fasety, and still maintained them in all peace and tranquility during all these former warres; the Turks not daring once to affaile them, nor to enter into their territory, being staied from fo doing by the bulwarke of his valour, right dreadfull to their attempts. Neuer Turke was buried in his Territory, no more than were the Barbarians upon the bankes of the river Euro-E tas, his wisedome had so wisely prouided for the preservation of his people; and his valour so worthily affured them of their health and safety. He was for his Country another Epaminondas, who made his towne not only free from the armes and invalions of their enemies, but also dreadfull to their forces so long as he lived. The Turks on the contrary part no lesse rejoyced for his death; but accounting his country now rich and plentifull (for that it had neuer been by them spoiled) for their most assured prey came now thither on all sides, to have taken

F his territory, but that contrary to their expectation, they were encountered by this new Nadast, and by him so ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, that for a good while after they durst no more attempt the like. This fogreat a losse of so worthy a man was a little cased by the victory about the same time gained by the Vayuod of Valachia against the Turks spoyling of his Countrey. This the spoile thereof, and therewith to have enriched themselves. But as they were about so to have done, the valliant Collonitz honoring the remembrance of the Lord Nadasti his late fellow

But to returne againe to the Commissioners for the peace to be made betwirt the Great Sultan and the Emperour, the Bassa of Buda, to the end that the Captaines and Gouernors of the towns and caftles belonging to the Turks, being ignorant of the truce, should not continue H their warlike actions, to the prejudice of his faith given; immediatly after the departure of the Christian Commissioners from Buda, dispatched divers currours towards them, togine then knowledge thereof, and especially to the Gouernor of Agria, commanding them from thenceforth to abstain from their ordinary incursions into their enemies territories, and from all other actions of hostility, and so to keep themselves quiet vntill they were from him other. wife commanded. This little time of respite and breathing from warre, gaue great content. delibered con- ment unto the poore country people, now with warres almost exhausted and spent. And now tentment bith our fouldiers during the time of truce laying their armes afide, ran by heaps with spades and the Corte the Christian to Tue ks thought with the places where our Armies had fometimes lien encamped, there to deluc and fearch to finde fuch things as the Armies rifing in haste had haply left there buried. In which 1 action they so busied themselues as if they had beene Labourers in Haruest, so that nothing was in the fields to be seene, but men digging and removing of stones and earth. A right solish businesse, and yet so exc. edingly pleasing the greedy minds of these couctous men as that amiddest their such moiling labour they accounted themselves at greatease. The Turks also did the like, mingled together with our men, and our men with them, without any injury doing one to another either by word or deed. And no doubt it is, but that there they found more trauell than wealth, the greedy defire which drew them into this worke, deceiving them in effect. And in this mad labour both the parties spent many daies without any letor injury doing either on the one fide or the other. The Christians of Pesth also passing over the Danuby, went into the victualling houses of the Turks at Buda, whereinto they were suffered x to enter, and at liberty to walke up and downe the towne at their pleafure. And fo the Turks of Buda likewise came ouer the river vnto Pesth, and there walked at their pleasure, no man letting of them. Which manner of living was very commodious and pleafing both for the one fide and the other, the Christians buying of the Turks such things as they needed, and the Turks of them likewife. Through which quiet and peaceable intercourse and traffique, the people in generall feemed even in that short time to have forgotten a great part of their forepassed miseries, this little time of peace, joyned with security, having well assuaged the fame. But while these mutuall and vinwonted courtesses thus passed betwirt the Christians and the Turks, and the minds of most men were filled with the expectation of an assured peace to have beene even forthwith concluded, the Great Sultan Mahomet in the middest of all L his pleasures and delights died in his Imperiall Palace at Constantinople: the newes whereof being in the evening brought to Buda by a courrour of purpose sent from Constantinople, the Bassa forthwith sent the Captaine of the Sentinels of Buda, to Colonell Geiberg at Peth, to affure him of the death of the Great Sultan Mahomet, and of the succession of his young for Achmet into his Empire, now already both at Confantinople and other places thereabout

The Letters of the Bassa of Buda to Colonell Althem.

Vr due commendations remembred, noble Lord Gouernour, our deere friend and right honourable neighbour. We have thought good to aductife you, that the fourth day after your departure from proclaimed Emperour. By which messenger he also wrote vnto Colonell Althem, to certife him both of the death of the Great Sultan, and of the succession of his sonne, as also that he was by him commanded to continue the negotiation of the peace, and fo if he could to con-

A this city we received Letters from Constantinople, giving vs certainely to understand of the death of our mof mighty Emperour Mahomet, and of the fuccifion of his fon Sultan Achmat, into all his dominions and Empires: whereby we are, as his most humble subjects, summoned to yeeld unto him our oath of faithfull obedience as unto our rightfull Lord, and lawfull successour of his father into all his estates and dominions. Moreover, he particularly commandeth vs, to give him certaine advice and knowledge concerning the negotiation of the peace begun betwirt us and you, by the commandement of his deceased father: promiling to confirme and ratific all that what sever he shall finde done and agreed open concerning that businesse, without any qualification at all. And that if the treaty be not yet concluded and ended, that hu will and desire was, that it should be so according to the just means and assurances that we should faithfully and carefully together denife. Whereof I should readly give him advice and answer; which I B bane deferred to do, whiell I bane received your answer, which may instruct me what to resolve upon. Which your answer I attending, bauc staied the Currour of Constantinople, to the intent he may carry backeward unto our Emperour, what he is to hope for concerning this businesse, by the answer that you Shall give vs. Thefe are now therefore to adulfe you, as our decre friend, and a most valiant Governour to let downe that which you hall thinke to be most fit and necessary in this businesse: equing you withall to understand, that our new Emperour is a man of resolution even in these his young yeares, wherein he now flourisherh, having idlenesse, deeming no losse greater, and altogether irrepaireable, than the losse of time. If then you be still desirous, that the peace between our Emperours should be made and confirmed, I hope you will employ your whole endenour, with speed to determine this most happy negotiation, and so necessary for every mans good. As also to avert farre from our owne heads, the curses of the common people. C for whom it is most needfull that the peace should for their good and quietnesse be concluded, seeing that the fruit thereof is expected to be unto them happy, and the glory thereof for ener ours, for having by our deligence and true endeauour concluded the same. Which maketh me to hope, that when you shall finde your selfe ready to conclude this treaty, you shall not bring with you men enemies unto peace, or such as Shall dissuade the same; but rather wise and grave men, which to the ottermost of their power may advance the same , and finde out good and reasonable meanes to assure an eternall and faithfull peace between our Emperours, wato which so generall a good enery one of us is in duty bound to imploy the uttermost of hu sufficiencie and power. And thu is that I have of truth to write vnto you at this time; And fo I bid

Now these Letters although they most concerned the continuation of the treaty of peace, already begun, and were too friendly from an enemy, to have in them any good meaning, yet did they well affure the Colonell to whom they were written, of the death of the great and late Sultan Mahomet, and of the succession of his tonne Achmat into his Empire, to which end they are here set downe.

This late mighty Monarch, and now nothing but a loathfome lump of dead flesh, the great Sultan Mahomet, departed this life about the later end of Ianuary, in the yeare of Grace 1604, (according to their computation which begin their yeare at Christmas) when he had lived about foure and forty yeres, and thereof reigned eight. He was a man of no great spirit, and yet exceeding proud; which was the cause that he was both the lesse beloued and seared of his

E subjects in generall, but especially of the Ianizaries and other his souldiers and men of warre, who scorning his loose government, and grieved to see even the greatest affaires of his State not only imparted to women, but by them mannaged and outerruled also (as by his mother, the Sulranesse his wife, and others) not onely rebelled against him, but were oftentimes in their rages about to haue deposed him. He was altogether given to sensuality & voluptuous pleafure, the markes whereof he still carried about with him, a foule swolne, vuweldy, and ouergrowne body, unfit for any Princely office or function: and a minde thereto answerable, wholly giuen ouer vnto idlenesse, pleasure, and excesse, no small meanes for the shortening of his daies, which he ended with obloquie, vnregarded of his subjects, and but of sew or none of them lamented.

He had issue foure sonnes, and three daughters married vnto three of the great Bassaes. His first and eldest sonne was called Mahomet (after his owne name) whom he caused to be "Jue. strangled in his owne fight, vpon suspition of aspiring vnto the Empire, and conspiring with the Rebels in Asia: but afterward finding him guiltleffe, caused his body to be buried in his owne Sepulchre, and hanged the Bassa that had mis informed him.

His

His third somewas Sultan Achmas, who succeeded his father, and came to the Empireby the untimely death of Mahomet his eldest brother.

His fourth sonne being then a youth of about fixteene yeares old, was carefully kept within the Seraglio, with such a streit guard set ouer him, as that his name was not to be searned, even by a good understanding friend of mine, of late lying about three moneths together at Com frantinople, who most curiously enquired after the same, having very good meanes to have learned it. He was reported to have been long fince murthered, how beit that ho of late lived. but looking euery day to be by his brothers cruell commandement strangled, which is ac counted but a matter of course, and a death hereditary to all the yonger male children of the Othoman Emperours: the policy for the maintenance of their great Empire entire and whole, H lo requiring.

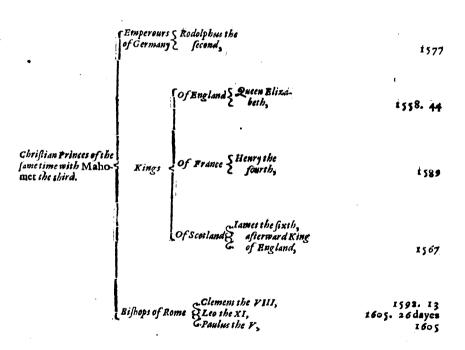

His dead body lyeth buried at Constantinople, in a faire Chappell of white Marble (neere unto the most famous and beautifull church of S. Sophia) for that only purpose by himselfe most sumptuously built about fifty foot square, with foure high small round towers, about the which are certain small round galleries of stone : from which the Turkish priests and churchmen, at certain houres, vie to call the people enery day to Church: for they vie no bels them. selues neither will they suffer the Christians to vie any. But the top of this Chappell is built round, like vnto the antient temples of the heathen gods in Rome. In the midft of this Chanpell (being indeed nothing else but this great Sultans Sepulchre) standeth his tombe, which is nothing elfe but a great vrne or coffin of faire white Marble, wherein lieth his body, coursed 1 with a great couering of the same stone ouer it, made rising in the midst, and stooping on each fide: not much valike to the coffins of the antient tombes of the Saxon kings, which are to be feen on the North fide of the Quire of S. Pauls Church, and in other places of this land; but that this coffin of the great Sultan is much greater and more stately than are those of the Saxon kings, it being aboue five foot high at the end therof, and by little and little falling toward the feet, couered with a rich hearfe of cloth of gold downe to the ground this turbant flanding at his head, and two exceeding great candles of white waxe, about three or foure yards long, standing in great brasse or silver candlestickes gilded, the one at his head, the other at his feet, which neuer burne, but there stand for shew only. All the flore of the Chappell being coursed with mats, and faire Turky carpets vpon them. And round about this his tombe, even in the x fame Chappell, are the like tombes for his wives and children, but nothing fo great and faire. Into this Chappell, or any other the Turks Churches or Chappels, it is not lawfull for either Turke or Christian to enter, but first he must put off his shooes, leaving them at the churchor chappell gate, or carrying them in his hand. Neere vnto this chappell, and the great Temple of Sophia, are divers other chappels of the other great Turks; as of Sultan Selym, this mans grendfather, with his seuen and thirty children about him: of Sultan Amurath, this mans sather, with his five and forty children entombed about him. And in other places not far from them, are the chappels and sepulchres of the rest of the great Sultans, as of Sultan Mahomet the Great, of Sultan Bajazet, Sultan Selym the first, Sultan Selyman: all by these great Mahometan Emperors built, whose names they beare. And being all of almost one forme and fashion, have every 1 one of them a faire Hospitall adjoyning vnto them, wherein a great multitude of poore people are daily still relieued.

Some others of the great Bassaes have their Chappels and Sepulchres, with their great and flately almes houses also, not much inferiour vnto those of the great Sultans, as namely, Ibrahim Baffa, of all the Baffaes that euer were among ft the Turks the most magnificent, hath his stately chappell, sepulchre, and almes houses, neere both in place and beauty vnto that of so The Turks bu-lymans. The Turks bury not at all within their churches, neither are any at all buried within by not in their the wals of the city, but the great Turkish Emperours themselves, with their wives and chilther willin the dren about them, and some sew other of their great Bassaes, and those only in Chappels by wais of their themselves built for that purpose. All the rest of the Turks are buried in the field some of the M better fort in tombes of marble; but the reft with tombe stones laied vpon them, or with wo great stones, the one set up at the head, and the other at the feet of every grave, the greatest part of them being of white Marble, brought from the Isle of Marmora. They will not bury any man where another hath beene buried, accounting it implety to digge vp another mans seventh Emperor of the Turks.

A bones. By reason where I they couer al she best ground about the city with such white stones. which for the infinit number of them are thought sufficient to make another wall about the City. But now to stand no longer about the manner of the Turks burials, leating this great Sultan to rest with his ancestors, let vs now prosecute the course of our history.

ACHMAT.

THE LIFE OF ACHMAT, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, EIGHTH EMPEROR OF THE TURKS.

Ahomet the late Sultan in the midst of his excessive pleafures by vntimely death taken away, Achinat the elder of his two fonnes yet living, who was to fucceed him in the Empire, to prevent the vivall and infolent tumults of the Ianizaries and other foldiers of the court at the change of the Emperours, and to take from them all occasions of discontentment; by the counsell of the great Bassa's (before he took voon him the gouernment) caused an exceeding great fum of mony, namely two millions and an half. as a token of, his bounty to be distributed amongst them? the Spahi and Sili ctars his chief horsmen receiving therof ten Crownesa man, with five aspers a day more to encrease their pay and the Ianizaries thirty crownes a man.

D and on after a day of ordinary pay: they of his court, especially the chiefe officers, tasting of this his bounteous liberality also. With which so great a largeste all men well contented, he Achmat crossin a thoff rich and flately Chariot, to placed as that all men might fee him, was in great maje- ned Emperour file carried thorow all the chiefe fiteers of Confiahtinople; the people on enery fide gazing of vooil him, and fiff as he passed by them, prosecuting him with their most joiful and happy acclamations? Some wishing that he being but young might (as another Solyman) beginne his reign with the conquest of Malta, as had the other with the conquest of the Rhodes : & othersome as heartily praying that with glorious and victorious conquests hee might be like vnto Mahomes the Great, whom he was then reported much to refemble. In which fo great & publique magnificence, he being about 13 years old, was with all the accustomed solemnities openly crowned every man withing voto him a most long and happy reign. And albeit that no great fruit was for the profetit to be expected from fo yong and tendera plant, yet netterthe effe by his authoritie and in his name many good orders were taken for the reliefe of his fiblects, with most heaut gricuandes generally oppressed, during the loose and careles reign of hir father. His grandwiother allo, a mole proud, ambitious and imperious woman, & withall caceeding rich, who will greate aith drity ouer ruled all in the time of her fonne Mahomets reign, he now removed from the flate, as not fix for her to have to do therein, and so deprived herofall her forther power and command. The Persian Embassador, whom his father in his difpleasure Badelofe (Hutter, he les at hiberty, and with him fent the Bassa of Aleppoto entreat of peace with the great Shaugh of Portia, while not long before (as was reported) had recovered the great city of Tauris, and was then preparing himself for now conquests. conquests, euen against the most puissant armies and strongest townes and sortresses of their G enemies : and some other to the contrary praying therein his wisedome, in seeking by faire means (now in the beginning of his reigne) to differme his enemies when they might most hurt him: at his better opportunitie, in his setled estate, to oppresse them for euer. So the actions of Princes are like vnto strange lights appearing by night in the ayre, which hold mens eyes busied with the intentiue beholding of them, some thereof dinining well, and some on thers euill, according to the diversitie of the beholders conceits and humors.

The treaty for peace also in Hungary was notwithstanding the death of Mahomet, by the Bassa of Buda still continued, who (as he said) by the new Sultan authorised, by letters incited the Gouernor of Strigonium to repaire vnto some such conucnient place as wherein the matter might be safely concluded. Vpon which motion the Gouernor with the rest of the Com. H missioners departing from Strigonium, the fourth of February came to Colloniz his Campe. from whence they were by the foldiers most brauely conducted along the banks of Danubi. us, vnto the ships which lay ready for them, to carry them downe the river to Peth during which time of their passage nothing was to bee seene or heard but fire and smoake, and the thundring of the great Artillery both from Pelih and Buda, the Christians and the Turks both striuing to excell each other in these their shewes of ioy and triumph. The Gouernour with the rest of his company being happily arrived at Pesth, met there with a number of the better fort of the Turks sent thither by the Bassa to meet him, and in his name to greet him; who with a thousand honours againe received and saluted them. All shewes of kindnesse, and fignes of the happy successe of the negotiation begun. And now the Christians desirous to 1 excell the Turks, as well in courtefie as in valor, appointed a number of them the next day to goe to Buda, to inuite certaine of the chiefest and most honourable men amongst the Turks, vnto a banquet at Pefth: VV howillingly accepted of the offer, and fo came fix hundred of the better fort of them over the Danubie to Petth, where the feast was most sumptuously and magnificently prepared for them. There were ten faire and rich paullions fet vp for the entertainment of them a little distant from Pesth, in a faire place, and fit for this purpose. In the first whereof were placed three very proud and stately tables. At the first of which tables, on the right hand, were fet the Commissioners for the Emperour, with the two Bassaes, and one Musti or Arch Priest, with a Mitre vpon his head, a long surred gowne vpon his back, and vnder that, a robe of most fine and exceeding rich sike. Vpon the left hand, at the same table K were placed certain of the Turks Lords, and other great men. At the other two tables were fet other of the best fort of the Turks mingled with the Christians : and so at all the other tables in like order were set a Christian and a Turke, wntill that the six hundred Turks were placed, with as many Christians among them: who by their good countenance and behaviour one of them to another, might have feemed to have been all of one & the same Beliefe, Nation, and Countrey. The Turks after the manner of their superstition, would not sit downe before the fetting of the Sunne, which being fet, they with a thousand Ceremonies, to the imitation of their Archpriest, set themselves down at the tables in order as is aforesaid, and there merrily reposed themselves untill nine of the clocke at night. At which time the tables with great reuerence taken away, the Turks as men well contented, and full of joy returned to Buda, the L instruments of musicke, trumpets, and Drummes, on every side sounding about them with much glee, and as it were witnessing to heaven and earth the great contentment they had received . Yetfor all this fair shew, nothing but deep dissimulation, mist with foul treason: For The Turks feet a little before their departure, they of Pefth were advertised, That the Turks in great number wel appointed, were come out from Buda to surprise Path during the time of the feath, beeing in hope that the Christians all busied in that action, bat lest the towne walls ynfurnished of defence. But they too wel acquainted with their trochesies, to put any trust or confidence in their fair thewes, had as well prouided for the defence of the town as for the magnificence of the feast abroad. By which meanes the Turker differ pointed of their intended purpole, were in the attempting thereof repulsed, and so glad to return as they came, backe agains w. M

The next day after, the Emperours Commissioners complained into the Bassa and the rest of the Turks Commissioners, of this fo trecherous dealing. Who excused themselves as alA rogether ignorant therofidifauowing the action for want of fucces, which had it bin effected, they would to the vttermost most shamefully have maintained. An ordinary course among the Great, with speech and countenance in shew to condemn that for want of effect, which in heart and mind they could for their own profit hauewished had bin performed.

Neuerthelesse the Turkes the next day (as if no such thing had bin meant) requested the Christian commissioners to come to Buda, as they had don to Petth: but they, as well by proof as by report, perceiuing the euil meaning of the Turks, excusing themselues returned to Strigonium, as loth any more to aduenture themselues into the power of their faithles enemies: yet left they Geisberg at Pesth, with Commission to continue the negotiation for peace with the Bassa of Buda: if he should find him therunto disposed, or any hope of bringing the trea-Mahomet the late Sultan had a little before his death (as is declared) fet at liberty Coun- count Tolant ty I folan (caried away prisoner to Constantinople after the taking of Alba Regalis) and sent message from him with Letters of Credence to intreat of a peace to be made with the Emperor; with protento the great Sultento the great Sultento the great Sultento the great Sulmise to yeeld himself againe prisoner, if he failed to obtain the same: for whom the French pros. Embassador became pledge. He having now delivered his letters of Credence vnto the Empetor, and commanded to fay what he had further in charge; declared, That the great Sultan offered to deliuer vnto his Majesty the strong townes of Buda, Alba Regalis, and Canisia, in exchange of Transylvania and Valachia, whereone laid claim, promising for his part to make a most sure & firm peace with the Emperor for time to come, and to give him such affurance C therofas (hould of him reasonably be demanded.

R tie to good effect or iffue.

The Baffa of Buda also amongst other the fair remonstrances of peace, had offered unto the Emperors Commissioners to restore Canisia and Agria, for Pesth, Hatwan and Vacia, together with the remission of all such paiments and tributes as were by the Emperour due to the great Sultan for the kingdom of Hungary. All which fair thews and offers, though much vnreasonable, were nothing but windy words to delay the time, and subtil baits to deceive the Christians : for the euent and issue which giueth life to all actions, with a form to them agreeable, hath by experience taught the Christians, that all the glorious and glozing proceedings of the Turks in this busines of the peace, so much wished and expected of the Christians, were but nets and snares wherwith to intangle them with the vain hope thereof, vntil that they in D the mean time might fortifie their townes with new supply of men, munition, victuals, and what soeuer else was needful, the more easily afterward to anoy them at their pleasure, and so to laugh at their simplicitic and light beleefe. For Mahomet being dead, and Achmat his fon (yet by reason of his minoritie, viider the tuition of his mother and other the great Bassa's) fucceeding in his place, the Turkes aggrauated the conditions of the peace, and propounded them so farre from reason, as that any man might see them now to have no more desire or regard of peace, after they had dispatched that for which they seemed before so desirous of it. Infomuch, that they fent a meffenger in post from Constantinople to the Bassa of Buda, to forbid him vpon pain of his head, any further to continue the treaty of peace, but forthwith to renew the War. So this peace fo much expected, and now of the people generally holden for as good as concluded, fuddenly vanished into smoke; nothing remaining of that body,composed of so many withes, more than a vain expectation, now dispersed with the winde of the Turkish trechery. And yet during the time of this negotiation of peace, fought for by the Turks both by often letters and messengers, many a solemn oath had passed both from the Sultan Mahomet, and from the Visier Bassa, for their faithfull and sincere dealing in the treaty therof; as, By the God of heauen and earth, By the Books of Moles, By the Plalmes of Danid, and By the holy Evangelists: oathes much vsed of the Turkes, and referred for their greatest solemnities, and strongest assurances of their leagues and promises. All which for al that, having serued but as baits and traines to beguile the simple and well meaning men, lay now neglected and vnregarded. Such is the faith and affurance which men haue from faithlesse Infide Is.

The treaty of peace thus broken off, it was forthwith by some bruited, That Achmat the great Sultan, under the conduct of the Visier Bassa his gouernor, was himself in person with a most huge army about to come into Hungary. Some others in the meane time reporting; that he was letted fo to do by reason of the Persian Wars, whereunto hee was of necessitie to G fend the greatest part of his forces; so that hee would but only send one of his great Bassa's with the remainder of his fo great an army against the Christians into Hungary, being before fworn neuer to return again to Constantinople, vntil he had brought the countries of Transil. vania and Valachia, with the remainder of Hungary, under the great Sultans obeifance, together with the country of Austria, and especially the strong city of Vienna, the end of the Turkish Emperors conquests. And that to this purpose the grand Seignior had in al places with great rigor leuied large sums of money vpon his subjects for the maintenance of his so great an army. It was by others also reported, That onely the preparations for so great an Army should be made this year, the Turks being resolued to do much therwith the next year, and therfore willing to bestow much, in hope with so great and puissant an Army as they were a. H bout to raife, to end the wars in Hungary, and not to return viril they conquered all the reft of that kingdom, in the rent reliques wherof the Othernan Emperors had staid. So that all bandicrafts men were fet to worke both night and day, not onely to forge Weapons, to cast great Ordnance, and to make pouder, but to prepare all other things necessarie also for so great an

All these great preparations were made for the seruice of the Visier Bassa for the War in Hungary, and of Cicala Bassa in Persia; wherof he was appointed Generall, having before prefumptuously promised, veterly to ruinat the Persians estate, and with so great a power even to swallow him vp. And indeed these Eastern wars much troubled the Turks, news comming fill concerning the conquests of the Persian vpon his territories; and that even of late the Per- I fian king profecuting his victories, had taken Babylon with all the country round about; and that divers other towns and cities, more moued with fear, than with the faith wherewith they had bound themselues vnto the Turks, now yeelded to the Persian, as weary of the Turkes seruitude, and desirous of their antient liberty. And yet for all that, the Turkes (as they are wise to diffemble their loffes, and to strike a fear into their enemies) had given it out in Constantinople, That the Persian king was neer vnto Babylon discomstited, all his army overthrowne, and he himselse taken prisoner. So that the Turkes forces before distracted, should wholly joine together, to the vtter ruine and destruction of the Christians in Hungary. And the more to confirm this cuil newes, it was reported. That the Beglerbeg of Grecia had raised a great power to joine with the Visier Bassa his forces, to the intent to leave nothing vnconquered in K Hungary. For the better effecting wherof it was faid also, That the Visier Bassa had caused a great number of Veffels loded with pouder and other warlike prouision, to be brought by water out of Egypt to Belgrade to ruinate the estate of the Christians. All which reports were by the Turk's given out, to cover their own mishaps, and to remission their enemies: as knowing right well, Warres to depend much vpon reports, and that a false bruit once beleeved, often worketh the effect of a thing indeed don. How focuer it was those so dreadful reports might well haue serued to haue stirred up the spirits of the Christians, to haue prouided for their owne defence, and to have flood vpon their gard. For he that faileth to provide against the preparations of his enemy, well deserueth either bondage or death, which soeuer shell befall him, for having by his negligence betrayed his owne abilitie and power to have withflood L him.

The great report of the Turks preparations and forces had now dasht all the talk of peace at Constantinople, and the hot fire of ambition had quite scorched the sweet flours appearing vpon the ouerture of the late hope of the common repose, some persuading the great Sultan, That he was able by his power at the same time both to subdue the Poissan King, and to confound the whole forces of the Christian Empetor, having fo many great kingdoms with in his Empire, so many Armouries stored for his service, and such store of treasure ready for his designes; promising vnto him most happy and easie successe both in the one and the other expeditions, even at one and the felfe same time : so that hee might vanquish the Persan by Cicala, chiefe Commander of his Army in Persia; and conquer the remainder of Hungatie, M with the Countries of Transylvania and Valachia, by the Visier Bassa Generall of his forces against the Christians. It being (as they said) a thing both honourable and profitable for a Prince, to bestow both men and money, thereby to gaine men, honour, and Empire! so that

A things which with great charge might be done all at once, were more profitable than those which with leffe charge were don at divers times; for that things fo don at once yeelded prefent profit, as being in our power, and recompending the charge: the other in long time putting vs to great charge, and yeelding little or no profit at all. And indeed men flood in great fear of this the Turks yong Emperour, who was by nature fierce, hafty, vigilant, cruel, ambiti- The disposition ous and proud, in his behavior and actions much refembling Mahomet the fecond, hee which of Achmar. took from the Christians so many kingdoms, towns, and cities, and among the rest, the Imperial city of Constantinople. He like a yong Alexander occupied himselfe in all the exercises ofwar, hated idlenes, his fathers greatest pleasure; he caused Arms to be made, cannos to bee cast, ships and gallies to be built, and took pleasure to discourse how the same were to be im-B ploied against his enemies: fo that it was greatly feared, that he being but a child in Constantinople, would proue a man grown in Christendom, in bringing the same under his power and obeisance. He spared no person nor means to satisfie his desire. So that strangers were to expect small curtesies at his hands, when as they saw him vse such bloudy cruelty against his nobles and domestick servants, of whom soon after he was Emperour he put divers to death, with one of the Baffa's alfo, who was Gouernor of Pefth when as our men won it. But as juflice and elemencie to good Princes are the furest tyes to keep their subjects fast bound vnto them in their obedience and duties, so are cruelty and rage the chiefest bridles wherwith the Turkish Emperors keep their subjects in awe and subjection vnto them, and themselves in theirestate.

But leaving the Turks busied about their preparations for the accomplishment of their yong Emperors high designes, let vs return into Hungary, taking Transylvania in our way; the wofull miseries of which Country my mind abhorreth to think vpon, and my pen therof towrite. This Prouince, somtimes much renowned for the great victories obtained against the Turks by the inhabitants therof, under the leading of their valiant Prince Sigifmand Bator The miles of and others, and abounding with plenty of al things, was now not by any inuation of the Turks, Transformania, but by civill discord among it themselves, and rebellion against the Emperour, now their Soueraign, so wasted and spoiled by the souldiers of all sorts, that many of the poor inhabitants for want of food fell down dead as they went in the streets and fields: miserable Wretches, alwaies fowing, but neuer reaping; alwaies labouring, but nothing profiting, the merciles and D greedy fouldier still spoyling and denouring all. By long continuance of which daily outrages the fields at length lay now untilled the pastures unstored and neglected, and all things els vnmannured and quite out of course. By means wherof the famin so increased, that the An burible poor peafants of the country having eaten vp for great dainties, all the dogs, cats, mice and famine, rats that they could get, fell to eating of dead horses, and the loathsom carrion of other hunger-starued beasts. It is reported also, That one man should eat another : and that at Hermanstat a woman having fix children, did among them cat one another, untill they were at length all six deuoured. And contrariwise, That two men did eat one another. Yea, theeues & malefactors hanged for their villanies, were by the poor and miserable hungry people cut down from the Gallows, and denoured; the people generally living vpon nothing but the roots of E Weeds, green herbs, and the leaves of trees.

For remedy of which so extream miseries, it was on al parts agreed, that a general assembly of the States of the whole promince should be holden at Dewa. Wherin it was accorded, that all hostility set apart, the Gentlemen of Transylvania having by their rebellion forfeited both their lives and lands, should be pardoned their lives, with three fourth parts of their lands referred vnto them; and that for ready mony they might of the Emperour redeem the fourth partalfo. But concerning the moueables of such as were dead in the time of these troubles, and already confiscat vnto the Emperour, they should so remaine; and that they should pay their disms or tenth part of their wines and fruits vnto the Emperour. And further, That there should be no further exercise of religion permitted vnto them, but onely the P Romish religion. And that the towns of Cronstadt and Clausenburg should within 3 weeks after, pay, one of them 20000 dollars, and the other 8000: And the Magistrats of those places should deliuer the keyes of their towns, with all their power, into the hands of the Emperors Lieutenant : and that the Gentlemen of these Towns which would not be accounted in G the number of the rebels, should for the safety of their persons take letters of pardon for their rebellion of the General of the Army. This pacification gaue fome little time of breathing vnto this poor distressed Country, which bared of all strength, and as it were vpon the graues brink, had now but euen the last gasp to give; and the Countrey people began again to give themicines vnto their wonted labours, in hope at length to reap the profit therof themselves. Ceat morbies But alas all in vain: for why, the rauening fouldiers inured to prey, after their wonted maner made hauock and spoil of all things, leaving nothing vnto the poor Country man but his la bor for his pain, and time enough to bewail his manifold and remedileffe miseries. The chief causes where f were the Nobility and Gentlemen themselves, who not liking to be governed. or rather (as they tooke it) oppressed by the Germans; and having not vpon any desire that H they had of peace, but rather by necessity inforced, yeelded vnto the Pacification aforesavd. ceased not fill vnder hand to incite the souldiers (ready enough of themselues to doe miss chief) and inwhat they might to trouble the State, being gouerned by the Germans, whom they accounted as meer ftrangers. All which their doings Baffa the Emperors Lieutenant perceiuing, caused three of the greatest of the Gentlemen of the country, and whom he most fuspected to be the authors of these troubles, to be apprehended, and fast mured up betwixe two strong walls in an old ruinous Monastery. Whither their friends afterward comming to visit them, & finding them starued to death, were therwith much abashed, as were also others their complices when they heard therof.

But leaving them to work themselves further troubles, let vs againe return to the Turkes

The Turks dea! deceitfulywith

Now was all the hope of peace betwirt the Christians and the Turks become desperat, the Turks making therof no more account, feeing they had according to their defire provided Alba Regalis, Agria, and Buda, of all things necessary. They had in four wagons put into A. guia the pay due vnto their garrisons: so that their affairs being now in good estate and their courage retitued, they began to scoffe and jest at our incredulity, to beleeue that they ever had any purpose to conclude upon any thing that was not agreeing with their profit, how far focuer it were differing from their honor or faith. So that now these faithlesse men began a. gain to renue their wonted incursions and pillages upon the Christians, with all other kinds of hostility, and that in more cruel maner than ever before: and our Hussars on the other side K well requited them with the like, beeing as well contented as they with fuch doings, their whole fortune depending upon the points of their weapons, & euer ready to ferue their prince for pay. Now it fortuned that fourfcore of the Turks going forth to feek for prey, chanced to meet with certain of these Hussars, and finding themselves too weake to incounter with our men, and betaking themselues to flight, were certain of them taken prisoners, and so brought vnto the Generall; vnto whom they vpon examination confessed. That the Turks much maruelled at the fimplicity and fooliffines of the Christians, to believe that they were defirous of peace, and not to have discovered their manifest intentions to the contrary, tending onely to the pleasuring of themselues, and the annoying of them their enemies, to the strengthning of themselves, and destruction of the Christians: as by proof it appeared, so soon as their de-L tires were accomplished. And that their yong Emperour was alwaies against this treaty of peace, what shew soeuer he made to the contrary, constrained therunto by the victories and conquests of the Persian King: all his wishes and desires aiming at no other end, than at the general ruin of all Christendom.

Our garifons feeing themselues thus charged by the Turks, took vp arms also, requiting them with the like outrages. They of Pappa and Vesprinium were the first that began these broils after the treaty of peace; who having joined their forces together, and making head Resolits taken toward Alba-Regalis, met with a number of Turks, driving sheep and cattell thither; whom femile large they surprised, and together with their cattel caried away prisoners. Which good hap was seconded with the liberty of 20 Christian prisoners from Buda: who one night seeing their M Keepers oppressed with sleep and wine, cut their throats, and so happily escaped ouer the Riuerro Pellh.

Now while these anoubles betwint the Christians and Turkes (after the treaty of peace broken of) thus began again in Hungary, the Turks, beside the rebellion in Asia, were together by the cars in the province of Bosha. Bellaly having by force joined with policie, driven Zeffer Baffa (as is before faid) out of Boina, and poffeffed himfelfe of that province, thought himselfe now thre enough within the ftrength of his gouernment, although he beeing by the great Sultan fent for to Constantinople, refused to come, as knowing right we'll himselfe to hold that to great a gouernment much against his will and pleasure. But Zeffer Baffa now supported with the authoritie of the great Sultan, and defirous to be reuenged of the dishonout and losse he had before received from Zellaly his enemy, with a great army suddenly entred into Bosna, and so comming upon Zellaly, fearing as then no such matter, otterthrew him with R all his power, and never left pursuing of him, til he had chased him out of the province, and so again recouered the gouernment therof vnto himfelf. But thort was the joy which the Baffa received of this to pleafing a victory, for within a few daies after hee died, comforting himfelse in this. That he died not vnreuenged. Of all which things the great Bassa's of the court having understanding, and loth to lose so great a soldier as was Zellaly (who as a man distressfed was now making shift for himselse) or by vsing of him hardly, to deterre the other Asian Rebels from comming in, and yet not willing to trust him with the government of so great a province as was Bosnathey to provide for all events appointed him to be governor of Temesware ; and Bezedes Balla (before Gouernour there) to fucceed Zeffer Balla in the government of Bosna. Therby contenting all parties, to keepe their forces whole and entire against the

But as the Turks were troubled with their affaires in Boina, fo the Christians were no lesse Gress troubles but rather more busied with theirs both in Transylvania and Hungary. The Estates of Hungary had appointed a generall meeting at Possonium, wherein the Archduke Matthias was to fit as President, there to consult of the means for the maintenance of this yeares wars against the Turks. But as the Archduke was about to have entred into the city in the middest of his soldiers duch a fire your the sudden arose in the city as consumed the greatest part therosian ill presage of the action then in hand, and a wofull spectacle to behold; with the terror wherof al mens minds possessed, turned them from the magnificent entertaining of the Archduke (which was before determined) to the quenching of the raging fire, as more necessary & conn cerning them than the other. Besides that, the miseries then to be seene in the other parts of Hungary yet holden by the Christians, were both great and lamentable; for beside the harms therin done by the Turks, the regiment of Colonel Althem had made fuch spoil and hauock Colonel Althem all ouer the country where it lay, that the towns and people in general so gricuonsly complai. blass gimen in ned therof vnto the Emperor, that he mooued with their just complaints, caused the authors of these so great outrages to be apprehended and brought prisoners to Vienna, where some of them were beheaded, and some others of them hanged. Besides whom so condemned and executed, there were some other Captains and Lieutenants, of whom some denying the sact, and other some standing upon the instifying of that they had done, as therunto by extream necesfitie inforced, were for their further triall sent prisoners vnto Prague, were they were com-E mitted to prison into the Castle untill their causes might be heard. Amongst which Captaines and Lieutenants, and other great officers, was one Genderos, Colonel Aubems Antient, who most wickedly a little before had slain Nudercy, a gentleman of good forr, and his fellow companion in Arms. For which murther hee was committed prisoner into a very high and strong tower within the Castle, (wherin County Paradifer who fold Canisia unto the Turks, lay formetime prisoner) until his trial might within a few daies after bee made: the horror of which criminall place, together with the guilt of conscience, so troubled and wounded the minde of Genderet, as that all the hope now to faue his life was by making an escape, and so to avoid the stroke of Iustice. Which he happily brought to passe by the help of one of his Lacquies, who had found means to bring vnto him a little cord, wherby straining himself out F at a little window (by which it was thought almost impossible for any man to have got out) he fafely got down to the ground, and there having two good horfes ready for him, hee with his man fled amain, and so escaped, his Keepers drunk over night, being in the morning found yet sleeping, without perceiuing any thing; whose drunkennes and fairor toward the prisoner had given him meanes to escape. The act of the paptains and lieutenants in prisoner Prigue & were some of them believeded, and some of them hanged, and the research intercession of the Nobilitie of Austria and of other great men pardoned yet with condition, That they should pay the fines fet vpon them, and fartie their Emperor in his wars three moneths of their owne charge without pay: fome few of the common fouldists, to the telepunof other had two of the fore fingers of their right hands out off, and afterwards fall nailed vntogibbers fet vp by the high waies fide. The regiment of Colonel Meyideng wole in muchie for their pay & came and incamped at Sneche, about a league from Vienna, threatning to defiroy the country, and to kill the chiefe men therein, if they were not paied their pay. Which rebellious mutiny the Captains did what they might to appeale; they befought them, but in vaine; they intreated H them, but to no purpose; they promised them pay, but pretrailed notyces, the Colonell high felfe thrust himselfe into the midst of them, with most carnest prayers, and his hands out up, putting them in mind of their duty, and laying before them the danger of most assured death and diffionour, if they continued further to proceed in that their diffoyaltie, whereunto their headstrong fury so disorderly led them. But they as men inraged, darried headlong with their fury, breathing nothing but threats and destruction, and by no prairies or persuasion to be mo. ued, presently made choice of another Chiefetaine, vader whose conduct and leading they refolued to rifle the suburbs of Vienna, and with the spoyle of them to pay themselves. Vpon which resolution they marched on, and so drew neere vato the city with which their so great and dangerous an infolencie the Gouernors of the city moued (the sufferance wheros, they ac. 1 counted to be to themselves both dishonorable and harmfull) they on the other side resolved by plaine force to represse them, and by instarmes to chastise them, who were not otherwise to be reclaimed. But such be the miserable calamities of warre, where wiolent remedies must purge out of the body of the commonweale the good humors together with the bad, so to recouer the health thereof: which remedies, not but vpor necoffity to be wied, are fo quicke and violent in their working, as that they afford not leifure to differne the whole and found from the fick and infected, to faunthe one, and to spill the other but that they must altogether run the selfe same way. For albeit that the whole regiment was in this mutihous action, and so all in like danger, yet were they not therof all alike guilty, many of them being euen against their wils and good liking carried away headlong, as with the violent course of an headle river.

Now the Captaines of the towne with their troupes and companies, strengthned with fome other supply sent from other places, were to set forward against these rebellious mutiners, and to frustrate their designes: for the greater strengthning of whom, divers of the burgeffes of the towne were inforced to enter into this action also : amongst whom, there were two accounted very honest religious men, who by all meanes sought to excuse themselves from going, labouring both by lively reasons, and by the Word of God, to prove, that they neither might nor ought of right to enter into armes against their Christian brethren, inforced with extremities, for want of their due pay, to forget their duty, and to do that befer med them not. But what availeth it to alleadge either reason or law among it the clattering of armes; the noise whereof is so great, as that Reason and Law cannot there be heard. Their L two men feeing themselues inforced to goe, and much grieved in conscience to do that they were inioyned to do, and to help to shed the guiltlessebloud of their innocent brethren (as A frangealti- they accounted them) entred both of them into a mostistrange and wofull resolution, which was to die themselues, rather than to imbrue their hands with the bloud of the guiltlesse; whereupon one of them having oftentimes called vpon the name of Iefus, with his owner fword thrust himselfe through the body, and so diedsthe other vpon the like resolution the himselse into the river, and so perished also: men worthy to be pittied for their conscience fake, but infly to be condemned for their foweake and defocrat a refolution. In fine, there bellious mutiners feeing in what perill they were, being even now ready to bee charged, and withall confidering the weaknesse of their power in comparison of them that came against M them thought it best vpou the fight of fogreat a tempest to strike fail; and so changing their pation, and laying downe their armes, craued pardon of the Archduke, who contained to tooke them to his mercy; yet with condition, that they should again return vnto their garifons, and deliuer into his hands the ring leaders and chief authors of that mutiny to be punished according to their deserts, as afterwards they were: the ordinary end of fuch infolent and difordered a ctions, which have nothing affured vnto them but death, which (all things els failing) attendeth only voon them.

But while the Christians thus divided were at variance among themselves, the Turks were ready enough to take advantage of such their dangerous discord. And first of all Zellaly the old Rebell, but now gouernor of Temesware, having in his crafty head plotted the taking of the city of Lippa by surprise, and to that purpose gathering together the greatest power hee was able to make, in the eucning fet forward from Temeswar, and so trauelling by night came to Lippa, vnto the walls wherof he planted scaling ladders, and at the same time laboured to R haue forced the gates, in hope so to haue gained the town. Which was done with such a terrible noise and outcry as was possible by the Turks to be made, after that they were once discoucred, therby to have difinated the Christians within the town: Who wel acquainted with such stratagems of their enemies, and now therwith awaked, came readily to the walls, and there so well desended themselves and their towne, that the Turks being repulsed, were glad togiue ouer the assault, and having lost a number of their men, with all speed to retyre, Vp. on whom the Christians fallying out, slew many of them in that their disordered retreat, little differing from plaine flight, and tooke many more of them prisoners. Yea Zellaly, who not many hours before had thought to have surprifed Lippa, was now glad himselfe to have recovered the walls of Temeswar.

Some of the Turks that were there taken prisoners, being examined, reported, That the army that was this year to come into Hungary was like to be very great; and that a part thereof was now come to Belgrade, expecting there the comming of the Fartars, who were together with them to enter into Hungary. And that by reason of the wars in Persia, which denoured almost all the soldiers in Constantinople, and yet could not be therewith satisfied; the great Sultan had commanded, That all fuch as were able to bear armes, as well in Boina, as in that part of Hungary which was subject vinto him, and in the other provinces therunto adjoyning, should be ready to join with his army in Hungary, for the furthering of his conquests there. And that the Persian King prosecuting the course of his victory, had ouerthrown Cicala Bassa with his Army, and taken his sonne prisoner, almost slain all his troupes; and entred into con-D federacie with Caracase chiefe of the Asian rebels, a man of great power, who had following of him a great number of valiant men, al resolutely set down for the troubling of the great Sul-

About the same time the gouernor of Cassovia (a great and strong town in the upper part of Hungary) going forth with a good part of his Garrison to appeale the souldiers lying about in the Countrey (but now vp in mutinie for their pay) and there spending some few days about this businesse, in shewing them the danger of this their insolencie, and persuading of them by the euill successe and end of such like actions, to returne againe vnto their duties; and they againe on the contrary fide, obstinately orging the payment of their pay, or else to haue leaue to depart, as being not able longer to continue without the one or the other: And E so the time passing, it fortuned that certain Turks then prisoners at Cassovia, incouraged by the absence of the Gouernor and of the garrison souldiers, to attempt the gaining of their liberty, brake their irons, and flew their keepers, in hope fo to have escaped : but beeing in the doing therof discouered, and so againe surprised before they could do any further harme, and by torture examined, by what means they thought to have escaped out of the City, the walls thereof being kept with continually Sentinels; they confessed, That their purpose was, the fame night to have fet fire voon divers places of the city (fo to have drawn the people to the quenching therof) and at the same time to have slain the Sentinels upon the walls, and so to haue made their escape. For which their fo mischieuous a fact and purpose, they were some of them executed, and the rest again committed to prison, were more streitly kept and lookt F to than before.

Now as Cassovia had by Gods prouidence thus cscaped so great an intended mischief, Ca- aunible fire nisia at the same time alone felt the euil hap by the Turks intended both to Cassovia & Lip- in Canifia. Pa; for a fouldier in garrifon in the citadel there, having through negligence or mithan cast fire into the pouder provided for the store of the castle, the pouder raking sire; blew up the cit dead, the towers, the houses & walls, and to be brief, made this poor place lite another Rome burnt by Mero. So that had any of the Christian forces bin then need the place, it had bin an easie matter to have won the same, as wel for the small resistance that was objective had bin an found, in so great association of the men, and destruction of the place. Bus such accidents have no certain hours limited to their beginnings, nor assurance of their comming, so that of tentimes they chance without any man to make vie of them, and again shy away when greatest preparation is made to obtain them.

The Turks of Buda over_ throwns. At the same time the Turks of Buda sent two hundred of the soldiers of elieir garrison to fetch in sorrage a little from Pesh: VVho as they were in the doing thereosizo presumptuous, so were they well punished for their so great pride. For the Shristians in Pesh having discovered them in this action, sallied out vpon them and charged them; against whom for a while they right valiantly defended themselves, but oppressed with number, at length they were quite overthrowne, most of them being there slaine, and the rest taken prisoners. Where with the Bassa of Buda was so, much offended, that in revenue thereof hecinais rage threatned with fire and sword to do what harm he could vnto the Christians. But as the common prover baith, Halse warned, halse armed; and enemies threats bring this comfort with them, That in receiving the threatned harms, we are in hope to be theros revenued, as therefore before provided.

Vnto these wosull troubles of Hungary, proceeding as well from the insolencies of the Christian fouldiers themselues, as from the sury of the Turkes, who were their antient and 1 mortall enemies; were joined the like or rather worfe calamities in Transylvania, extreame famine and want of all things fore raging in both Countries: fo that hardly hath any mifery or extremity been seen or heard of, even in Countries by the sust and heavy sudgements of Almighty God appointed to ytter ruine and destruction, which were not in those two countrics to be found, and of many felt. For remedie wherof, George Basta the Emperours Lieu. tenant in Transylvania, had there done what hee might for the appearing of the tumults and troubles in that prouince, and now of late brought the same into some good tearms, as it was thought, and as is before declared. Howbeit that in proofe it fell out far otherwise, and that the more he therin laboured the farther he was off from his intent and purpose. For the Nobility of that province, who were generally inclined vnto rebellion, and detefting the Ger- K manes, together with their gouernment, reiected the Decrees and orders which were agreed vpon in their late meeting together for the concluding of peace: infomuch, that affifted by the Turks, they had taken certaine Castles and strong places in that province. And the better to support their rebellion and insolencie, they had appointed a certaine place to meet at, where the Turkes and they might confer together of the meanes which they intended for the offecting of their designes. Whereof Basta having by secret means got understanding to remedy this pretended mischiese, hee sent away a great number of Haiduckes to lie inwait to furprise them upon the way. Which men, who were skilfull in the passages of the country, failed not in this action, but lay close in ambush, very conveniently for the surprising of their enemies. Who proceeding in their intended purpole, and thinking of nothing leffe than of L that which was intended against them, were suddenly, before they were aware, Turkes and Transylvanians all together surprised and slaine. Which exploit beeing performed, these Haiducks and other fouldiers destitute of their pay, and inraged with surv, fell vpon the prouince, ving therein all hostilitie, as if they had beene mortall enemies vnto it; punishing the guiltlesse for the guilty, and seising vpon all mens goods in common, to pay them that which was by some few in privat kept from them. All the whole province was subject to the rage and fury of those and other such mercilesse men of war, who without any remorse, indifferent ly flew and massacred all that came in their way sbut especially the poore and weak innocent people, who called vpon the Almighty God for temedy and redreffe of these wils they sustained, and cried out vnto him for revenge of their so great and cruel wrongs. The highways M were every where fo ful of theeves, that no man could travel from place to place, but that he was in great danger to be fet vpon and spoiled. For the Haiducks being men that live onely by prey and roaming up and downe the Countrey, made good prise and booty of whatsomer

A came in their way, sparing neither Turks nor Christians: insomuch, that they hearing how that the Zecklers with a good convoy were bringing a number of waggons laden with victuals, and a great many of Oxen and other eattell to Claudianople, although they were of the same party, Beleese, and Nation, yet they lay in wait for them to surprise them: against whom the Zecklers seeking to defend themselues, were by them croelly massaced, and their waggons, with their Becues and other Cattell, all carried quite away. But what should wee say? Hunger breaketh cuen the stone wals, and forceth men vnto all extremities, and now the same in that Province was such, as that the people were for the most part glad to line by seeding vpontheroots of herbs and weeds, and such other vnwholesome things, whereof great mortalite asserted ensued amongs them: Which was the cause that Bornat, Captaine of these Haiduckes, being reprodued for the outrages by them committed and charged to take order, that no more such like should afterward be done; answered, That it was not possible to orable vsurer, which tooke pity vpon nothing, but with great rage exacting that which it thought due for the nourishment of it selfe.

Amidst these troubles of Transy luanta and Hungary, there were two of the Turks spies of Buila disconcred and taken; who at Vienna had observed all the actions and proceedings of the Christians; and to the rumost of their power had informed themselves of their designes, as also of their preparations and forces to be raised and leuled for this yeres warres: of which two spyes, the one was empayled, and the other kept in close and street prison, vntill that sur-

The force of the Christians were now beginning to gather themselves together and to make an head in Hungary; a rife report at that time going. That they would forthwith take the sield: whereof the Bassa of Buda inderstanding, and desirous in what he might to hinder that their forwardnesselve whereof he doubted the essest thought it best to betake himsels to his old and cunning practife, for the treaty and concluding of a peace with the Christians, whereof he now made shew himselse, together with the rest of the Turks, to be very desirous; so by putting the Christians in hope thereof, to make them the more remisse and negligent in their doings, and to gaine time of them, untill that the Turks great army (then in preparing) might be brought downe into Hungary. To which purpose he in most friendly manner thus D writtent the Gouernour of Strigonium.

The Baffa of Buda, to the Gouernor of Strigo-

Green tree or printed to all distributed Mr. 1991, e.e. B know right well (noble Gouernour) that you are not ignorant, how that your brother the Go- Letters of the ucrnor of Strigontumbefore jou, hath most carnestly embraced the negotiation of peace, in such Basta of Buda

E you to understand the canses which bave trossed and hindered the concluding of logical a good the last year now paffed. The fir flet came by reason of the time, chosen too late to bee imployed in that Treaty of peace, when as now both the Armies were already on foot, and each in readinesse to joyn battell, and could notbethen flated by that intreaty, nor fent back again without fome exploit doing : Each part had refolued opontheir proper defignes, and enen chosen their ground for bastell, and were then hardly to bee turned from that whereupon they were before refolued. And albeit that during this last Winter the treaty for the peace was again begun, and that the men of warre on both sides in hope thereof, rested unarmed and free from all hostility, (a most sixtime to have begun and ended this treaty of peace, which hat beene so much wished for of our soueraigne Emperour, defired of his subjects, and requested by those of your Emperours, with whom my dread Soueraiene would confirme and contract a firme and continual peace) yes for allthat, fince the departure of the Gouernour from Strigonium, we fee three months to have been pafsed, without any Letters at all, or message by word of mouth brought unto us concerning this matter. So that we have not any thing whereof to certific our fourraigne Emperour. And for asmuch as the course of time hath brought thefe swo contrary Armies even unto the point of battell, and that they are marching one of them to incounter with the other and so to enter into the lifts of honour ; wee have thought G good before to defire to know of you what we are to expect concerning the peace. We therfore request you as our very good brother and friend, in what you may to flay the comming of our armies into this Kine. dom, and to attend to that which may produce the conclusion of this Treaty, being on our part most ready to lend both our car and desire to what sever shall be just and meet in this Treasy, and necessary for the Common good: beseeching you to beseeye us in this businesse, and not to doubt of our good will, more affected to your good, than is yours to our welfare. Wheref we in good time advertise you, far that our army which is now before Belgrade, being once arrived here, and marching in field, was cann possibly dufe it to return without somthing daing, considering the great harm, which under the affurance of your faith given we have received from your people during the time of the truce, which they have many wates woulded Which their cuill dealing hathgreatly insenced ws against your men in captinitie with us, and emsed our foldiers H to hew great rigor against their stanes. We therefore attend your answer, and the returnal your brother to the end we may together refolge according unto equitie and reason, of that which shall be needfull to be done for the common good and welfare. where element the trooker piece

Now for all this fair glofing, it was no hard matter to gheffe at the Baffa's fecret meaning: for how defirous focuer he seemed to be of peace, and willing to the furtherance thereof, yet neuertheleffe most true it is that during the time of all these faire shewes, the Turkes having affembled the gairifon fouldiers on all fides, had by night furprised the Castle of Simnings on the Christians, slaine part of the soldiers therein, carried away the rest prisoners, and most 1 cruelly afterwards burnt the place: fo manifesting by their foule deeds the cuill meaning of their faire and deceitfull words,
